There was a bill before Congress when the new year, 1874, dawned, which, under the able and energetic leadership of Senator Ramsey, of Minnesota, was expected to become a law, which would divide the Territory of Dakota on the 46th parallel of north latitude, giving to the northern half of the territory a separate territorial organization, and bestowing upon the new territory the name of Pembina. To such an extent was public confidence enlisted in the success of this measure that the few communities in Northern Dakota professed little concern in the affairs of the territory, politically, as it then existed, and were engaged in setting their house in order to receive the new organization and thenceforth go forward under an organization of their own, which it may be stated was the almost unanimous desire of its people, then numbering about eight thousand. Senator Ramsey, an acknowledged leader in Congress, made public statement of his confidence that the law would be enacted at the session of Congress then sitting, and the Northern Pacific Railroad influence, quite potent in northern affairs at that time, aided the movement through its many friends then among the prominent captains of industry in the United States.

Second at least, and as the sequel proved, first in importance as bearing on the general welfare of the territory, was the expedition sent out by the National Government under command of General Custer, to explore the Black Hills, with a view of settling the question of the existence of gold in paying quantities in that mountainous portion of the territory, it being the preliminary step to an agreement with the Indians for opening the hills to white settlement should Custer's report confirm the unofficial and fragmentary reports concerning gold deposits in that region which had been current for a number of years and had become so fixed in the mind of the public throughout the United States that numerous expeditions, made up by private persons, were threatening to invade the hills in defiance of the restrictions of Indian treaties, and also in flagrant disregard of the forbidding proclamations of the military authorities charged with the protection and enforcement of treaty agreements and obligations.

ELECTION—JOHN L. PENNINGTON, GOVERNOR

The third matter of general interest was the biennial election at which a delegate to Congress was to be chosen, and which, owing to the fact that the communities along the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad were to take part in it in a lawful and authorized manner, for the first time, rendered the result much more than ordinarily difficult to predict, while on the other hand there would seem to be more than ordinary promise of the success of the republican candidate because of the action of the heretofore divided party in uniting in their convention and agreeing upon the same candidate, Jefferson P. Kidder, judge of the First Judicial District.

A new governor, John L. Pennington, a southern republican from Alabama, had been appointed by President Grant, in January, to succeed Governor Burbank, and the new official was quite an active politician and a very fair stump speaker, and otherwise an executive who gave promise, by the active interest he at all times manifested in promoting the welfare of the people and in his unceasing labors for immigration, of valuable assistance in building up the material industries of the territory. Governor Pennington was a native of North Carolina, a practical printer, and had been a journalist in Alabama since the close of the Civil war.

REPUBLICANS GET TOGETHER

The disasters that had overtaken the republican party in the two last territorial campaigns, 1870-72, had been sufficiently severe to teach the leaders that two republican candidates for Congress at the same time before the people, were no match for one good democrat; and it was also well known that there was much complaint made by the republican officials and leaders at Washington, because of the demoralized condition and dissolute political condition of the party in the territory, which had occasioned more scandal and annoyance with their internal dissensions than all the other territories combined. The groundless contests before Congress had brought the territory into national prominence in an unfavorable aspect, and the constant quarreling among the leaders with no purpose but to promote their selfish ambition was pointed to as leading to a permanent disruption of republicanism in the territory and the permanent ascendancy of democracy, with the almost certain loss of the state when it should be formed, to the national republican party and to Congress. This being the situation in the early part of 1874 when John L. Pennington was appointed governor to succeed Burbank, and there being no alternative course that promised success, the territorial republican central committees appointed by the two republican conventions which nominated W. W. Brookings and G. C. Moody for Congress in 1872, agreed to unite and call but one territorial convention in 1874.

Accordingly as a first step in that direction, the central committees representing the two factions assembled at Vermillion on the 5th of May, 1874, where the following proceedings took place, in the interest of a harmonious union of the republican party of the territory:

Vermillion, D. T., May 5, 1874.

The republican territorial central committees pursuant to call, met at the Adelphi Hotel at 2 o'clock, P. M. Present Messrs. Jolley, Bennett, Poore and Parke, of the former Brookings Committee, and Messrs. Lawrence, Hughes, Stanley and Harian, of the Moody faction.

L. D. F. Poore, of Springfield, was elected temporary chairman, and A. Hughes, of Elk Point, temporary secretary. Col. John Lawrence tendered his resignation as chairman of one wing of the committee, and Col. John L. Jolley, by authority, offered the resignation of Chas. H. McIntyre, who had left the territory, but was chairman of the other wing. Both resignations were accepted. Alexander Hughes, of Union County, was then unanimously chosen chairman, and L. D. F. Poore, secretary of the committee. On motion the basis of representation in the territorial convention was fixed and ordered published in the call. It was decided to hold the convention at Elk Point, on Thursday, July 10th, at 2 o'clock P. M.

A. HUGHES, Chairman.

L. D. F. POORE, Secretary.

The following call for a territorial convention was made:

A territorial republican convention is hereby called to meet at Elk Point on Thursday, July 10th, 1874, at 2 o'clock P. M., to place in nomination a candidate for delegate to Congress, a territorial auditor, treasurer, superintendent of public instruction, and commissioner of immigration. Counties will be entitled to representatives as follows: Union, 12; Clay, 12; Yankton, 12; Lincoln, 8; Turner, 4; Minnehaha, 6; Bon Homme, 6; Charles Mix, 3; Hutchinson, 2; Davison, 1; Hanson, 1; Grand Forks, 1; Armstrong, 1; Moody, 2; Brookings and Deuel, 2; Hughes and Buffalo, 1; Sully, Ashmore, Wallace and Campbell, 2; Burleigh, 4; Stutsman, 1; Cass, 2; Pembina, 1.

ALEXANDER HUGHES, Chairman.

L. D. F. POORE, Secretary.

John Lawrence, John L. Jolley, G. P. Bennett, P. C. Parke, G. W. Harlan, R. J. Stanley, Committee.

The committee issued the following congratulatory letter:

We most heartily congratulate our republican fellow citizens throughout the territory, upon the harmonious action which characterized the proceedings and deliberations of the consolidated territorial republican central committees at their late session in Vermillion. We come to you in the above call as a united and harmonious committee, having but one common object and but one determined purpose, that of peace within our ranks, harmony and unity of action, and success at the polls. We ask the earnest and faithful co-operation of all true republicans in the accomplishment of this end. The entering wedge to all our discord and trouble as a party has been removed, and let no man doubt the sincerity of purpose which has brought about this happy result. United in principles and purposes, having only at heart the greatest good to the greatest number, with all past obstacles to unity removed, we ask you as republican electors to join hands with us in promoting and cementing this union, and by all legitimate and proper means, aid us in the consummation of a glorious victory in the coming election.

ALEX HUGHES, Chairman.

L. D. F. POORE, Secretary.

There was no strife among the republican leaders for the nomination for delegate at this time, but there was a general sentiment that Judge Jefferson P. Kidder, of Vermillion, judge of the First Judicial District was better situated to unite the various discordant elements and satisfy the rivalries of the leaders, than any of those known to be qualified for the place. Judge Kidder had been on the bench for ten years, and had given excellent satisfaction; he was also a man who stood high as a citizen, genial, popular, and though he had been mixed in with the "pulling and hauling" that had distinguished past campaigns he had managed to maintain the respect of his opponents and the confidence of the people. The judge was acceptable to the republican leaders in the two factions of the contest in 1872, and after a little stage play by several counties who wished to compliment their favorite sons, the judge was nominated by the territorial republican convention which was held that year at Elk Point, by a unanimous vote.

Mr. Armstrong, who had been elected as a democrat for the two preceding terms was aware and frankly acknowledged that he owed his success to the division in the republican party, but it is due to his reputation to state that he had been one of the most useful delegates the territory had elected. He was quite popular among republicans at home and had no rival in his own party; he was held in high esteem at Washington by the department officials, and had obtained from Congress every reasonable law he had asked for, among them the appropriation for paying the militia of 1862. But he did not wish to make the race again. Possibly the improved republican situation deterred him, but whatever the cause he had gone forward and made arrangements for retiring and engaging in business before the campaign of 1874 was inaugurated, and had selected St. James, Minn., as his field for business operations. He had been a Minnesotan before he became a Dakotan and had influential relatives in that state. He found his leadership of the democratic party of Dakota quite expensive and would leave Congress much chastened in a financial way, and he was sincere and determined in his resolve to retire. But circumstances and a sentiment of honor finally forced him into the field. His party failed to make a suitable nomination at their territorial convention and became badly disorganized; and could unite upon no one save himself. He had been supported through two successful campaigns, and rather than see the organization go to pieces he entered the campaign near its close and did the best he could, but was unable to turn the tide in favor of himself, and for that matter he looked upon it as a hopeless effort when he was prevailed upon to stand as a candidate.

REPUBLICAN TERRITORIAL CONVENTION

Here follows the proceedings of the territorial republican convention at Elk Point, D. T., July 16, 1874:

At 2 P. M., the convention was called to order by Alexander Hughes, chairman of the republican territorial committee, who named Hon. A. H. Barnes, for temporary chairman. Judge Barnes was elected; and on motion of Colonel Moody, W. M. Cuppett, of Lincoln County, was made temporary secretary. On motion of L. D. F. Poore, the chair appointed as a Committee on Permanent Organization, Messrs. Poore, Dewey and Gale. Mr. Moody moved for a committee of seven on credentials, which being carried, the chair appointed G. C. Moody, C. A. Lounsberry, Bismarck; V. P. Thielman, Turner; H. N. Rudd, Clay; Mark W. Bailey, Lincoln; L. P. Huston, Bon Homme; W. L. Webster, Union. A Committee on Resolutions was then chosen consisting of Messrs. Poore, Lounsberry, Newton Clark, Minnehaha; John L. Jolley, Clay; and W. W. Brookings, Yankton.

After an informal recess the Committee on Credentials reported the following delegates present and entitled to seats:

Yankton County—J. A. Potter, R. I. Thomas, Jacob Brauch, L. Congleton, E. Iverson, A. Simonsen, D. Wilcox, G. C. Moody, Clark Tarbox, Ole Sampson, W. Osborne, H. Ellermann, Clay County—J. C. Brandon, N. V. Ross, J. L. Jolley, H. H. Rudd, E. B. Crew, H. Myron, Nils Polsen, J. J. Simonsen, Jas. Hyde, Nils Hanson, E. B. Dawson, S. S. Hagne. Union County—A. B. Burrows, W. L. Webster, G. P. Bennett, S. S. Adams, H. Dennis, L. B. Hyde, M. M. Wallace, Jas. A. Smith, W. H. H. Fate, C. F. Mallahan, Howard Mosler, D. P. Hopkins. Lincoln County—W. H. Miller, Jr., W. M. Cuppett, M. S. Bushnell, Mark W. Bailey, B. Wilson, A. B. Wheelock (two votes), A. Arneson. Turner County—V. P. Thielmann, W. K. Hollenbeck, Junla Sargent, J. A. Childs. Minnehaha County—John Nelson, Newton Clark, J. L. Phillipps, Artemas Gale, A. J. Berdahl, Albion Thorne. Bon Homme County—L. D. F. Poore, R. T. Wood, Bligh E. Wood, J. G. Mead, L. P. Huston, W. C. Grant. Charles Mix County—Foster T. Wheeler (three votes). Hutchinson County—A. S. Jones, W. W. Brookings (proxy for J. E. Maxwell). Davison County—W. P. Dewey (proxy for John Head). Hanson County—Miles T. Wooley. Grand Forks, Stutsman, Cass and Burbank counties—Alanson H. Barnes (proxies for five votes). Armstrong County—R. L. Bushnell. Moody County—David Faribault, F. W. Pettigrew. Brookings and Deuel counties—H. N. Urmy (two votes). Hughes and Buffalo counties—William Thompson. Sully, Ashmore, Wallace and Campbell counties—Joel A. Potter (proxies, two votes). Burleigh County—C. A. Lounsberry (four votes). Pembina County—W. P. Dewey (for Judson LaMoire). Lake County—Wm. Lee.

The report of the Committee on Credentials was unanimously adopted. The Committee on Permanent Organization reported the following list, which was adopted: President, E. B. Crew; vice presidents, Messrs. Loonsberry, Congleton, Wheelock, Phillips, and Webster; secretaries, Mark W. Bailey and Charles F. Mallahan. The permanent officers assumed their respective positions.

The Committee on Resolutions made the following report:

[Resolution No. 1 endorsed the republican administration then in control of the National Government.]

2. While declaring our disposition to work with all good citizens to remove by lawful means the burdens of monopoly, and our belief in the right of the people to protect themselves by wholesome legislation, we recognize the fact that corporations have rights as sacred to them as are ours to us; therefore, these questions should be examined in all their bearings with a view to doing exact justice to all parties concerned.

3. We believe that there is no conflict of interest between the best interests of the territory and properly conducted railway corporations; that each in its sphere sustains the other, and that capital as well as labor is entitled to its just recognition and fair reward; and that we invite to our fertile lands and growing villages, capital of every description, and assure it a full protection from all unjust discriminations.

4. Dissension and strife having prevailed within the republican party in this territory for years past, by which the majority has been deprived of the representation justly its due, and through which the good name of the territory and its material interests have been seriously impaired; and recognizing the advantages that will result to the territory through the election of a delegate who is in harmony with the national administration, and with the majority of his constituents, we congratulate the territory and the party we represent on the prospect now existing for harmony in the republican party in the pending and in future campaigns.

5. Believing that the office should seek the man rather than the man the office, and that the people should be permitted to choose between the candidates presented for their suffrages, unbiased by mercenary or other unworthy motives, we view with alarm the expenditure of large sums of money to influence nominating conventions and elections, and unqualifiedly condemn the practice as being demoralizing in the extreme, and regard it as a species of corruption deserving the frowns of all honest citizens.

6. The division of Dakota Territory and the erection of a separate territorial government in the northern part thereof, we deem a measure of justice to the people of Northern Dakota, and sound policy for the Government; and we hereby instruct the candidate of this convention for delegate in Congress, in case of his election, to use all honorable means to secure such division.

7. As delegates representing the people of the republican party of this territory, we pledge our individual and united support to the nominees of this convention, and will countenance no man as a true republican or as worthy a place in the ranks of the party who does not abide the decision of this convention.

On motion the resolutions were unanimously adopted and made the platform of the republican party of the Territory of Dakota.

On motion, an informal ballot was then ordered for the nomination of a candidate for delegate to Congress, which resulted as follows: Whole number of votes cast, 85. Necessary for a majority, 43. B. F. Campbell received 20 votes; John Lawrence, 23; N. J. Wallace, 22; L. D. F. Poore, 10; J. P. Kidder, 4; W. H. H. Beadle, 3.

A formal ballot was then ordered, resulting: Whole number cast, 86:— Campbell, 20; Lawrence, 19; Wallace, 23; Poore, 12; Beadle, 3; Kidder, 8.

Colonel Jolley, of Clay County, then addressed the convention stating that the Clay County delegation had voted for N. J. Wallace, of Union County, a man of high moral and mental worth, but that in the attitude of candidates before the convention, and the nearly equally divided vote each had received, it was evident some new name must be brought before the convention, and in doing this, no man in the whole territory could be found who possessed the confidence of the people in a higher degree than Judge J. P. Kidder, and although without the judge's knowledge or assent, he would then and there for himself and other delegates from Clay County, present the name of Jefferson P. Kidder, of Clay County, as a candidate before the convention for the nomination. On the conclusion of Colonel Jolley's remarks, Judge Barnes, of Cass County, for and on behalf of the republicans of Northern Dakota, in a brief and well-timed speech, seconded the remarks of Colonel Jolley, nominating Judge Kidder.

A recess was then taken, and much discussion followed. The Yankton delegation retired for consultation. On the return of this delegation, business was resumed, and Colonel Moody made a stirring speech, announcing that their candidate, Mr. Lawrence, had withdrawn, and asked all his friends to support Hon. Jefferson P. Kidder. (Loud cheering). A. B. Wheelock next withdrew the name of Colonel Campbell, and announced that Lincoln would vote for Judge Kidder. (More cheers.) R. T. Wood spoke for Bon Homme, resigning Poore for Kidder. Colonel Campbell made a rousing speech for Kidder. Newton Clark said that Judge Kidder was the first and last choice of Minnehaha County; Judge Brookings surrendered Wallace to the favorite son of Clay County; and while this general surrender was proceeding the enthusiasm arose and the convention was a theatre of good natured disorder. The delegates finally resumed their appropriate places, and a formal vote was then taken, giving Judge J. P. Kidder eighty-two of the eighty-six votes, and he was declared the nominee for delegate to Congress. For superintendent of public instruction, Rev. J. J. McIntyre, of Turner County, was nominated. For commissioner of immigration, on the second ballot Fred J. Cross, of Sioux Falls, was declared the nominee. A. Sheridan Jones, of Hutchinson, was nominated for auditor. For territorial treasurer, John Clementson, of Union County. The convention then elected the Hon. George H. Hand, chairman of the territorial central committee, and the chair appointed eight other committeemen for the various sections of the territory, to-wit: Mark W. Bailey, of Lincoln County; John L. Jolley, Clay County; Alexander Hughes, Union County; C. A. Lounsberry, Burleigh County; John H. Shurtleff, Newton Edmunds, Yankton County; Col. L. D. Marsh, Stutsman County, and L. D. F. Poore, Bon Homme County.

The convention then adjourned without day.

DEMOCRATIC AND ANTI-MONOPOLIST CONVENTIONS

It had been a matter of general information that the Hon. M. K. Armstrong, who was serving his second term as delegate from Dakota would decline a re-nomination, having already made his plans to enter the field of business under promising auspices; and prior to the convening of the democratic territorial convention, in August, the following letter from the delegate was made public:

ARMSTRONG NOT A CANDIDATE

Hon. L. D. Parmer, Chairman Democratic Territorial Central Committee:

Sir: I have carefully considered the letters from yourself and other members of the committee, relative to the use of my name before the next territorial democratic convention as a candidate for a third term in Congress.

Permit me to kindly thank you and the people of Dakota generally for the many assurances of confidence and approval that have encouraged me during the past three years of my public service.

When my present term expires I shall have devoted four years of constant labor for the interests of the territory, while yet in the meridian of life, and my own business has suffered so much thereby that today I am poorer than when I accepted the office. Hence, with the empty honors of Congress, and the kind benedictions of a grateful people—which are dearer than all—I hereby most respectfully tender to you and them, this final withdrawal of my name as a candidate for delegate to Congress, from before any and all conventions to be held in the territory.

I am, sir, your humble servant,

M. K. ARMSTRONG.

There is no doubt that this letter from Mr. Armstrong expressed his sincere conclusion regarding another term, and that he had determined to withdraw from the political field after his term as delegate expired, March 4, 1875. He had previously made a similar declaration to many of his acquaintances in both parties, and it had become quite generally understood among the politicians of the territory. It was also known that he had arranged to enter into business at St. James,

Minn., and would cease to be a citizen of Dakota after his labors as delegate were ended.

This being the situation, the democratic party was left without a leader who could hope to win against the republicans who were now united in support of Judge Kidder. Mr. Armstrong, doubtless, was to some extent influenced by this situation; his former successful campaigns having been waged against a divided republican party; each division supporting a candidate.

ANTI-MONOPOLISTS

There had grown up in the territory within the year or so past, a faction of the republicans calling itself the anti-monopolists. A like organization existed in several states. It was the beginning of organized protests against the monopolistic tendency that was trending toward the control, by powerful commercial and industrial associations, of the important industries of the country. This territorial organization had won the confidence of Dr. W. A. Burleigh, who had not been in the political field since the campaign of 1870 when he and Mr. Spink divided the republicans and went down to defeat by the democrats under Armstrong.

The democratic territorial convention was called to meet at Elk Point on the 20th of August, 1874, and the anti-monopolists called their convention to assemble at the same place at the same time. This movement indicated that a coalition between these parties, for the support of a compromise ticket, was contemplated; but it was generally claimed that the democratic leaders were not pleased with the action of the anti-monopolists, in so calling their convention, and were not informed of such intention when the democratic convention was called.

The convention assembled at the date and place indicated. The following were made officers of the convention: J. W. Turner, of Turner County, president. Dennis Hennefin, of Burleigh County; Dr. J. B. VanVelsor, of Yankton County; and Jeremiah Gehon, of Lincoln County, vice presidents; Maris Taylor, of Yankton, and T. J. Sloan, of Clay, secretaries. A committee of five, on resolutions, was appointed, namely: G. W. Kellogg, Union County; F. M. Ziebach, Yankton County; Miles Russell, Clay County; H. Corson, Minnehaha; C. T. Campbell, Bon Homme.

The anti-monopolist convention was in session at the same time, and the proceedings of the democratic assemblage were here interrupted by a message from J. Shaw Gregory, president of that convention, asking for a conference committee. After some discussion, pro and con, a motion to appoint a committee prevailed; whereupon the chair appointed Charles Cooley, of Bon Homme; J. Kiplinger, of Union; J. L. Fisher, of Clay; E. T. Griffith, of Yankton; and Charles Deming, of Turner. This committee was instructed to make no terms with the anti-monopolists, but to learn what they had to propose, and report the same to the convention. After the conclusion of the conference, the committee reported that they had met the committee from the other convention, which had furnished them with a copy of the resolutions the anti-monopolists had adopted. The resolutions were laid on the table without reading; and the democratic convention, on motion, then proceeded to take an informal ballot for the nomination of a candidate for delegate to Congress, resulting:—F. M. Ziebach, Yankton, 16; C. T. Campbell, of Bon Homme, 14; J. W. Turner, of Turner, 22; E. W. Miller, of Union, 22. A resolution was then adopted requiring a two-thirds vote to nominate.

At this point the conference committee further reported that the anti-monopolists demanded the nomination of W. A. Burleigh, for delegate; but would concede to the democrats the remainder of the ticket.

Mr. Kellogg moved to lay the whole matter of conference on the table, and stated that he hoped the democracy had not got so low as to nominate a renegade republican.

On motion of Mr. Ziebach the conference committee was discharged from further duty. The convention then proceeded to take a formal ballot for delegate, which resulted: E. W. Miller, 28; J. W. Turner, 43; C. T. Campbell, 5; W. A. Burleigh, 4. A second ballot resulted, Miller, 40½; Turner, 39½.

The convention then took a recess until 8 o'clock in the evening, and upon re-convening a third ballot was had, resulting, Miller, 34½; Turner, 46½; no choice. The fourth ballot was taken which gave Miller 29½; Turner, 40½; Burleigh, 10. Miller withdrew his name in favor of Turner; but declared if Burleigh was nominated he would not support him. The fifth ballot showed no material change—Miller still running. A recess was taken and on reassembling, Mr. Weston, of Union, withdrew the name of Mr. Miller unconditionally; and Mr. Ziebach withdrew the name of J. W. Turner. The sixth ballot followed, giving T. J. Sloan, 17½; J. W. Turner, 7; M. K. Armstrong, 4; W. A. Burleigh, 35½; Abraham Boynton, 8; U. H. Akers, 4. No choice.

Vice President Gehon, who was now in the chair, here took occasion to state that he for one would owe no allegiance to the convention if it nominated Burleigh. He charged that the convention was a farce and he believed a trick had been put upon it by a certain delegation (meaning Yankton). Turner could have been nominated but for their secret opposition; Burleigh was a refugee from his own party, and he could never support him.

There was considerable wrangling during the next half hour, and a number of delegates left the hall. Finally, a motion to take the seventh ballot prevailed, which resulted, Burleigh, 35; Kidder, 10; Ryan, 1; Union County, 4; J. Gehon, 8; Armstrong, 1½; Bronson, 5; Maris Taylor, 1; Judge Akers, 1. Total, 66½, showing a falling off in the total from 80.

The hour being late, the convention voted to rescind the two-thirds rule, and the eighth ballot resulted, Burleigh, 36; Armstrong, 4; Gehon, 8; Taylor, 1½; Weston, 4; Burleigh having received a majority, was declared the nominee for delegate. The other nominations were: Territorial auditor, Henry Maxwell, of Hutchinson County; treasurer, Abraham Boynton, of Lincoln; superintendent of public instruction, Henry S. Back, of Cass; commissioner of immigration, Charles Eiseman, of Yankton County.

Territorial Central Committee—J. B. VanVelsor, Yankton, chairman; C. F. Lange, Turner; T. F. Singiser, Burleigh; H. F. Back, Cass; Jos. LaRoche, Charles Mix; H. E. Bonesteel, Bon Homme; Joseph Platt, Davison; C. J. Rardin, Armstrong; James McMillan, Lake; William Thompson, Buffalo; F. M. Ziebach, Yankton; A. Boynton, Lincoln; H. Corson, Minnehaha; T. J. Sloan, Clay; J. Kiplinger, Union.

At the conclusion of the proceedings, W. A. Burleigh, the nominee for delegate, was introduced and made a brief speech of acceptance, referring in strong terms to the monopolistic character of the party they had to contend with, viz: the republican. After which the convention adjourned.

ANTI-MONOPOLY CONVENTION PROCEEDINGS

This anti-monopoly or reform party was an outgrowth of the presidential campaign of two years before, when Horace Greeley ran as the virtual nominee of the democratic party for President. It had an organization in nearly all the northern states, and was said to have its membership mainly from the republican party. It would be idle to attempt to conceal the fact that the leader and his personality was doubtless the larger part of the Dakota organization. The delegates to the Elk Point convention numbered forty-seven all told, and were for the most part from Union, Yankton and Bon Homme counties. Cyrus Northrup, of Elk Point, was elected chairman of the convention, and T. R. Jewell, of Clay County, secretary. Their proceedings do not show that any Committee on Credentials was appointed, and about the first business transacted was the appointment of a committee of five to confer with a like committee of democrats and endeavor to arrange for the nomination of but one ticket that both parties could support; and at the same time announce to the democrats that they could name all the nominees except the delegate to Congress, which the anti-monopolists would claim, with Doctor Burleigh as the nominee. The committee conferred with the democrats, and returning reported that they had been unable to make an agreement; on the other hand that the conference had not been harmonious, and the committee had not received courteous treatment. This report caused a sensation in the convention, whose amicable intentions had been treated with indignity; and so much antagonistic feeling was engendered, that the convention resolved to go it alone, and accordingly proceeded and nominated a full ticket, Doctor Burleigh for delegate receiving 41 votes, and J. Shaw Gregory, 6. The successful nominee addressed the convention at length, going over the purposes of the new party quite thoroughly. The convention also nominated the following territorial officers: Treasurer, Arslick Iverson, of Lincoln County; auditor, Dr. O. F. Stevens, of Union County; commissioner of immigration, Jacob Brauch, of Yankton County (Mr. Brauch was not present, and declined to accept); superintendent of public instruction, George Stickney, of Union County. The convention then adjourned.

A SECOND DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION

The disaffected among the delegates at the democratic convention refused to accept the result of the convention, and held a convention during the night following after the regular convention adjourned, at which T. J. Sloan, of Clay County, was chosen chairman, and U. W. Weston, of Union, secretary. The matter of Burleigh's nomination was freely discussed, and it was finally voted to ignore not only his nomination but the entire convention and its proceedings. A resolution was adopted declaring that the convention now assembled was the only genuine democratic convention held pursuant to call, and it was its duty to nominate a ticket that democrats could consistently support. Accordingly, the nocturnal assemblage determined, as was stated, to purge the democratic party of Dakota of this deceitful subterfuge and betrayal of its honor; and the convention then proceeded and nominated the following ticket, which it recommended to the support of democrats who favor clean politics and an uncorrupted ballot, namely:

For delegate to Congress—E. W. Miller, of Union; superintendent of public instruction, G. D. Loughton, Clay County; auditor, W. W. Fowler, of Lincoln; treasurer, John McCabe, of Yankton County; commissioner of immigration, C. F. Lange, of Turner County. The convention then adjourned.

It will be realized that the democrats had not entered the campaign under favorable auspices. Without these dissensions, they were confronted by the united republicans under Kidder, and the normal republican vote was nearly two to one against the democrats. There was, however, the untested vote of the new counties north of the 46th parallel, which had come into the territory during the two preceding years following the construction of the Northern Pacific Railway—a vote which was estimated to be much larger than the entire vote of the older southern counties, and with this unknown factor to conjure with, a lively campaign ensued. The Australian ballot and other election reforms, if they are entitled to be classed as reformatory, had not yet been introduced. The election would be held in October, only six weeks away, and the artillery as well as small arms of the republicans, and the uncompromising democrats were turned with much vigor, in daily and nightly stump meetings held in all the settlements, upon the leader of the anti-monopoly forces and his democratic allies. An earnest effort was made to induce the withdrawal of Mr. Miller, the candidate of the second democratic convention, but it was unsuccessful. The Northern Dakota situation was not encouraging; and an independent candidate for Congress had come out at Fargo, Mr. H. S. Back, who claimed that inasmuch as the new Territory of Pembina would be organized that section had little at stake in the election and should choose for delegate a citizen of the proposed new territory. In view of this troubled sea of politics, and for the reasons stated in the appended letter, Doctor Burleigh concluded to withdraw from the field, and issued the following statement:

Yankton, D. T., September 8, 1874.

Dr. J. B. VanVelsor, Chairman of the Democratic Territorial Committee.

Sir: At the time I accepted the nomination tendered me by the recent democratic territorial convention at Elk Point, I did so upon the express understanding that the democratic party would unite with the anti-monopoly party of the territory, in support of the joint nominees of the two conventions. It now appears that a disaffection exists in the democratic party and that an opposition ticket has been placed in the field by a mere faction of the party—thereby leaving me not only to overcome the administration party, which is largely in the ascendancy in the territory, but to contend against the efforts of those upon whom I had relied for support. With this state of things existing, can anything be more certain than defeat?

While I shall ever hold in grateful remembrance the friends who have stood by me in the past, I must decline the empty honor of contending against such odds, and leave the responsibility of defeat to be borne by those who have brought about this dissension in a party already too weak to win a victory without assistance.

For the reasons here stated, I respectfully withdraw from the canvass, and leave the field to those who are more ambitious of political honors, and more efficient in action, than I am.

Respectfully yours,
W. A. BURLEIGH.

A THIRD DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION—BURLEIGH RENOMINATED—DECLINES

About the 15th of the month following Doctor Burleigh's withdrawal, Hon. E. W. Miller, of Elk Point, who had been named by the second democratic convention as a candidate for delegate, gave in his declination. A democratic convention was then called to meet at Vermillion on the 19th of September, for the purpose of naming a candidate. This convention assembled at the time appointed and elected J. W. Turner, president; L. D. Palmer, of Yankton, and O. F. Stevens, of Union, vice presidents; and T. W. Jewell, secretary. After much time devoted to consultation, the convention having resolved to nominate a candidate for Congress, an informal ballot was taken, resulting: Doctor Burleigh, 57; S. L. Spink, 37; scattering, 9.

Bartlett Tripp, who was present, made a brief speech, urging fair and regular proceedings, and positively refused to stand for the nomination. The convention then proceeded with a formal ballot, giving to W. A. Burleigh, 59 votes, and S. L. Spink, 42. The nomination of Mr. Burleigh was then made unanimous. The nominations for territorial officers by the former conventions were then set aside, and the following ticket named: For territorial auditor, O. F. Stevens, of Union County; treasurer, G. C. Maynard, Clay County; superintendent of public instruction, Henry S. Back, of Cass County; commissioner of immigration, Benton S. Fraley, of Bon Homme, auditor. The convention then adjourned.

Doctor Burleigh was not in the territory at this time, and when informed of the action of the convention, refused point blank to have anything further to do with it. It then transpired that at or just before the time of holding this mass convention, an effort had been made by telegraph to induce M. K. Armstrong, who was in Washington, to accept the nomination and in the event of a favorable reply to nominate him. Armstrong's reply explains and follows:

ARMSTRONG CONSENTS TO RUN

Washington, D. C., September 19, 1874.

Hon. D. T. Bramble, Yankton.

Dear Sir: Your telegram of this date reached me too late for a reply before the adjournment of the mass convention. I have not heard the result but hope the convention went off harmoniously. Had I received your telegram in time, I should have replied in these words, namely: "I cannot spend time and money in a third campaign. The people know my record for fifteen years past. I have served five years in the Legislature and four years in Congress, and if my constituents are satisfied with my labors, and should vote to send me back here, I will serve them faithfully. I have been through two campaigns and have traveled all over Dakota, and have addressed the citizens in nearly every town in the territory, and they know me as well as they ever will."

Most respectfully,
M. K. ARMSTRONG.

Inasmuch as the democratic party had no candidate in the field when this letter was made public, and as it had been generally conceded that Mr. Armstrong would have been the nominee of the Elk Point convention but for his peremptory refusal to accept, it is not remarkable that his party friends in Dakota looked upon this letter as an acceptance of the candidacy without a formal nomination, and he was forthwith announced as the democratic candidate for delegate.

KIDDER ELECTED

The election was held on Tuesday, the 13th of October, Kidder and Armstrong being the candidates of their respective parties. Armstrong returned to the territory and made a number of addresses in the Northern Dakota counties. The official vote gave J. P. Kidder 4,597; Armstrong, 2,189. Majority for Kidder, 2,408. It will be noted that the vote of the territory had doubled in two years.

A BLACK HILLS VOTE—THE VOTE OF NORTHERN COUNTIES

A certified list of votes was returned to the office of the secretary of the territory, signed by William Gore, John Smith, and James Dunn, as judges of election, stating that at an election held in Custer's Gulch, in the Black Hills, Dakota, on the 13th day of October, 1874, by miners and explorers, citizens of the United States and the Territory of Dakota, 2,876 votes were cast for M. K. Armstrong, for delegate to Congress, and 101 for J. P. Kidder, for the same office. As no election precinct had been established in the Black Hills, and it being well known as Indian country, where white people could not gain a legal settlement, and as the Territory of Dakota had no jurisdiction whatever over the country, the territorial board of canvassers refused to receive the vote; but the statement made may be accepted as showing the large number of white persons who at that early day had managed to avoid the military patrol and had invaded the southern Black Hills country. From all the returns of the election, not including the Black Hills, it was estimated that the territory contained a population of 33,930. As the federal census of 1870 gave only 14,981, it was evident that the territory had been gaining rapidly in population. The largest county vote was polled in Yankton County, 1,224. Votes were cast in seven new counties in the northern part of the territory, north of the 46th parallel, to-wit: Burbank, 34; Burleigh, 525; Grand Forks, 152; Cass, 305; Pembina, 206; Richland, 225; Stutsman, 53. Total, 1,500.

Not estimating the number of persons in the Black Hills, and allowing five persons for each voter, the counties south of the 46th parallel contained a population of 26,430, and the counties north of that line, 7,500. It was estimated that there were about two thousand voters, residents of new counties, north and south, who did not vote. The misfortunes attending the democratic campaign tended to reduce the vote, so that a fair estimate would be a total voting population of 8,786, and a total population in the territory, not estimating the Black Hills, of 43,930.

Regarding the Black Hills vote, a statement was made following an investigation ordered by General Sheridan, in November, stating that no white men had entered that territory since the Custer expedition, in July and August previous.

The counties of Armstrong, Burbank, Brule, Davison, Grand Forks and Buffalo were organized in 1874.

OFFICIAL VOTE

The election was held on Tuesday, October 13, 1874, and the vote cast was officially canvassed on November 27, 1874, Gov. John L. Pennington, Chief Justice P. C. Shannon, and Sec. George H. Hand, forming the board of canvassers. The following table gives the result of the vote for delegate to Congress:

Counties	For J. P. Kidder	For M. K. Armstrong
Armstrong	3	31
Bon Homme	170	227
Brookings	37	1
Buffalo	4	33
Burbank	34	...

Rev. J. J. McIntire, of Turner County, was elected superintendent of public instruction; A. Sheridan Jones, of Hutchinson, auditor; John Clementson, of Union County, treasurer; Fred J. Cross, of Minnehaha, commissioner of immigration.

LEGISLATURE OF 1874-75

The eleventh session of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota convened at Yankton, the capital, at noon, on Monday, December 7, 1874.

The members-elect of the Council were: First District—Union County, M. W. Sheafe, Jr., M. Pace and O. F. Stevens. Second District, Clay County—V. J. Austin, P. Chandler, and John L. Jolley. Third District, Yankton County—Jacob Brauch, John Lawrence and Clark S. West. Fourth District, Bon Homme, Hutchinson, Armstrong, Hanson and Davison counties—Benton Fraley. Fifth District—Lincoln, Minnehaha, Lake, Moody and Turner counties—G. W. Harlan. Sixth District, Pembina, Cass, Richland, Ransom, Barnes (formerly Burbank) counties—Alex McHench. Seventh District, Burleigh (see House, Fifth District), E. A. Williams.

The Council organized by the election of John L. Jolley, of Clay County, president; and the following subordinate officers: Arthur Linn, secretary; B. S. Gillespie, assistant secretary; E. B. Dawson, enrolling clerk; J. W. Blanding, Richland County, engrossing clerk; E. A. May, sergeant-at-arms; Justus Schnell, messenger; Ole Holther, watchman; S. Peterson, doorkeeper; Rev. M. Hoyt, chaplain.

The seat of E. A. Williams, Seventh District, Burleigh County, was contested by B. F. Slaughter, of the same county, and a large amount of testimony was taken. The district was the largest in the territory embracing twenty-one counties, and votes were cast from Fort Buford on the northern lines south to Charles Mix County. A very full investigation was had—a majority and minority report was made—the majority report favoring Williams, and this report was adopted on the thirty-first day of the session. Williams, however, had held the seat from the beginning of the session.

The members of the House of Representatives were: First District, Union County—Michael Curry, Desire Chaussee, Ira Ellis, M. M. Williams and Patrick Hand. Second District, Clay County—Scott Wright, J. M. Cleland, S. Svenson, O. B. Larson, and Knud Larson. Yankton County, Third District—G. C. Moody, H. O. Anderson, J. H. Haas, Lars Sampson, and A. L. VanOsdel. Fourth District, Bon Homme and Hutchinson counties—Joseph Zitka and Henry Rietsnyder. Fifth District, Charles Mix, Buffalo, Hyde, Hand, Faulk, Edmunds, McPherson, Hughes, Sully, Ashmore, Walworth, Campbell, Burleigh, Stevens, Wallete, Mountrail, Renville, Bottineau, Douglas, McHenry and Sheridan counties—George Bosworth, Bismarck, and W. T. McKay, Charles Mix County. Sixth District, Turner and Lincoln counties—James M. Wahl, and Joseph W. Berry. Seventh District, Pembina, Cass, Stutsman, and other counties—Hector Bruce. Eighth District, Minnehaha, Lake and Moody counties—Amos F. Shaw, Herman N. Luce, and Lars Bothun. Ninth District, Brookings, Deuel, Hamlin and Grant counties—C. H. Stearns. The officers chosen by the House of Representatives were G. C. Moody, speaker; C. F. Mallahan, chief clerk; C. B. Valentine, assistant clerk; James Goodyear, enrolling clerk; John Nelson, engrossing clerk; Warren Osborne, messenger; O. B. Peterson, watchman; Knud Oleson, doorkeeper; Rev. M. Jamison, chaplain.

GOVERNOR PENNINGTON'S FIRST MESSAGE

The first annual message of Gov. John L. Pennington was delivered to a joint convention of the two houses, held on the second day of the session. The message is here reproduced:

Gentlemen of the Council and House of Representatives:

You are assembled here to consult together and enact laws for the best interests of the people, and I hasten to assure you that in all your labors for the development of the resources of the territory, the protection of society, and the enhancement of the prosperity of the people, whose servants we are, you shall have my hearty cooperation. Let us, then, laying aside all selfish and partisan feelings, and invoking the aid of Divine wisdom, without whose guidance all our labors are as nothing, and mindful of the great responsibility resting upon us, enter upon the discharge of the important duties before us.

Great and startling events have occurred in this country since the adjournment of the last Legislature, some of which have seriously affected the growth and prosperity of Dakota.

In the fall of 1873 a financial panic occurred, from which all the industrial pursuits and business interests of the country are still suffering—a crash that stunned and almost paralyzed for a time, all commercial operations and caused a suspension of nearly all great business enterprises. This monetary convulsion necessitated a suspension of all construction work on the Northern Pacific Railroad, and as a result checked to a great extent the rapid flow of immigration which was flowing into the northern portion of the territory. Let us hope, however, that reviving prosperity will soon enable the projectors of that great national highway to go forward with it and that we may enjoy the benefits of the increased population and wealth that such resumption will be sure to bring.

The worst governed people are those who are governed most, and those who have the largest number of statutes have, as a general thing, the poorest laws.

I do not deem it my duty to recommend much in the way of new legislation, for in my humble judgment you can accomplish more good by a careful revision and simplification of existing statutes than you can by enacting new ones. All statutes should be plain, simple, direct, and free from ambiguity or vagueness.

With these preliminary generalities, I proceed to refer, under appropriate heads, to some of the more prominent subjects, which will probably receive attention at your hands.

I would respectfully suggest that the auditor, treasurer, and superintendent of public instruction, and commissioner of immigration be required to make annual reports to the governor, and that they be required to prepare and deliver them in time for that officer to avail himself of their use in the preparation of his message, and that it be made the duty of the governor to transmit the reports of the territorial officers named to the Legislative Assembly, with his own communication to that body.

Our population is mainly agricultural, and as in most new countries, most of them very poor, and hence the legislative authority should render taxation as light as possible, and only collect enough from the people to answer the purposes of the most economical form of government. The present revenue law provides that "the rate of the general territorial tax shall not be less than one-half mill, nor more than two mills on the dollar valuation." The territorial board of equalization fixed this general tax for the current year, at one mill on the dollar, which it was thought would be quite sufficient if promptly collected. I therefore see no necessity for increasing the amount which may be raised for territorial purposes.

INTEREST ON LOANS

It has been argued by learned writers that as nations progressed in civilization and refinement, that the market rate of interest on loans continually fell. Thus in the thirteenth century, in maritime Europe, the market rate on the best securities averaged over 15 per cent, but in the eighteenth century the market rate on similar securities had fallen to less than 3 per cent.

The inflation and fictitious values of the last few years in this country have had a tendency to largely advance the rate on loans, and as the poorer, producing classes are the borrowers, the high rates of interest which they have been compelled to pay for accommodation have contributed largely to hamper and cripple all industrial and commercial pursuits, and is undermining and eating up the labor of this country. The cry that "money is worth what it will bring," is not only untrue in fact, but its practical application tends to demoralize all commercial operations and to paralyze the energies of the producing classes. A stable currency and uniform low rate of interest will alone restore a healthy condition to the body politic, and bring prosperity to the individual citizen. "High interest is only another name for bad security" is a truism that is recognized by all shrewd business men, and especially by capitalists who loan money. And any state, territory, or community that will establish a reputation for prompt payment can get all the money they want at reasonable rates.

The poor farmer who is struggling on a homestead for a subsistence, and who attempts to better his condition by borrowing money at 18 to 24 per cent will soon find himself without home or bread, for in the majority of cases it requires a foreclosure of the mortgage to collect the debt, and no amount of economy and industry on the part of the borrower will enable him to pay such interest. Generous and productive as our soil is, it will not justify those who till it in paying such rates of interest for the use of money. The rate of interest in this territory was originally fixed by law at 7 per cent per annum on the dollar, and such is still the law except where a higher rate is agreed upon between the borrower and the lender, where by mutual agreement the rate may be made as high as 18 per cent, and of course but few contracts are made except at these higher figures. It is contended by some that in new countries on the frontiers it is necessary that local statutes should establish a high rate of interest to induce capital and investment. In my humble judgment this is a mistake. The establishment by law of a low rate of interest would inspire capitalists at a distance not only with our ability but with our determination to pay, and the improved commercial and financial character thus made for ourselves would secure for us all the money we might require to develop and build up the territory, without impoverishing our citizens to enrich usurers and Shylocks.

For these reasons I respectfully recommend, and in the name of the laboring and producing classes, most earnestly urge, that your honorable body so amend and change existing laws that not more than 10 per cent per annum on the one dollar shall be collectable. And that the taking of a larger rate under any pretext whatever shall be deemed usury and be declared unlawful, and be punished by the infliction of pains and penalties. All laws that recognize and permit such extravagant rates of interest as have prevailed in this territory, are intended for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many; for the oppression of labor in the interest of capital, and the people whose voice has clothed you with authority to enact laws expect relief from these grievances at your hands.

AGRICULTURE

The future wealth of Dakota must depend largely upon the products of the soil, as the pursuits of our population are mainly agricultural. The soil is generally fertile and well adapted to the growth of wheat, barley, oats, rye, and potatoes, while fruits and vegetables may be raised in sufficient quantities to supply the wants of the people, but the main reliance for wealth, especially to our farmers, is in the growth of wheat. Our climate and soil enables us to produce wheat that makes a flour that is unsurpassed in the markets of the world, and already has Dakota flour attained such a reputation for superior excellence in the eastern markets that it commands a much higher price than any other brand, if we except possibly that made from Minnesota wheat, and notwithstanding the rapid growth of our population and the increased production of wheat, it is impossible to supply the demand.

The great obstacle in the way of the successful growing of wheat has been the grasshoppers, but the success of the present year, while not all that could have been wished, was still such as to warrant the conclusion that thorough preparation of the soil, early sowing and timely harvesting, with prudence in the selection of the seed, will insure an abundant yield.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS

The superintendent of public instruction made an elaborate report to the executive, bearing date of January 1st, 1874, a copy of which is herewith transmitted, and to which I invite a careful examination on your part. The report furnishes evidence of interest and zeal for the work and in the cause of education, and you are respectfully referred to the suggestions and recommendations that have been made, or that may hereafter be made, by the superintendent, whose business it is to thoroughly understand the machinery of our whole educational system and to promptly point out and zealously urge all needed reform.

From a cursory examination of the report referred to, it appears that rapid strides have been made in the establishment of schools and in providing the facilities for educating the children, but owing to the increase of population and the extension of settlements, the work will be a continuous one, and additional legislation will be necessary from time to time, all of which I doubt not will be cheerfully rendered by you and your successors in office.

GRASSHOPPER VISITATION—DESTITUTION

The crops of the present year in some parts of the territory were seriously damaged by the grasshoppers, but the wheat, our main dependence, sustained more injury from drouth and intense heat than from insects. Should the grasshoppers afflict us every year, which is not at all probable, the use of early varieties of wheat and early seeding will thwart their operations, so far as this, our staple product, is concerned.

Notwithstanding the grasshopper visitation, however, but one instance of destitution, actual or prospective, has been brought to the attention of the executive department, though others may and probably do exist.

In the County of Brookings, I am informed by reliable authority, there are ten or twelve families, comprising not more than forty or fifty persons in all, who have been rendered actually destitute in consequence of the destruction of their crops. These people are now without the actual necessities of life, and from no fault of their own, and must have assistance to help them through the winter and to make another crop, or they may starve. If it be in the power of such of our citizens as have been more highly favored to relieve the necessities of their unfortunate neighbors, it will be much better for our present and future prosperity that they do so, and not call on the outside world for aid. And I earnestly recommend that your honorable body take such action in the premises as an enlightened statesmanship may suggest, and such as the exalted principles of humanity and the inspired teachings of Christianity will approve.

RAILROADS

We cannot look for any railroad construction or extension until the country recovers from the commercial and financial depression which now exists. In late years railroads have been built mainly by subsidies, and with money obtained from abroad, and not with means furnished by the citizens of the country through which the improvements have been made. Our population is rapidly increasing, settlements are extending and new ones are opening up, and there is a large annual increase of the products of the soil, and we must soon have more railroads. The people of the Sioux Valley, and of the Vermillion Valley, and of the Dakota River Valley, and those along up the Missouri, feel the need of additional means of transportation, and are clamoring for railroads, but that they are not yet in a condition to construct them is an undeniable fact. How and when, then, are we to get them? We answer, that we must appeal to the generosity of the general Government and ask that a part of the public lands be donated to us, as they have been to other states and territories, for that purpose. And further, we must encourage capitalists by a system of liberal legislation, to assist in our expansion and development by investing their own means in new railroad enterprises, and in extending such as already have a foothold in our young and growing territory. In order to build up we must have help from without, and our legislation must be such that the capitalist who comes here to put his money into railroads or other enterprises will feel that it is safe, and that he is not to be made the subject of oppressive taxation to satisfy an agrarian or fanatical sentiment.

In some of the older communities powerful corporations have doubtless become oppressive monopolies, but the good overbalances the evil done by railroads as ten to one throughout the land; and the few instances of monopoly and oppression that have occurred by no means justify the howl that has been made, nor the unwise and impolitic legislation that has occurred in some of the states. Railroad property, like all other property, should be the subject of taxation, but a people who acknowledge their own inability to build roads and who are inviting capital from abroad to come and build for them, should be very guarded how they tax, or how they propose to tax, such property.

The people of the territory owe a debt of gratitude to the men who conceived and carried to their present unfinished condition, the roads we have, as well as to the Government which so liberally aided some of them. And our people should cultivate kindly feelings of friendship with those who have extended these great arteries of trade and commerce to this remote outpost of civilization, by levying only a nominal tax on their property, especially now while their earnings are small, and by the pursuance of a uniformly liberal and generous policy encourage others to come and extend and enlarge the system of railroads in our territory, which a few bold and adventurous men have commenced.

A revision of the laws was recommended.

IMMIGRATION

The increase of population, especially by immigration from Europe, since the adjournment of the last Legislature, has been quite large, and a constant stream is still flowing in, and while I do not share the feelings and hopes of those persons who think that Dakota is to be admitted as a state in a year or two, I do consider the rapid increase of population, whether considered as to numbers or to character, as a good augury for the State of Dakota that is to be. This immigration should be encouraged by all the means within our power, and I respectfully recommend that such aid and encouragement be extended for that purpose as your wisdom may suggest.

THE BLACK HILLS

The reported presence of the precious metals in the Black Hills by the officers commanding and persons accompanying the military expedition made by order of the Government of the United States to that section of this territory during the past summer, has kindled a good deal of interest not only in Dakota, but throughout the country, and a great desire has been manifested to have it opened up by immigration and settlement.

By reference to the United States statutes at large, volume 15, page 635, it will be seen that all that part of the country known as the Black Hills, which lies in Dakota, is embraced in the Sioux Indian Reservation, and that the Government of the United States is bound by the sacred obligation of this treaty to protect those tribes of Indians to whom the cession was made, in the peaceful possession of their reservation. While this treaty is of force, any citizen who enters upon the reservation is a violator of the law, and subject to be arrested, tried and punished for such infraction. And I admonish all citizens of Dakota not to be tempted, even by the fabulous reports concerning gold in the Black Hills, to subject themselves to punishment for a violation of the laws of their country.

Your honorable body might with propriety make known the wishes of the people whom you represent, relative to the opening of the Black Hills, by a memorial to Congress, but while the treaty remains, I advise all citizens of this territory to keep off the forbidden ground. The law will be enforced, the dignity of the Government will be maintained, and all expeditions in that direction, in violation of law, will come to grief.

The message recommended that all territorial officers be required to keep offices at the capital.

Recommendation that the territorial library be placed in charge of the secretary of the territory.

Recommended a change in the judicial district boundaries, and a just apportionment of the membership of the Legislature.

TIMBER

Nothing will enhance the value of the prairie homestead so rapidly as the planting of trees and growth of timber. Besides the improved appearance and additional comfort secured, a few acres of timber adds largely to the cash value, and I earnestly appeal to every owner of the soil to plant trees, and respectfully suggest to your honorable body to encourage and foster the growing of timber by the enactment of wise and judicious laws, should your wisdom suggest that legislation is necessary on that subject.

No pardons had been granted. A recommendation was made that the election law be amended to compel the county instead of the territory to pay the expenses of sending for delinquent election returns.

Recommended that a law be enacted authorizing the governor to offer a reward for the detection of persons guilty of criminal practices who have evaded the usual methods of arrest.

A brief resume of national affairs is given, and regret expressed at the prevailing lawlessness manifested in some sections of the country, and Dakota congratulated at the prevailing tranquility and respect paid to law and order within her borders.

THE APPROACHING CENTENNIAL OF 1876

The Centennial Exhibition, which it is proposed to hold in Philadelphia in the year 1876, to celebrate and commemorate the one hundredth anniversary of American independence, is attracting the attention not only of the people of our own country, but of all the nations of the civilized world, and it is expected that all the Christian powers of the earth will be represented in this great jubilee on the occasion of this first centennial anniversary of the freest and greatest nation on earth.

While we cannot expect to compete with the states or even with the older territories in contributions to that vast collection, still we can contribute something, and I imagine that every patriotic Dakotan will desire that there be a Dakota department in this greatest of all world's expositions.

Impressed that such would be the wishes of our people, and in obedience to an invitation by the commissioners of the Centennial Exposition to all states and territories to appoint a board of managers, not to exceed five in number, to represent the interests of their respective constituencies in the said exhibition, I appointed, by proclamation, on the 16th of February, 1874, Hon. F. J. Dewitt, Hon. E. W. Miller, Hon. A. F. Shaw, Hon. Walter J. S. Traill, and Hon. W. A. Burleigh, to constitute the said board for this territory.

I respectfully request that your honorable body recognize this board of managers and clothe them with all the necessary authority to cooperate with the commissioners appointed by the President of the United States in giving Dakota a respectable representation in this great international exhibition.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

I have heard but little complaint of Indian depredations along our borders during the present year. The Indians on the reservations within Dakota seem to have been generally quiet and well behaved, and whatever may be the opinions of theorists on this problem, I am of opinion that the present peace policy being pursued toward these wild tribes is the best ever yet instituted, and that results are being developed highly creditable to those who are concerned in the control and management of Indian affairs.

While it is the duty of the general Government to look after the Indians and prevent their infringing the rights of citizens, it is our duty, so far as the citizens of this territory are concerned, to see that citizens keep off the reservations, and do not infringe those rights of the Indians, to maintain which the good faith of the Government of the United States is pledged.

Recommended that the Legislature memorialize Congress for an appropriation to build a capitol building and a penitentiary.

In conclusion. Being fresh from your constituencies, selected, it is to be presumed, from amongst all the people on account of your superior intelligence and acknowledged virtues, I bid you welcome, in their name, to these legislative halls, and invoke the blessing of Almighty God to give you wisdom and courage sufficient for every emergency that may arise in the discharge of the responsible duties upon which you are about to enter.

JOHN L. PENNINGTON.

Executive Office, Yankton, D. T., Dec. 7th, 1874.

The important laws enacted at this session were: Authorizing a bureau of immigration, indicating that Dakota would thenceforward make an earnest effort to secure a share of the increasing number of people who were annually migrating from the eastern states and from the countries of Europe to the western portions of the United States; a law reducing the rate of interest, under special contract, from 18 to 12 per centum; to provide for the safe keeping of insane persons, and for the education of the deaf, dumb, and of the blind; to codify the laws of the territory; to provide seed grain to settlers who are in need by reason of a failure of crops in 1874; also a law providing for the issue of $25,000 in territorial bonds for the relief of destitute, etc. (which was found impractical and it was not enforced); an act regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors; an act making the conveyance of a homestead not valid unless the wife joins in such conveyance (this was a law which it was alleged repealed the personal exemption law passed by the first Legislature in 1862, and which Congress, being appealed to, nullified the section relating to personal property exemptions. For particulars the reader is referred to the subjoined article, entitled "Exemptions," following these legislative proceedings).

Memorials to Congress covering numerous subjects were passed, the most important being those asking "for the early opening of the Black Hills to settlement," and "the organization of a new territory by a division of Dakota on the forty-sixth parallel."

A new legislative district apportionment law was enacted which contained the clause following:

In case a new territory shall be erected out of the northern portion of Dakota Territory, prior to the next general election, or before a new apportionment of legislative members is made, the councilmen and representatives herein assigned to Northern Dakota shall be and the same are hereby assigned as follows:

To the First District, one member of the Council and one member of the House of Representatives.

To the Second District, one member of the Council and one member of the House of Representatives.

The counties of Stanley, Cheyenne, DeLano, Mandan, Lawrence, Custer, Forsythe, Shannon, Lugenbeel, White River and Pennington shall be and are hereby attached to the Tenth Representative District for election purposes. (These counties were all in the Sioux Indian Reserve.)

Attention is directed most particularly to the closing paragraphs of this apportionment law as furnishing the most satisfactory and unimpeachable evidence of the early sentiment in favor of dividing the territory. Preparations were even made for the event by the highest authority in the territory, and no voice raised in the Legislature except that of earnest approval.

The Legislature adjourned on the 15th of January, 1875, after a full forty days' session. It had been somewhat remarkable as a business session, and the absence of many of the unpleasant features of former assemblies. The contested seat cases were decided upon their merits, as shown from the best testimony procurable; that from the Seventh District, in which Bismarck was situated, and which included about a thousand miles of the Missouri Valley, being the most difficult to adjudicate.

The opening of the Black Hills at an early day was anticipated by the enactment of a mining law, and the adoption of a memorial to Congress urging immediate action in removing the Indian title to the country, and setting forth its advantages as a mineral, forest and pastoral region.

There was considerable criticism indulged in by leading citizens of the northern part of the territory beginning prior to this session and continuing for a number of years after, alleging that the southern portion of the territory had selfishly deprived them of their just proportion of legislative members, delegates to conventions, etc.; but in justice to the south it must not be lost sight of that the members of the Legislature of this session, in common with the people of both sections at this time, and for about seven years following, confidently looked for a division of the territory, a measure that had been pending in Congress for at least two years prior to this session, and only awaited the time, then apparently rapidly approaching, when the northern half would gain sufficient population to meet the objections of Congress and be erected into an independent territory. A glance at the legislation of this session will reveal the sanguine expectation of the members of the body regarding the early dismemberment of Dakota, and in order to provide for the harmonious and satisfactory execution of the laws that would be affected by such division, provisions were incorporated in some of the enactments in anticipation of such a contingency before another Legislature would be assembled.

THE SOUTHERN BOUNDARY WEST OF THE MISSOURI

The southern boundary of Dakota Territory, east of the Missouri River, was the river itself from the mouth of the Big Sioux to the mouth of the Niobrara, or Running Water River, thence up that river to its junction with its most principal tributary, the Kcha Paha; thence up the Kcha Paha to its intersection with the forty-third parallel of north latitude; thence west on said parallel to the southwest corner of the territory.

This forty-third parallel boundary line between Dakota and Nebraska had not been marked prior to 1874. As the Government was contemplating an agreement with the Sioux Indians by which a portion of the western Dakota Indian country (and it was at that time all Indian country as far north as the Cannon Ball River), it became necessary to have a survey made authentically defining and marking the Nebraska-Dakota boundary from the intersection of the forty-third parallel with the Kcha Paha River west to the western boundary of the territory. The work was in charge of the United States—Department of the Interior, and was commenced at the crossing of the Kcha Paha, and continued thence west to the southwest corner of the territory. Chauncey Wiltse, of the Interior Department, civil engineer and astronomer, was in charge of the work, and George W. Owens, a land surveyor of Bon Homme County, one of his assistants. From Mr. Owens a very clear and satisfactory account of the work was obtained, which is herewith appended:

Our work was begun on the 25th of August, 1874, at Kcha Paha River and it was estimated that the distance to be traversed would be 224 miles, through supposed Indian country, terminating near the base of the Black Hills, with a party of twenty nine men. An order had been issued for a military escort, and General Ord was reported to have said that it would take 1,000 men to make it safe, and other authorities were also quoted claiming that wagons could not be gotten through the country. But before the time of need, the order for the escort was countermanded, and Mr. Wiltse determined to go on without an escort, with wagons (though a small escort was sent, at his service, to Spotted Tail Agency afterward). So by the 25th of August his party was across the Niobrara from the south, ready for the tramp. The party did not know but they were to "close" in the Black Hills, which the red men had so long guarded with jealous care. It was at this point on the Kcha Paha River, town 35, range 20, that I overtook the party and found it furnished with everything to make the trip safe and pleasant. Mr. Wiltse was a very pleasant gentleman, kind to men and animals, and of untiring perseverance, energy and courage.

After making astronomical observations to locate the starting point and marking it, we started westward over a country, where an engineer never before had occasion to carry a transit or take a "sight." And the mounds and mile posts looked rather strange in this wild country.

For the first fifty miles the country is interesting on both sides of the line (the 43d parallel), and Kcha Paha in view at the north, bringing the boundary diagonal across the south tributaries of the river. These tributaries are numerous, the best of water, and good grass land bottoms from one-fourth to a mile in width. This grass is the excellent blue joint, standing in many places waist high, very thick and fine, and extending over the country for many miles. A fine region for live stock. At the sources of these tributary streams, and near the Niobrara River, and extending almost from the mouth of the Kcha Paha west, is a strip of sand and other hills, that seem to be a sort of spur of the Great Sand Hills that extend along the Niobrara, almost or quite to its very source. But we found the country well watered, grass good, and road, with few exceptions, very good. We also found sufficient wood.

At a distance of sixty miles, about, we came to a stream flowing south to the Niobrara, along the west side of which the Great Sand Hills extend to the north to the head of the south fork of White River, and with their caps and rugged looks seemed impassable for our train. But through these Sand Hills we found a valley or "pass" (Owen's Pass now), supplied with excellent spring water, good grass, and sufficient wood, from ten rods to a mile in breadth, and extending over twenty miles due east and west, and making a remarkable road through these hills, which would otherwise have been almost impassable for a loaded train. Though the country for the next sixty miles is intermixed with sand, hills and valleys, lakes, etc., the road was good, supplied with good grass and most excellent water, though the white dry alkali lakes can also be found here. Handsome springs of purest water are quite numerous around the lakes and in the valleys.

At a distance of about one hundred miles we came upon some large lakes around which game was plenty; water fowl so numerous it would seem to be a place specially fitted for a true sportsman. Beaver, otter, and other furs are plenty on the small streams and about these lakes. Antelope, elk and deer are also plenty, and our party was supplied with the choicest meats in great abundance with little effort, and that of the most pleasurable and exciting nature. Bear abound in the sand hills, living on the sand cherries and hiding in the marshes. Sand cherries abound in great abundance, and for one whole half day we traveled over a continuous bed of them in their prime. They grow on a short, small twig of a bush, not over fifteen inches in length, and the fruit is about the size of a Catawba grape, growing so profusely that a handful can be taken at one time. They resemble the Catawba in color, the pulp being purple, very juicy, and quite as mild as nice grapes, being quite acceptable to the palates of our party—as well as to Mr. Bruin, the grizzly and cinnamon.

At a distance of about one hundred and twenty miles we came to high buffalo grass land and streams flowing into White River. Roads are fair, pitch pine skirting the bluffs, small ravines and runs, and after about forty miles more travel we struck the White River, just north of Spotted Tail's Agency. Spot's people were quiet for Indians, though busily inquisitive when they detect white men in their country, and eager to know what "their business is."

After crossing the White River the country is very level west, and on to the base of the Black Hills west until you strike Wyoming, and northwest until you strike the Cheyenne, which flows at the very base of the Black Hills.

After we had established the boundary, a distance of 224 miles along the 43d parallel, Spotted Tail and Red Cloud's agencies were found to be located as follows: Spotted Tail 164 miles west from starting point, and about seventy-five rods south of the boundary, Red Cloud about one hundred and eighty miles west and twenty-five or thirty miles south of the boundary, placing both agencies in Nebraska as now located, and south of the Black Hills about forty miles.

The land where the agencies are located has a high clay soil, furnishing buffalo grass and cactus, though good water, scrub pitch pine, with other timber. Game is abundant. The cactus are so thick that we could not wear the Indian moccasins, and they were sharp and strong enough to penetrate our thick leather shoes quite frequently, bothering our horses a great deal. This was characteristic of the country west of Spotted Tail's preserves.

When on the White River bluffs we could distinctly see Harney's Peak and the Black Hills, and when thirty miles out from Spot's we were near the Black Hills proper, and a two hours' ride would take you into the famous Black Hills country. It is a mistaken idea that the Black Hills are higher than the country east and south. In looking from the east and south you look over a high table of land until the Cheyenne River interrupts, dividing this table land from the Black Hills. This high land to the east and south is a high clay, grass rather poor, water both good and bad. But behold, as soon as your vision crosses the Cheyenne, you notice a marked change. Your first impression is that the land is burned prairie, with spots of grass left here and there. But on taking a second look you see that the blackened portion is heavy timber, and the reddish spots that of grass in the little "pockets," parks and valleys. I could distinctly see that the grass is the common red and blue joint. The timber, which in many places seems dense, appears to be pine in great part. Harney's Peak, and nearly all the highest peaks, appear much higher than the surrounding country, but the valleys, parks and lower land in the hills are much lower than on the outside.

Our party returned safely. Not annoyed at all by Indians. The cornerstone between Nebraska and Dakota, at the west, is 224 miles from the starting point on the Keha Paha, and very near the head of a fork of the Cheyenne, which the military authorities call Hat Creek and the Indians Milk Creek. I have talked with the great Minneconjon chief, Tall Bull, who has just come down from the Missouri country at Cheyenne for the purpose of making peace.

GEO. OWENS.

JUDGE KIDDER'S DECISION SHOWING INDIAN CLAIMS INVALID

The decision of the Supreme Court of the territory, having federal jurisdiction, rendered by Judge Kidder in September, 1874, settled the question as to the status of the country north of the tract ceded by the Yanktons in 1858. The case was one wherein W. L. Belmont, Clark et al. were respondents and John C. Bates et al. appellants. The action against defendants was for taking and carrying away a stock of merchandise of the plaintiffs which was situated near the Northern Pacific Railroad on the west side of James River (Jamestown). Appealed from the First District.

The defendants admitted the taking and carrying away, and justified it upon the grounds that they were commissioned officers in the United States army and on duty at Fort Seward; that liquors constituted a part of the stock taken by them and had been introduced by the plaintiffs; and that the country where the store and the stock were situated was Indian country, and subject to the Indian intercourse laws.

In its decision, which covers the ground of the Laramie treaty of 1868, the court says:

By the second article of the Laramie treaty, made April 29, 1868, called the Sherman Treaty, between the Government and various bands of the Sioux Nation of Indians, including the Yanktonais, it is stipulated that the "Indians henceforth relinquish all claims or right in and to any portion of the United States or territories except such as is embraced within the limits of this article, and described as follows: 'All land between low water mark on the east bank of the Missouri River and the 104th meridian, west from Greenwich; and bounded on the north by the forty-sixth parallel and south by the north line of Nebraska.'" Outside of these boundaries the Sioux ceded all claims to the soil east of the Missouri River; the effect of which was a surrender to the Government of all their claim to the land east of the Missouri and north of the Yankton Indian cession of 1858-59.

The land north of the Yankton cession had been held by the Yanktonais tribe of Sioux, and together with the Chippewa tract adjoining Red River of the North, included all or nearly all of Northern Dakota east of the Missouri River. These treaties had no bearing on the small reservations on the east side of the Missouri that had been set apart for the Sissetons, Yanktons, Santees and Winnebagoes.

CHAPTER LXXVI

THE CENTENNIAL YEAR OF OUR COUNTRY'S INDEPENDENCE

1876

CENTENNIAL YEAR OF INDEPENDENCE OF THE UNITED STATES—ARMSTRONG MAKES AN ADDRESS—SCHOOL STATISTICS—PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—TERRITORIAL CONVENTION TO ELECT DELEGATES TO NATIONAL CONVENTION—A SECOND CONVENTION TO NOMINATE A CANDIDATE FOR DELEGATE TO CONGRESS—THE DEMOCRATS CONVENE AT YANKTON FOR THE SAME PURPOSE—HAYES, REPUBLICAN, AND TILDEN, DEMOCRAT, WERE OPPOSING CANDIDATES FOR PRESIDENT—HAYES ELECTED—KIDDER, REPUBLICAN, AND SPINK, DEMOCRAT, WERE OPPOSING CANDIDATES FOR DELEGATE—KIDDER ELECTED—GOVERNMENT TO IMPROVE RED RIVER—GRASS-HOPPER CONVENTION AT OMAHA—LARGE IMMIGRATION TO BLACK HILLS IN SPITE OF MILITARY OPPOSITION.

Governor Pennington, by proclamation issued March 6, 1876, appointed Hon. S. L. Spink, Hon. George H. Hand, Gen. W. H. H. Beadle, Hon. M. K. Armstrong and Hon. F. J. Cross as a commission to prepare and deliver addresses at the Centennial Exposition on the following subjects: "History and growth of Dakota in wealth, population, manufacturing, agriculture, mining and live stock." This was in accordance with an invitation from the board of managers of the exposition. There is no record of any addresses having been given at the great fair by the speakers appointed, but the territory was officially represented during the exposition, in part, by Hon. M. K. Armstrong, the ex-delegate in Congress; and Dakota being then a frontier territory, the theatre of Indian troubles that attracted the attention of the entire country chiefly from the unprecedented battle of the Little Big Horn which resulted in the slaughter of General Custer and four companies of his famous Seventh Cavalry Regiment. It was therefore deemed wise and timely that an effort should be made to counteract a false impression that was gaining a place in the public mind concerning the material conditions of the territory; that they were not menaced by these disturbances; that they were prosperous, and the white settlements far removed from the regions of actual warfare, were perfectly safe, and their prosperity undisturbed by the Indians. A statement was therefore carefully prepared and generally circulated among the visitors at the exposition under Mr. Armstrong's immediate supervision, and was also extensively used by the ladies and gentlemen in charge of the Dakota exhibit, which was among the best of the territorial exhibits, showing the progress the territory had made during the fifteen years that had elapsed since its organization. The statistical portion of the statement is here reproduced:

DAKOTA'S CENTENNIAL ADDRESS

In this Centennial year of 1876 we find Dakota emerging from her past checkered history of frontier wars and pioneer settlements, possessing a population of 50,000 inhabitants, with a taxable wealth of $12,500,000, aside from a rich domain of 92,000,000 acres of unoccupled lands and 25,000 Indians, the great majority of whom are peaceably disposed and are rapidly being settled upon permanent reservations, where they are being instructed in the customs of a civilized people and in such pastoral and agricultural industries as they can easily perform and which will result, within a reasonable period, in placing them in a self-supporting situation. The present Indian troubles are confined mainly to the mountain districts of neighboring territories, hundreds of miles removed from the settled frontier of Dakota, and affect its industries and advancement as little as they do those of the great State of Pennsylvania, and create no alarm whatever.

We can well predict the future of this great territory when we glance back through forty-odd years of wilderness and find the wild wolf howling in the present streets of Chicago, and the red savage bounding upon the chase through his native forests in Wisconsin and Iowa. We have only to reflect that hardly ten years have elapsed since the first railroad found its way across the great West to the Pacific Coast, traversing the present States of Western Iowa, Nebraska and Colorado, which less than twenty years ago were declared by a great statesman in Congress to be unfit for settlement.

Only three years ago the first train of cars steamed into the Territory of Dakota; now there are 301 miles of running railroad in the territory, connecting with more than one thousand miles of navigable rivers. There are also 640 miles of telegraph lines in operation, and 2,450 miles of running mail routes, supplying 150 rural postoffices. There are seventeen newspapers published in the territory. Twenty-seven flourishing villages, aside from fourteen military posts and ten Indian agencies. The inhabitants are intelligent and enterprising, and have established churches and free schools in every organized county. There are 72 Sabbath schools, with 3,418 pupils, and 218 district free schools, with 8,343 scholars, in the territory. The taxes of the people are moderate, and the public lands are free to all under the homestead laws of Congress, and can be selected and located at five different United States district land offices in the territory. The population and wealth of the Black Hills district are not included in these statistics; but it is estimated that they have already a population of about seven thousand, although no relinquishment of the Indian title has yet been secured. However, the Indians have consented to grant a quit-claim of their title and the formal conclusion of a treaty is looked for before the doors of this splendid exposition of the accomplishments of our nation during the first century of its marvelous career shall be finally closed.

SCHOOL STATISTICS

The condition of the common schools in the territory in the centennial year appears in the report of Hon. J. J. McIntyre, territorial superintendent of public instruction, giving statistics made up on the last day of August of that year, as follows:

SUMMARY

Number of children reported over six and under twenty-one years of age.....	9,592
Number of male children reported over five and under twenty-one years of age....	4,811
Number of female children reported over five and under twenty-one years of age...	4,718
Number of children enrolled in school.....	4,784
Number not enrolled in school.....	4,808
Number of schoolhouses, as far as reported.....	208
Number of teachers employed.....	257
Number of male teachers employed.....	84
Number of female teachers employed.....	173
Number of organized districts.....	327
Amount received from county tax.....	$13,026.40
Amount received from district tax.....	19,396.39
Total amount raised for school purposes.....	32,472.79
Total amount expended for school purposes.....	32,804.29
Total amount of school property reported.....	32,978.52

The superintendent stated that not over two-thirds of the amount of school property was reported, as several counties having good schoolhouses gave no report of their valuation. Only a part reported the amount paid teachers, and a part the amount of cost per capita; therefore he had not included these items in his report.

POLITICAL CONVENTIONS

The year 1876 being a presidential election year with the important incident of a world's fair, named the Centennial Exposition (the first centennial of the young republic), there was an unusual interest taken in national as well as territorial political affairs. The National Republican Convention was held at Cincinnati, Ohio, in May, and as the territory was entitled to two delegates and two alternates, the republicans of the territory held a convention at Yankton on the 24th of May for the purpose of selecting them.

The convention was called to order by George H. Hand, chairman of the committee. J. A. Wallace, of Union County, was elected chairman of the convention, and L. D. F. Poore, of Bon Homme County, secretary. The Credentials committee consisted of John L. Jolley, of Clay; E. A. Williams, of Burleigh; G. P. Bennett, of Union; George H. Hand, of Yankton; and G. W. Harlan, of Turner. The Committee on Permanent Organization was composed of N. J. Cramer, of Yankton; J. M. Washburne, of Minnehaha; J. J. McIntyre, of Turner; W. W. Benedict, of Bon Homme; and R. M. Rasmussen, of Clay.

The Committee on Credentials found the following named entitled to seats in the convention:

Armstrong County, William Lelnard; Bon Homme County, A. J. Mills, W. W. Benedict, W. C. Grant, C. T. McCoy; Brookings, Buffalo and Barnes counties were not represented; Burleigh County, E. A. Williams, R. D. Ironwings, David Stewart, William Woods, M. Francis, George P. Flannery, John A. Stoyell; Brule County, M. H. Somers, proxy to J. L. Turner; Charles Mix County, Foster J. Wheeler, L. D. F. Poore; Cass County, proxy to W. H. H. Beadle, James S. Stark (proxy to G. W. Kingsbury), A. J. Howard (proxy to G. C. Moody), E. S. Tyler, J. Lowell, Jr., A. Plummer (proxy to G. W. Kingsbury); Clay County, A. J. Smith, W. J. Morgan, James Curtiss, Nels Hanson, George Morbeck, G. W. Woodworth, S. A. Ufford, H. A. Copeland, R. M. Rasmussen, John L. Jolley; Hanson County, John J. Lowell; Grand Forks County, O. S. Frumore, James Elton (proxy to Judson LaMoure); Grant, Hutchinson and Moody counties, not represented; Hanson County, M. T. Woolley, with two votes; Lake County, J. S. Smith; Lincoln County, G. W. Harlan, M. E. Holter, R. R. Moore, E. W. Owens, John Falde, M. W. Bailey, Ole Helvig, H. H. DeLong, A. O. Hubbard, C. A. Smith; Minnehaha County, J. M. Washburne, R. S. Alexander, E. A. Sherman, R. F. Pettigrew, L. Bothun, W. F. Kiter, Joseph Storm, John O. Walker; Pembina County, Charles Bottineau, Charles Cavalier, George W. Reed, Judson LaMoure (proxy to George H. Hand); Richland County, M. T. Rich, S. Stiles, A. Chizik, J. W. Blanding (proxy to W. H. H. Beadle); Stutsman County, George W. Kingsbury (proxy); Sully County, not represented; Turner County, Alfred Flagg, J. J. McIntyre, J. A. Childs, J. S. Williams; Traill County, Thomas Watts and Asa Sargent (proxy to G. C. Moody), county only entitled to one vote; Union County, George H. Freeman, G. P. Bennett, J. A. Wallace, W. McK. Cain, E. W. Laird, John Dahl, Ole Holthe, Martin Munsan, John Clementson, Jas. M. Adams, Lars Larson; Yankton County, A. L. Van Osdel, Louis Sampson, A. Simonsen, Daniel Shearer, J. R. Hanson, George H. Hand, T. W. Brisbane, N. J. Cramer, Fred Schnauber, E. Miner, John Lawrence.

A permanent organization was then effected by the selection of R. S. Alexander, of Minnehaha County, as president, and L. D. F. Poore as secretary.

The convention then proceeded to ballot for delegates to the national convention. The first ballot was an informal one, and resulted as follows: Alexander Hughes, of Union, 47½ votes; John Lawrence, of Yankton, 18 votes; John A. Stoyell, of Burleigh County, 20½ votes; L. D. F. Poore, 19 votes; J. P. Kidder, 34 votes; W. H. H. Beadle, 1½ votes; J. Lamoure, 5 votes; George H. Hand, 7½ votes; J. J. McIntyre, 12 votes.

A formal ballot was then taken, resulting as follows: Alexander Hughes, 48; J. P. Kidder, 40. Hughes was declared elected as one of the delegates, and a separate ballot being taken for the election of the second delegate, Alexander Mellench, of Cass County, received 50 votes, and was declared elected.

The vote for alternates resulted in the selection of George H. Hand, of Yankton, 62, and G. P. Flannery, of Bismarek, 53.

The convention then adjourned.

CONVENTION TO NOMINATE A CANDIDATE FOR CONGRESS

A second territorial republican convention was held in August following to nominate a candidate for delegate to Congress. The convention was held at Vermillion. Judge Kidder was the sitting delegate and a candidate for renomination.

The proceedings of the convention follow:

Pursuant to call, the delegates to the republican territorial convention assembled at the courthouse in Vermillion, August 24, 1876, and were called to order by George H. Hand, chairman of the territorial committee, who nominated Mark W. Bailey, of Lincoln County, for temporary chairman, who was duly elected. E. W. Laird, of Union County, was chosen temporary secretary.

The chair then, on motion, appointed the following committees:

On Credentials—A. F. Shaw, A. H. Barnes, G. C. Moody, John A. Stoyell, W. M. Cuppett, John L. Turner, E. B. Dawson.

On Permanent Organization—C. A. Lounsberry, J. A. Wallace, W. P. Dewey, Melvin Grigsby, C. B. Valentine, B. F. Campbell, T. S. Clarkson.

On Resolutions—George W. Kingsbury, W. H. H. Tate, E. B. Chambers, A. S. Jones, C. C. Spaid, M. D. Thompson, R. F. Pettigrew.

At the afternoon session the Committee on Credentials reported as follows, finding the following named persons entitled to seats in the convention:

Armstrong County, J. H. Burdick; Bon Homme County, John L. Turner, A. F. McCauley, D. P. Bradford, Charles T. McCoy; Brookings County, James Hauxhurst (by B. F. Campbell, proxy); Buffalo County, no credentials; Barnes County, G. G. Beardsley; Burleigh County, John A. Stoyell, Peter Manton, George P. Flannery, A. Gates, C. A. Lounsberry, N. F. Douglas, Robert McNider; Brule County, no credentials; Black Hills, R. D. Jennings, C. C. Spaid, E. L. Moon; Charles Mix County, T. S. Clarkson; Cass County, Peter Seims, L. C. Roberts, E. B. Chambers, J. E. Haggart, M. O. Haxom, E. S. Tyler; Clay County, John Hoyer, Philip Chandler, Nelson Miner, H. H. Vinton, E. B. Dawson, M. J. Talbot, E. W. Robbins, O. Oleson, William Sponage, M. D. Thompson, Hans Gundersen; Davison County, John Head (W. P. Dewey, proxy); Grand Forks County, Walter J. S. Trail, M. L. McCormick (by A. H. Barnes, their proxy); Grant County, no credentials; Hanson County, T. R. Kershaw; Hutchinson County, Thomas Maxwell, A. Sheridan Jones; Lake County, H. N. Luce (by R. F. Pettigrew, proxy); Lincoln County, J. S. Sands, John Falde, H. D. Fitch, William M. Cuppett, H. B. Hermanson, M. J. Hoogboom, A. O. Hibbund, M. W. Bailey, P. C. Parker, M. L. Dick; Minnehaha County, Amos F. Shaw, R. F. Pettigrew, B. F. Campbell, Thomas H. Brown, J. F. Roberts, M. L. Wood, C. Wilkinson, J. R. Richardson; Moody County, M. D. L. Pettigrew (by R. F. Pettigrew, proxy); Pembina County, Judson Lamoure, C. Cavalier (by A. H. Barnes, proxy), William Camp (by M. Grigsby, proxy), Joseph Daniels (by George W. Kingsbury, proxy); Richland County, M. T. Rich, R. Keating, William Root (by E. B. Chambers, their proxy), J. W. Blanding (William H. H. Beadle, his proxy); Stutsman County, George G. Beardsley; Sully County, no credentials; Traill County, Asa Sargent (by A. H. Barnes, proxy); Turner County, C. B. Valentine, Marshall E. Stewart, John Turnbull; Union County, James Adams, A. B. Parker, John Tucker, J. A. Wallace, E. W. Laird, W. H. Fate, John Dahl, Gilbert Larson, Duncan Ross, M. B. Quint, W. Duncan, M. B. Kent; Yankton County, Ole Sampson, Clark West, Erick Iverson, Daniel Wilcox, William P. Dewey, G. C. Moody, William Powers, John Lawrence, J. R. Hanson, G. A. Wetter, Herman Ellermann.

The report was adopted and the committee discharged.

Colonel Lounsberry, from the Committee on Permanent Organization, reported the following:

For president, Mark W. Bailey, of Lincoln County; for vice presidents, A. F. McCauley of Bon Homme, A. F. Shaw of Minnehaha, Daniel Wilcox of Yankton; secretaries, E. W. Laird of Union County, George W. Beardsley of Stutsman County.

The report was adopted.

The Committee on Resolutions made the following report:

Resolved, That we renew our allegiance to the principles of the national republican party which continues to maintain its position as the true friend of free government and the defender of its integrity; which embodies the great underlying principles upon which our Government is based, the preservation of which, unimpaired, insures the perpetuity of free institutions and the happiness and prosperity of the people.

Resolved, That we cordially indorse the action of the national republican convention at Cincinnati in selecting Hayes and Wheeler as the standard bearers of the great party of freedom.

Resolved, That we acknowledge with pride and satisfaction the valuable public services of our delegate to Congress, Hon. J. P. Kidder, and assure him of our continued confidence and esteem.

Resolved, That the interests of the people of Dakota demand the creation and organization of a separate territorial government for the northern portion of the territory, and we most earnestly urge upon the House of Representatives, at its coming session, to second the action of the Senate in passing the bill to organize the Territory of Pembina.

Resolved, That the early opening of the Black Hills of Dakota, to legal settlement and occupation, is demanded by every consideration of right and justice; that we have the greatest confidence in the great natural wealth of that section, believing its mineral deposits to be of the most valuable and extensive character, insuring profitable and permanent employment to thousands of industrious citizens, and furnishing a section where all the arts of civilization will find abundant room for employment.

The resolutions were adopted.

The convention then proceeded to an informal ballot for a candidate for delegate to Congress, resulting in seventy-five votes for J. P. Kidder and twenty-two votes for Alexander Hughes, of Union County, all the counties voting for Kidder except Yankton and Union.

A formal ballot was then taken, which gave to J. P. Kidder the votes of the following counties: Armstrong, 1; Bon Homme, 4; Brookings, 1; Barnes, 1; Burleigh, 7; Black Hills, 3; Clay, 11; Davison, 1; Grand Forks, 2; Hutchinson, 2; Lake, 1; Lincoln, 10; Minnehaha, 8; Moody, 1; Pembina, 4; Stutsman, 1; Traill, 1; Richland, 4; Turner, 4; Yankton, 11; Charles Mix, 1; Cass, 6; Hanson, 1. Total, 86.

Alexander Hughes, of Union, received the eleven votes of Union County.

The counties of Grant, Buffalo, Brule and Sully, which were organized at that time and were named in the call, were not represented in the convention.

Judge Kidder, being formally notified of his nomination, appeared before the convention and made a brief speech of acceptance.

The following nominations of territorial officers were then made: For superintendent of public instruction, W. E. Caton, of Union County; for superintendent of immigration, Fred J. Cross, of Minnehaha; for commissioner of immigration, James Holes, of Cass County; for territorial treasurer, E. A. Sherman, of Minnehaha; for territorial auditor, John S. Sands, of Lincoln County.

The convention then elected G. C. Moody chairman of the territorial central committee, and the following named were elected members of the same committee: C. A. Lounsberry, of Burleigh; E. B. Chambers, of Cass; L. D. F. Poore, of Bon Homme; John Head, of Davison; George H. Hand, of Yankton; Mark W. Bailey, of Lincoln; Alexander Hughes, of Union.

The convention then adjourned.

DEMOCRATIC TERRITORIAL CONVENTION

The democratic territorial convention was convened at Yankton in July, when the following proceedings were had:

The counties named in the call for this convention and the number of delegates assigned to each county were as follows:

Armstrong, 2; Bon Homme, 6; Brookings, 1; Barnes, 1; Burleigh, 5; Brule, 2; Charles Mix, 2; Cass, 4; Clay, 11; Davison, 1; Grand Forks, 2; Grant, 1;

Hanson, 2; Hutchinson, 2; Lake, 1; Lincoln, 10; Minnehaha, 6; Moody, 1; Pembina, 4; Stutsman, 1; Sully, 1; Turner, 4; Traill, 7; Union, 21; Yankton, 11. Total, 103.

The convention met at Yankton on the 6th of July, 1876, for the purpose of nominating a candidate for delegate to Congress and candidates for territorial offices. Dr. J. B. Van Velsor, of Yankton, was elected chairman, and Dr. J. F. Richmond, of Bon Homme, and Franklin Taylor, of Clay, secretaries. Abe Boynton of Lincoln, E. G. Armstrong of Bon Homme, H. C. Greene of Davison, F. M. Zeibach of Yankton, J. G. Botsford of Clay, George Stickney of Union, and M. S. Robinson of Turner were appointed a committee on credentials.

F. M. Zeibach of Yankton, George W. Kellogg of Union, M. Robbins of Clay, Barney Cole of Bon Homme, J. W. Turner of Turner, H. C. Greene of Davison, and Charles Berry of Lincoln were appointed a committee on resolutions.

J. R. Sanborn of Yankton, J. Kiplinger of Union, T. J. Sloan of Clay, Theodore Johnson of Turner, John Judas of Lincoln, H. C. Greene of Davison, and Thomas B. Eagle of Bon Homme were appointed a committee on permanent organization.

After a recess the Committee on Credentials reported sixty-five delegates present and entitled to votes in the convention.

The Committee on Permanent Organization reported in favor of Dr. J. P. Richmond, of Bon Homme, for chairman, and C. J. B. Harris, of Yankton, for secretary. The report was adopted.

The Committee on Resolutions presented the following report:

Resolved, That we cordially indorse and approve the platform and nominees of the national democratic convention, which assembled in the City of St. Louis on the 27th of June last.

Resolved, That in the nomination of the two distinguished statesmen, Samuel J. Tilden and Thomas A. Hendricks, for the offices of President and vice president of the United States by that convention it has given to the people ample assurance that the vices and corruption of the present administration will not be tolerated under democratic rule.

Resolved, That the practice of republican administrations of importing party favorites from the states to fill the Federal offices in the territories is in the highest degree detrimental to the best interests of the people of such territories, and we here announce as one of the cardinal doctrines of our creed that all the offices in the several territories should be filled from the citizens resident therein.

Resolved, That the course of President Grant in endeavoring to force emigrants to the Black Hills of Dakota to pass over the circuitous and barren routes from points on the Union Pacific Railroad, instead of the nearer and more desirable ones through Dakota, meets with our earnest condemnation and shows an utter disregard of our rights and interests on the part of the present administration, which should meet with prompt rebuke at the polls next November.

Resolved, That in our judgment it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to take measures at once to extinguish the pretended Indian title, and open up to white settlement the rich mineral, timber and agricultural land of what is known as the Black Hills of Western Dakota.

Resolved, That the policy adopted by the present administration towards the Indians of the western territories is radically wrong, and has borne its legitimate fruit in materially retarding the growth and prosperity of the West, and in encouraging the butchery of our men, women and children.

Resolved, That the policy of the Government should be active, unceasing and unsparing warfare against all hostile tribes until they are reduced to such condition that no fears of future atrocities need be apprehended on the part of the remotest settlers upon our frontiers.

Resolved, That we earnestly favor the organization of a new territory out of the northern part of Dakota, and that such organization will largely tend to enhance the interests of the people of both sections.

Resolved, That we hereby extend to all voters in the Territory of Dakota, who indorse the sentiments set forth in the foregoing resolutions, a cordial invitation to unite with us in the support of the ticket this day nominated.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted.

The next business being the nomination of candidates, G. W. Kellogg moved that the two-thirds rule govern in all nominations.

Barney Cole, of Bon Homme, moved to amend by substituting that a majority vote shall nominate. Mr. Cole's motion prevailed.

An informal ballot for a candidate for delegate to Congress was then taken with the following result: S. L. Spink, 27 votes; U. W. Weston, 13½; F. M. Ziebach, 10; H. S. Back, 7; Bartlett Tripp, 2; D. N. Inman, 1. A formal ballot was then had, which resulted: S. L. Spink, 42; U. W. Weston, 11; F. M. Ziebach, 12. Mr. Spink, having received a majority of all the votes, was declared the nominee of the convention for delegate to Congress.

The convention then proceeded and nominated the following candidates for territorial offices by acclamation: Territorial treasurer, J. L. Fisher, of Clay County; territorial auditor, Charles Berry, of Lincoln County; superintendent of immigration, Joseph Zitka, of Bon Homme County; commissioner of immigration, H. S. Back, of Cass County; superintendent of public instruction, E. W. Miller, of Union County.

The following Territorial Central Committee was then appointed: Yankton County, F. M. Ziebach; Union County, E. W. Miller; Clay County, T. J. Sloan; Turner County, J. W. Turner; Lincoln County, Abe Boynton; Bon Homme County, S. Simpson; Hanson County, F. B. Foster; Minnehaha County, Charles K. Howard; Brule County, M. H. Day; Stutsman County, D. M. Kelliber; Davison County, A. J. McDonald; Cass County, George Engle.

Mr. Spink was then introduced and made a brief speech accepting the nomination, whereupon the convention adjourned sine die.

After adjournment the central committee met and elected F. M. Ziebach chairman.

Interest in the election was largely modified by the proceedings incident to the opening of the Black Hills then in progress, and the unusual temper of the public mind caused by the wholesale slaughter of Custer and his troops at Little Big Horn. Mr. Spink made an energetic and creditable canvass of the territory, and being an able speaker, was able to draw the attention of many thousands of voters, but he failed to draw away from the republicans or make any break whatever in the republican columns, so that Judge Kidder received a very satisfactory endorsement, and was re-elected.

The election occurred on Tuesday, November 7th, not only in Dakota, but throughout the nation. The early reports indicated a close vote for President, both sides claiming it, the local democrats feeling so secure that they celebrated their victory by a torchlight procession. A long contest ensued as to whether Hayes or Tilden had won, Louisiana being the disputed state, which was finally given to Hayes by an electoral commission.

In the territory the republicans elected their ticket, Kidder having a majority over Spink of 3,682 in a total vote of 8,572. The official canvass gave the following figures by counties. The Black Hills had not been organized and did not participate in the election. It was estimated that there was a population of eight or ten thousand in the hills during the year 1876.

THE GRASSHOPPER PLAGUE OF 1876

Grasshoppers, or the seventeen-year locusts, had committed serious depredations upon the crops of the farmers of the Northwest during the years 1874, 1875 and 1876, and one consequence of the calamity was that in certain sections of the farming districts in a number of northwestern states the farmers had become so reduced in their possessions that many of them had applied to the counties for assistance. Others had appealed to their eastern friends for relief, and in other cases relief associations were organized in order to ascertain the extent of the suffering and devise means for relief. The plague continuing through so many consecutive years and being so widespread, it was finally deemed expedient to call a convention of the governors of the several states most seriously afflicted, to devise measures for relief and also to investigate and, if possible, discover some remedy for the scourge, which it was apprehended might result in the depopulation of some sections, and in all probability would have a deterrent effect upon immigration. Accordingly an interstate convention was held at Omaha, Neb., one of the states that had lost heavily, commencing on the 26th of October, 1876, which was attended by the governor of Dakota Territory (John L. Pennington), Governor Pillsbury of Minnesota, Governor Kirkwood of Iowa, Governor Osborne of Nebraska, Governor Hardin of Missouri, and Professors Riley, Williams, Thomas and Wilbur, and continued in session four days. The relief remedies suggested were altogether such as applied to the destruction of the young grasshoppers and the eggs deposited by the invading armies during the fall and spring preceding hatching.

Governor Pennington of Dakota could suggest nothing in the way of a remedy. He said he—

Had little confidence in any physical means of destruction. In the quantities in which they came into Dakota, piling inches deep on the ground, on the houses and trees, so thick that horses would hardly go through them, and even interfering with the running of railroad trains, they were too numerous to be caught in any kind of traps and killed. He thought best to encourage the growth of crops which could be grown and gathered in spite of the plague. Some men in Dakota said that the hoppers had always been there, and others that they were a new thing. From my own knowledge, for three years back, they had them every year. In July, 1874, he had never seen a better prospect for a corn crop than we had that year; but in the section from Yankton to Sioux City the corn was wholly and absolutely destroyed, and not a bushel was gathered for sixty miles. There was nothing left but part of the stalk. Nevertheless, the farmers had made a good crop of wheat, oats and potatoes. He was satisfied that the people of Dakota could prosper, even though the hoppers came every year, by planting only such grains as would be matured before the pests came.

The moral effect has been worse than anything else. The territory has been damaged ten times more by the panic than by the grasshoppers. Newspapers and other frightened people have done more harm than good by applying for aid in the East. He had stood out in 1874 as long as possible against the appeal for alms. The people who come to our territory are, as a rule, poor, and they need help anyhow; but the people of the territory were able to succor their own destitute farmers without outside aid. In 1874, after all the harm had been done and we had received the paltry sum of five or six thousand dollars, there were hundreds of thousands of bushels of surplus grain shipped out of Southern Dakota to Chicago. We are able to take care of our own.

In 1875 the hoppers were just as numerous as before, coming from the northwest and going southeast, but none came down, and I don't know of $10 damage being done. We had the biggest crops ever known.

Professor Riley asked whether they were not going in an opposite direction from those of 1874?

Governor Pennington replied:

No, they always go the same way. This year the damage to the wheat crop would not be 5 per cent, and the crop is very good. The farmers have gathered good crops of wheat, oats, and everything but corn, which varied from one-fourth to one-half a crop. By fall-breaking and early seeding, in the spring, wheat could be wholly saved without damage, and one object of this convention, I understand, was to reassure the people. The people of Dakota can feed themselves and the grasshoppers, too, and yet grow rich. In Dakota the grasshoppers were all foreigners, not natives, coming there full grown, and our people have had no experience with those that have just been hatched out. Our grasshoppers would eat the tops off the potatoes in the ground.

In regard to asking aid of the Government, the governor said:

I was rather disposed to be modest in my requests, the territory having a population of only 50,000, and being a ward of the Government. I believe the general Government might at least appoint a commission to investigate the subject. But I am not in favor of petitioning for financial aid; it will demoralize the people and make mendicancy honorable among some classes. My advice is for fall sowing and early sowing, relying on small grain crops, and our farmers could thus make a living until the scourge wears itself away.

When the governor made this address he was unaware of the damage done in the spring by the young hoppers hatched from the billions of eggs deposited in the plowed ground the season before. The very crops he recommends as season-proof against the insects were those certain to be totally destroyed by the infant insects before they obtained wings. When their wings came they flew to other lands, but by that time they had eaten off the young wheat and oats, leaving the later corn to be devoured by the full grown myriads who came later from the Northwest. It had been discovered that the only remedy the farmer had lay in discovering the nests in which the eggs were deposited and destroying the eggs, which were deposited in clusters similar in shape and abundance to a bunch of bananas, and from one to two inches in length, containing from twenty-five to forty eggs. This was done by pouring in coal oil and igniting it. The young hoppers were treated to a similar means of destruction, which proved effective. A shallow ditch was excavated in one end of the infected field (the eggs were invariably deposited in plowed ground), the young hoppers were then driven, beginning at the other end of the field, as you would drive a flock of ducks, the entire family and the neighbors being gathered together for that purpose, forming a file of destroyers armed with long brush, from one side of the field to the other. This column would then move forward toward the ditch in marching order, swaying their brush as they advanced, but maintaining as a rule a discreet silence. The little insects would hop before them toward their doom in the ditch, increasing in numbers as the procession moved forward, and finally landing in the ditch from which they could not escape; but to make assurance doubly sure a limited quantity of coal oil was then poured into the ditch, which was ignited, and the surrounding atmosphere for a time was heavy with the unfragrant odors of the burning insects. When this was intelligently and thoroughly done in time, the field operated upon was morally certain of producing a good crop in case the season proved favorable. The plague was not repeated in 1877, and at no time since has it visited the territory except occasionally in very limited areas. Eggs were hatched in 1877 as early as January, in localities where the sun had warmed and thawed the soil.

TO IMPROVE RED RIVER

An earnest effort was made by the settlers of the Red River Valley early in 1876 to induce Congress to make an appropriation to improve the channel of the stream, particularly that portion known as Goose Rapids, and an appropriation of $22,000 was asked for this purpose. From a statement that was included in the petition it was learned that during the season of 1875 the commerce of the river had been sufficient to justify the Government in appropriating the money needed for the work proposed. It was shown that there were nearly forty-nine million pounds of freight carried by seven steamboats and ten barges; over twenty-four thousand tons. There were also 7,690 passengers carried during the same season. This business had nearly all grown up since 1870 when one steamer was sufficient to meet the demands for transportation. The petition stated that the river was navigable for 550 miles—350 in the United States and 150 in Manitoba. This distance included the winding of the stream, and as much of this commerce was carried into Manitoba, it was urged that the Red River would lose it upon the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railroad to Winnipeg, then in process of building, unless the channel of the Red was so improved that steamboats could successfully compete for the carrying trade; and the manufacturing industries of the United States would be shut off from much of the rapidly growing business of that country owing to our inability to compete for the carrying trade.

IMMIGRATION

There was considerable immigration to the counties along the Red River Valley, and along the Northern Pacific Railroad from Fargo to Bismarck, in 1876, and also to the counties of Turner, Hanson, Hutchinson and the Firesteel Valley where the new Black Hills route had been laid from the James River to the Missouri at Crow Creek. It was observed that while there was a large emigration towards the hills shortly after the opening of 1876, an unexpectedly large number returned in the fall, complaining that the gold regions were overstocked with prospectors. As an illustration of the rush to the hills, we find that the number in the Deadwood region in the winter or spring of 1876 could not have exceeded fifty people, and by the Fourth of July following, at a celebration that occurred at the new Deadwood camp, there were estimated to be as many as five thousand in Deadwood. There were as many more scattered through the central and southern hills, which would justify the claim of ten thousand for the entire gold region.

SIOUX FALLS, MODERN

Sioux Falls is the most promising city in the territory, and bids fair to hold the lead until some development of the commercial interests of the Northwest shall demand a great central city on the Missouri River, which the sagacious and optimistic citizen believes may come about with the increase of population resulting in manifold larger production of the fruits of the farm, and the revival of steamboat transportation on the Missouri River. Until then it would seem that aided by its natural resources with a network of railroads connecting it with the great grain and live stock regions of the West and with the leading markets East, Sioux Falls must maintain the lead it has already secured. This may not be altogether due to the superior intelligence, public spirit and enterprise of its citizens, though in respect to these qualifications it has had from its earliest settlement the benefit of a community of broad-minded intelligent men who were able to fully appreciate the splendid substantial resources within and enviring the locality selected for building the city; resources not shared to the same extent by any other locality in the territory, and by very few in the Northwest. A similar statement, in a modified form, may be made of Minnehaha County, in which Sioux Falls is situated. Its earliest history is less a type of the early settlement of western towns for the past fifty years, than of the more remote struggles of the pioneers of Kentucky, Indiana and Illinois, those perilous periods when the war whoop of the savage was not an unfamiliar cry to the adventurous settler. The site of Sioux Falls was a favorite resort of the Sioux Indians from the earliest period of the exploration of the country; it is mentioned as such and for its wonderful cataracts, by Lewis and Clark, who learned of it when passing the mouth of the Big Sioux River in 1804, on their way to the Pacific. Dorion, their Sioux interpreter, gave them an account of it. These Indians held it in as great esteem and value as that of the Black Hills and were as reluctant to yield it, contesting its possession for many years after their tribes had ceded it to the United States. The first Sioux Falls village gave way, after a stubborn resistance against considerable odds, and was abandoned, including the slight settlement which had been attempted outside the village, and for some years thereafter was practically closed against immigration; the site of the village and a reservation of seventy sections of land surrounding, being withdrawn from settlement by the Government and occupied by a military post. The lands were restored to the public domain in 1860, the post abandoned by troops, and the fort and auxiliary structures became the first improvements of the future city. Then the earlier pioneers returned, and were quickly joined by scores of others, whose names and works have since figured prominently and successfully in the political, professional and commercial history of the territory. (By which we are reminded that the Daniel Boone's of our communities are the men of might and valor who usually retain the leadership in a community while health and life permit them to hold and use it.)

The people who settled in Sioux Falls the second time, or rather the settlers of the modern city, came in on horseback and in prairie schooners, while some patronized the line so well known to the ancients, carrying their own baggage suspended to a stout stick thrown over their shoulder. The distance to Sioux City was 110 miles; this was the nearest market point until the Dakota Southern was extended to Yankton, and the Sioux City & Pembina Railroad was extended to Portlandville, Iowa, which shortened the wagon hauling twenty miles. But the Sioux Falls pioneers were early possessed of an ambition to make a market town at home; and with this creditable purpose in view are found assembled in Allen's Hall one August evening in 1874, to discuss the railroad question. The hall was comfortably filled, and every auditor was in favor of a railroad, in fact the sentiment, as disclosed by a number of stirring speeches, was that Sioux Falls could never get beyond the village condition without one, and a resolution was adopted at the close of the meeting proposing

That the Town of Sioux Falls and Minnehaha County will donate to the first railroad that is completed to this place $50,000, provided said railroad reaches Sioux Falls by the 1st day of November, 1876.

This bait did not get a bite; but the railroad question remained at the forefront, and a year passed without any substantial headway being gained, except as it served to increase population and intensify public sentiment.

The next public meeting was held in the same hall on November 2, 1875. There were 200 prominent citizens of the county at the meeting, which organized by electing Melvin Grigsby chairman and C. W. McDonald secretary. The chairman made the initial address and appears to have about exhausted the subject, as no other complete review of the situation was attempted. The chairman stated in substance:

With a voting population of but 624, resources undeveloped, wealthy only in the possibilities of the future, Minnehaha County cannot expect any man or any body of men to build a railroad to Sioux Falls for no other consideration than the profits of the investment. It would probably take $1,200,000 to build, equip and put in working order a railroad from Sioux Falls to any railroad point, and in order for such a road to pay 10 per cent per annum, net, on the investment, the road must earn $400 per day over and above all expenses. Any man of sense knows that a railroad from Sioux Falls to any railroad point:

could not clear $400 per day for at least the first two years after its construction, consequently we cannot expect a railroad to Minnehaha County prior to the time that such a road would be a paying institution, unless we are willing to reimburse the builders of such road for the loss they would sustain in operating such road until it did become a self-sustaining enterprise.

Wicker, Meckling & Company offer to guarantee a road to Sioux Falls within one year from January next if Minnehaha County will raise $100,000 toward paying for it. One hundred thousand dollars seems at first thought an enormous sum for a county with at present only 73,946 acres of taxable land, of an assessed value of $179,343, and with personal property assessed at only $175,223, to pay for a railroad. But when we reflect that we have lost this year 20 cents per bushel on our 250,000 bushels of surplus wheat because we have no railroad (or $50,000), and that when a railroad is started for Sioux Falls with a reasonable prospect of an early completion, not only the land at present taxable, but every acre of land in the county will immediately increase at least one dollar per acre in value, then we begin to realize that it would be better for us to give even the enormous sum of $100,000 to get a road in one year than to do without it for three years.

How much Minnehaha County could give for a railroad, how to raise the funds, and where to bestow it, were, in the opinion of the speaker, "subjects for the meeting to consider."

J. D. Cameron then read letters from J. S. Meckling of the Dakota Southern, Hubbard of the Sioux City & Pembina, Drake of the Sioux City & St. Paul, and from the Minnesota Southern. The writer of each regretted his inability to attend the meeting, approved of its object, and presented the advantages of the proposed road in which he was interested.

On motion, a committee of five, consisting of E. A. Sherman, M. L. Wood, Joseph Roberts, J. L. Phillips and R. F. Pettigrew, was appointed to draft resolutions.

The committee having reported, a lively discussion ensued, wherein remarks were made by E. A. Sherman, Amos F. Shaw, M. L. Wood, Judge W. W. Brookings, Henry Smith, Newton Clark, R. F. Pettigrew, C. K. Howard, J. D. Cameron, C. W. McDonald, and M. Grigsby. Some were for encouraging one road, some another; some for the broad gauge, some for the narrow; and all for taking steps toward organizing a railroad company. The following resolutions were finally adopted:

Resolved, 1. That the interests of Minnehaha County, and of Sioux Falls in particular, demand the early constructing of a road connecting Sioux Falls with some railroad point.

2. That as citizens of Minnehaha County we will do all in our power to aid any railroad company that will guarantee the early construction and operation of a road to Sioux Falls, and that our preference is for a road directly from the east.

3. That a railroad can and should be constructed from Sioux Falls to a connection with some road east in season to carry off the crop of 1876.

4. That immediate steps be taken to organize a railroad company, survey a route, open stock books and solicit subscriptions.

5. That a committee of five be appointed to carry out the intention of the preceding resolution.

The chair appointed as such committee M. L. Wood, E. A. Sherman, R. F. Pettigrew, Joseph Roberts and Newton Clark, and on motion J. D. Cameron and M. Grigsby were added to the committee. The meeting then adjourned.

The committee appointed held a consultation the day following and agreed to organize a company under the laws of the territory, to be known as the Sioux Falls Railroad Company; one terminus to be at a point on the eastern boundary of Dakota, in the Town of Valley Springs; the other terminus at Yankton, passing through Sioux Falls, and Minnehaha, Lincoln, Turner, Hutchinson, and Yankton counties.

Without unnecessary delay, and carrying out the purport of the resolutions, the committee prepared and filed the following certificate of incorporation:

This certificate of incorporation certifies that the following articles of agreement, made and concluded this 10th day of November, A. D. 1875, at Sioux Falls, in the County of

Minnchaha, and Territory of Dakota, by and between Amos E. Shaw, Joseph Roberts, M. L. Wood, E. A. Sherman, J. D. Cameron, R. F. Pettigrew and M. Grigsby; witnesseth,

That, whereas, it is the intention of the above named parties to hereby and herein organize themselves into a legally incorporated railroad company under and by virtue of the provisions of the general incorporation act of Dakota Territory, approved January 6, A. D. 1868, entitled, "An act to regulate incorporations," under the name and style of the Sioux Falls Railroad Company, for the purpose of constructing and operating a line of railroad from a point on the eastern boundary of Dakota, in the Town of Valley Springs, in the County of Minnehaha, thence in a westerly direction through the County of Minnehaha to the Village of Sioux Falls, thence through the counties of Minnehaha, Lincoln, Turner, Armstrong, Hutchinson and Yankton to the City of Yankton,

Therefore, this corporation, which is hereby and herein formed and established for the purpose of constructing the above line of road, shall be named and known as the Sioux Falls Railroad Company, and the said line of road proposed to be built shall be designated as the Sioux Falls Railroad; and the amount of capital stock of this company shall be $500,000, which shall be divided into shares of $100 each, which shares of stock shall be subscribed for as is provided in section 80 of the aforementioned incorporation law of the territory.

In accordance with the requirements of section 87 of the incorporation act aforesaid, the incorporators herein named do hereby "establish a place of business on the line of said road," which shall be located at Sioux Falls, at the office of R. F. Pettigrew, and the same is hereby declared to be the temporary office of the Sioux Falls Railroad Company, until changed by the board of directors; and at said office of said company the first books for subscription of stock to the Sioux Falls Railroad Company shall be opened to the public on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1876.

(Signed and Sealed) Amos E. Shaw, Joseph Roberts, M. L. Wood, E. A. Sherman, J. D. Cameron, R. F. Pettigrew, M. Grigsby.

The Sioux Falls Railroad Company made a survey of the line of their railroad via Valley Springs to the Minnesota State line in the fall of 1875. Mr. Wood, of Valley Springs, was in charge of the party; Cyrus Walts, of Sioux Falls, was the compassman. Books of subscription to the capital stock of the company were opened early in 1876, and over two thousand shares of stock subscribed.

Early in January, 1876, the St. Paul & Sioux City Railroad Company proposed to build a branch from Worthington to Sioux Falls for a bonus of $100,000. At a public meeting held in Sioux Falls in January, 1876, to consider the proposition, it was resolved to give $50,000; that $100,000 was more than the village could donate. In September following the same company proposed to build from Sioux Falls to Worthington for a bonus of $35,000 cash, and $15,000 more in right of way and depot grounds. The proposition was accepted, and work of construction was entered upon and completed in 1878. The event was duly chronicled by the Pantagraph newspaper of July 31, 1878, as follows:

Without any gush or hurrah, Sioux Falls last evening received a visit from a locomotive, the track having been laid during the day to a point between the two mills. The first warning of the presence of the long-looking engine was a couple of toots from its whistle—the first sound ever made by a steam whistle in Sioux Falls. Today the track will be completed to the depot grounds, the rails being simply laid in order to furnish a road which may be used with care for bringing the train into the town so that the company can fulfill its contract for commencing transportation of the mail August 1st. The carriage of passengers all the way through to this place will also commence at once. Almost any other community under the sun would enthuse over such a piece of fortune as has finally reached us; but our people are very matter of fact, and it is glory enough for them to know that the road has got here. We are all wonderfully glad, however, that the iron horse has got here, because it is what Sioux Falls has been looking forward to for a long, long time.

Sioux Falls had its first telegraph line from Worthington, Minn., November 21, 1876. It was the forerunner of the first railroad.

The Sioux Falls branch of the Southern Minnesota Division of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad was completed to Sioux Falls in November, 1881, and a spur from that track was laid to the penitentiary grounds. The Milwaukee company was now the owner of the Southern Minnesota and the Sioux City & Pembina, and the junction of the two lines was made at Egan, Moody County.

During the summer of 1886 the Great Northern, under the title of the Wilmar & Sioux Falls Division of the Duluth & Denver Railroad, was approaching the eastern border of the territory, with Sioux Falls as its objective point. H. T. Corson, of Sioux Falls, was a director of the local company and had attended a meeting of the parent company at Willmar, where plans were substantially agreed upon to extend their line into Dakota without unnecessary delay, and that in the course of a year or so after passing into Dakota it will move on to a connection with the Union Pacific, and with Denver as its objective point, going out of Dakota by way of Yankton.

The Illinois Central Railroad was built from Cherokee, Iowa, to Sioux Falls in 1887. Cherokee was then a town of 2,000 population. Sioux Falls claimed 7,000. In connection with the incident of signing the agreement for the Central, Mr. E. A. Sherman, of Sioux Falls, who had been instrumental in securing the road, said that Sioux Falls will have paid $175,000 for all its five railroads, and would, with the completion of the Central, have all the railroads its interests demanded. That manufactories would pour in because of the city's railroad facilities.

LEGISLATURE 1877—GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE—BLACK HILLS CEDED BY THE SIOUX—MUCH PRELIMINARY LEGISLATION—SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' REUNION—JOHN B. RAYMOND APPOINTED MARSHAL—GRASSHOPPER PROCLAMATION—A DAY OF FASTING—THE WHEAT FIELDS OF NORTH DAKOTA—THE DALRYMPLE FARM—IMMIGRATION, CROPS, ETC.—COUNTIES ORGANIZED.

The twelfth session of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota convened at Stone's Hall, Yankton, the capital, at 12 o'clock noon, Thursday, January 9, A. D. 1877, and organized as provided by law.

The Council was called to order by Arthur Linn, of Canton, chief clerk of the last Council. Prayer was then offered by Rev. Joseph Ward, of Yankton. The clerk then called the roll, when the following members answered to their names: First District (Union County), J. A. Wallace, William Duncan; Second District (Clay County), Nelson Miner, Hans Gunderson; Third District (Yankton County), Walter A. Burleigh, Joel A. Potter; Fourth District (Bon Homme, Hutchinson, Armstrong, Hanson and Davidson), A. J. Mills, Bon Homme; Fifth District (Lincoln and Turner counties), C. B. Valentine (Turner), Mark W. Bailey (Lincoln); Sixth District (Minnehaha, Lake and Moody counties), R. F. Pettigrew, Minnehaha; Seventh District (Cass, Richland, Ransom, Barnes [heretofore known as Burbank] and Stutsman counties), H. I. Back (Fargo) (this seat was contested by Alexander McHench, of Fargo, who was given the office); Eighth District (Traill, Grand Forks and Pembina counties), Judson Lamoure, Pembina; Ninth District (Burleigh and Stevens counties), Robert Wilson, Bismarek.

Nelson Miner, of Clay, was elected temporary president of the Council, and J. R. Hanson, of Yankton, temporary secretary.

The Council then permanently organized by the election of the following officers: W. A. Burleigh, of Yankton, president; J. R. Hanson, secretary; Silas W. Kidder, of Clay, assistant secretary; Arthur Linn, of Canton, engrossing clerk; Frank J. Washabaugh, of Yankton, enrolling clerk; P. McMahon, of Burleigh County, sergeant-at-arms; James Stack, of Union County, messenger; Felix Dillger, of Yankton County, watchman, and S. Peterson, doorkeeper. Rev. James Buchanan, of the Yankton Baptist Church, was elected chaplain. Council then adjourned.

At 12 o'clock, noon, the House was called to order by Charles F. Mallahan, of Union County, chief clerk of the last House, who called the roll of members as furnished by the secretary of the territory, when the following members answered to their names:

First District (Union County), James M. Adams (McCook), John Sellberg, D. S. Stewart, A. L. Boe; Second District (Clay County), Hans Myron (Lincoln), Franklin Taylor (Vermillion), Darwin M. Inman (Vermillion), A. G. Hopkins; Third District (Yankton County), Erick Iverson, Clarence Van Tassel, F. M. Ziebach, W. H. H. Beadle, Henry A. Burke; Fourth District (Bon Homme, Hutchinson, Armstrong, Hanson and Davidson counties), Digs, Carides Hagle (Hutchinson), Charles Maywell (Bon Homme); Fifth District (Lincoln and Turner counties), William Dunham (Lincoln), John Falde (Canton); Sixth District (Minnehaha, Lake and Moody counties), John Thompson (Minnehaha), S. Soderstrom; Seventh District (Cass, Richland, Ransom, Barnes [heretofore known as Burbank] and Stutsman counties), John Q. Burbank (Wahpeton), Martin O. Hexom (Cass), Dennis M. Kelleher (Jamestown) (seat awarded to Burbank in contest); Eighth District (Traill, Grand Forks and Pembina counties), Asa Sargent (Traill); Ninth District (Burleigh and Stevens counties), Edmund Hackett (Bismarck); Tenth District (Charles Mix, including the Yankton Indian Reservation, and Buffalo, Brule, Hyde, Hughes and Sully counties), Thaddeus Stevens Clarkson (Yankton Agency); Eleventh District (Brookings, Hamlin, Deuel and Grant counties), George Spencer Codington (Medary, Brookings County).

The counties of Stanley, Cheyenne, Delano, Mandan, Lawrence, Custer, Forsythe, Shannon, Lugenbeel, White River and Pennington were attached to the Tenth Representative District for election purposes. These counties were all a part of the Sioux Indian Reservation, west of the Missouri River, and the treaty ceding the Black Hills, which covered a portion of the reservation, was not ratified by the Senate until after the adjournment of this Legislature.

Chief Justice Shannon administered the oath to the members.

The House then proceeded to a permanent organization by electing the following officers:

Speaker, D. C. Hagle, of Hutchinson County; chief clerk, T. A. Kingsbury, of Yankton County; assistant clerk, M. B. Kent, of Union County; engrossing clerk, H. R. Blanding, Richland County; enrolling clerk, H. M. Luse, Lake County; doorkeeper, H. P. Nielson, Clay County; sergeant-at-arms, A. B. Fockler, Lincoln County; messenger, Ole Lien, Lincoln County; watchman, Haldo Sater, of Yankton County. Rev. Gilbert Higgs, of Yankton County, was elected chaplain.

The House then adjourned after appointing committees to inform the Council and governor of their organization.

Dr. C. W. Meyer and Gen. A. R. Z. Dawson, of Deadwood, were given the freedom of the floor during the session, with the privilege of promoting legislation for that section, as representative delegates.

The governor's message was delivered to the joint convention on the second day of the session, and read by the chief clerk. The document was subdivided into a number of subjects, most prominent being the grasshopper plague, which had troubled the farmers for the past two years and would probably do more or less damage the present year, as the females had deposited their eggs in the plowed ground the season previous. The governor advised that the farmers should not get discouraged, that the neighboring territories and states had been and were then suffering from the same pest as much, if not more than Dakota. New countries were apt to have afflictions of the kind, but they would finally disappear. It was not probable that there would be any trouble from this source for many years to come. The message recommended that the farmers plant early of small grain which would bring the harvest ahead of the grasshopper raids, and on the whole to have faith in Dakota soil, refuse to give up, and to help one another during this season of short crops to those things necessary to maintain health and strength and reasonable comfort. He would have the Legislature authorize the counties to afford assistance where absolutely necessary, and particularly to provide seed grain where needed, the territory to be reimbursed from the harvested crop.

Finance and taxation were practically treated, and a lower rate of interest was advocated. High rates were a detriment to the territory, conveying the impression that securities were of a doubtful and unstable character. The tendency of counties to issue warrants in excess of their means was seriously treated. The evil of this custom was seen in the depreciated value of unredeemed warrants, and the consequent excessive charges the county was put to in its expenditures. It was a ruinous policy and would lead to bankruptcy if persisted in. The territory and the counties should get on a cash basis as early as possible by refusing to make any appropriations unless there was promise of cash in the treasury to justify it, and the counties should be prohibited from issuing warrants in excess of their revenues. The delinquent tax lists were largely responsible for excessive prices paid by the county and territory.

A liberal railroad corporation law was urged. The territory was in need of railroads in its work of settlement and development, and the railway companies would need much encouragement to begin in this new unsettled country. Dakota at the present time has little direct inducement to offer to railway builders, but the outlook for a rapid increase of our agricultural population was encouraging. With more producers will come more produce and a surplus to send to market. When we reach that condition we shall be out of the woods, and railroads will not need a bonus to induce them to build through the territory. Until then we should use good business judgment in providing laws for the government of labor employing industries, and not discourage them from coming by unwise and meddling legislation. Railway men are studying this phase of our legislation and are influenced by it. They can do much in assisting us in our efforts to secure population. Coupled with this subject is the proposition to make a greater effort to secure a larger and a proportionate share of the annual immigration for Dakota. Our immigration laws need revising and made more practical and effective. The present immigration bureau is a cumbersome and unwieldy affair, and should be replaced by a system that demands less machinery. The bureau system should be abolished, and the direction of this most important feature of territorial policy entrusted to one competent commissioner backed by an appropriation that will afford such expenditures as are necessary to secure the best results. Dakota is surrounded by a number of strong and able competitors, who have an abundance of money to maintain them. We must not expect to compete with our neighbors on the basis of merit and superior advantages at this time, nor until we have secured many additional thousands to cultivate our fertile lands. We must be prepared to spend some money and spend it judiciously. With the aid of our new Black Hills possessions, our immigration agents will find their labors less arduous. Our agricultural advantages can be shown in a much more attractive light aided with our valuable mineral resources.

The probable addition of the Black Hills to the jurisdiction of our territorial government requires the enactment of a number of new statutes, or the amendment of present ones, quite necessary. Whatever can be done by legislation by your honorable bodies to promote the establishing of civil institutions in the hills, should cheerfully be done, for the people there will have the same rights to the protection and advantages of our laws that we on this side of the Missouri enjoy.

The effort to establish a new territory to be called Huron, which has appeared in Congress, proposes to make the Black Hills the basis of the organization, but as it calls for a division of the present territory on a north and south line, the great majority of our people will oppose it on the ground that it would only intensify the difficulties complained of in the present territory. It will be able to prove its own impracticability before Congress will give it much consideration, and therefore speculation regarding it at this time would be time and space unprofitably expended.

The subject of common schools, the maintenance of the deaf, dumb, blind, and insane, were brought up and a recommendation made that the Legislature provide by law for the care and custody of such unfortunates in the institutions of adjoining states.

At the session of the Legislature held in 1874-5 a law was enacted changing the time of meeting of the Legislative Assembly of the territory from the first Monday of December to the second Tuesday of January, and provided that the next biennial session of said Legislative Assembly should be held commencing on the said second Tuesday of January, 1877, and biennially thereafter on the second Tuesday of January.

STUTSMAN COUNTY CONTEST

A notable contest for the seats in the Council and House from the Seventh Council and Representative District, which included the counties of Cass, Barnes, Richland, Stutsman and Ransom, was an interesting feature of this session. The contestants in the Council were Hon. H. S. Back and Hon. Alexander McHench, both of Fargo, the former the sitting member; and in the House Hon. D. M. Kelleher, of Stutsman County, and Hon. John R. Burbank, of Richland County. The contest was based on alleged fraudulent votes in Stutsman County to the number of 100, which gave the election and the seats to Back and Kelleher. The first report of the Elections Committee of the House made on the twenty-fifth day of the session, was favorable to the sitting member, and Mr. Kelleher was confirmed in his place by a vote of fourteen to ten. Mr. Burbank was permitted to continue his contest, and about a week later, backed by new evidence, he was given the seat by a majority of one.

In the Council the contest between Back and McHench continued until near the close of the session, February 15, when Mr. McHench was seated by a vote of six to five. The Legislature appears to have acted tardily in each of the contests, and it is altogether probable its committees were unable to earlier procure the facts regarding the election in Stutsman County, which were sufficient to vindicate the claims of the contestants. These facts came out later in a criminal prosecution before the District Court at Fargo, before which the judges and clerks of the election were arraigned on a charge of permitting fraudulent voting and making false returns. Two of the judges and two of the clerks had been indicted, and on the trial made a full confession and besought the mercy of the court. They were sentenced to short terms of imprisonment in the jail at Fargo. The evidence and confessions of the election officers disclosed that in accordance with a plan arranged by Mr. Kelleher and Mr. Miller, of Jamestown, four or five sheets of fictitious names were prepared before the election, and at the same time a sufficient number of tickets were fixed up to secure the election of Mr. Back to the Council and Mr. Kelleher to the House. On the day of election, during the temporary absence of two of the judges from the room, seventy-eight of the bogus tickets were put into the ballot box and three sheets of the names were inserted in the rolls to correspond. After the vote had been counted, the returns from other counties indicated that there was danger of Kelleher's defeat, and he and Miller brought the ballot box back to the clerks, who took out thirty of the tickets which had been cast for Burbank, the opposing candidate, and changed them. The judges were induced to sign a new certificate of the election returns to correspond with the result. The legal investigation disclosed that while there were 158 votes returned, 78 were entirely bogus, and about thirty were cast by persons who had passed through on railroad trains.

OPENING THE BLACK HILLS

The Black Hills had become an important factor in the commercial, domestic, industrial, and political affairs of the Territory of Dakota, at the opening of the legislative session of 1877. That country was now inhabited by eight or ten thousand citizens of the United States. Two years earlier, when the Legislature adjourned, the Government was engaged in an effort to secure from the Sioux Indians a cession of the hills country, where gold had been discovered, but the plan had made but slight progress at that time. White people had been interdicted from entering and settling in the country in 1875, and those who did so surreptitiously were in great part discovered and removed by military forces; but during the year 1876, comparatively no effort had been made to obstruct immigration, and the result was that the gold bearing districts of the hills were quite densely populated. President Grant, in explanation of the change in the exclusion policy of the Government, in his message to Congress of 1876-77, says:

A policy has been adopted towards the Indian tribes inhabiting a large portion of the territory of the United States which has been humane and has substantially ended hostilities in the whole land, excepting in a portion of Nebraska, Dakota, Wyoming and Montana, the Black Hills region and approaches thereto. Hostilities there have grown out of the avarice of the white man, who has violated our treaty stipulations in his search for gold. The question might be asked why the Government has not enforced obedience to the terms of the treaty prohibiting the occupation of the Black Hills region by the whites. The answer is simply this: The first emigrants to the Black Hills were removed by troops, but rumors of fresh discoveries of gold took into that region increased numbers. Gold has actually been found in paying quantities, and our efforts to remove the miners would only result in the desertion of the bulk of the troops that might be sent there to remove them. All difficulty in this matter has, however, been removed, subject to the approval of Congress, by a treaty ceding the Black Hills and approaches to settlement by citizens.

In the meantime, September, 1876, an agreement had been consummated with all the tribes of the Sioux Nation, save those that occupied an attitude of hostility and were as a consequence outlawed, under which the Indian claim to the Black Hills had been extinguished, but this treaty was not in effect during the session of the Legislature of 1877, not having been ratified and confirmed by Congress. Nevertheless, the Legislature assumed that the treaty or agreement would be ratified, and in its proceedings treated, practically, the hills people as a part of the Territory of Dakota politically. The hills had no members of the Legislature, as a matter of course, but its demands and interests were looked after by a number of able lobby members, and all necessary legislation was enacted to set the machinery of organized government in motion as soon as Congress signified its assent to the treaty, which came on the day of the Legislature's final adjournment.

Under the citizenship or election laws of the territory, the hills contained but very few citizens comparatively who could claim a legal residence in the territory at the time the treaty was ratified, and were not therefore eligible to vote or hold office. Under these circumstances it became a perplexing and delicate matter to provide for the organization of its counties by the appointment of the necessary officers to inaugurate the local government. Under the law then in force a residence of six months in the territory and thirty days in the county, was required to entitle a person to vote and hold office; therefore, in order that the lawful organization of the hills counties could be made with no unnecessary delay, which was urgently demanded by conditions and by the law-abiding people of the hills, the governor, in appointing the first officers, endeavored to select only such as had resided in the territory the required time, paying little attention to the county qualification. He may have ignored the territorial residence in one or two instances in cases where the office was of paramount importance and apparently unanimously supported by the hills people; it appeared upon trial that two or three of his selections from the eligible class were not judicially bestowed.

The counties of the hills were included in a separate Judicial District and an associate justice assigned thereto.

The newly appointed officers of these counties were succeeded in the following October by a set of officials elected by the people, all of which matters are set forth in detail in the chapters regarding the opening of the hills country, contained in this work.

LAWS OF THE TERRITORY REVISED AND COMPILED

The laws of Dakota had been revised and compiled during the preceding two years by a commission authorized by an act of 1875, to-wit: Chief Justice P. C.

Shannon, Associate Justice Granville G. Bennett, and Hon. Bartlett Tripp, who had selected Gen. W. H. H. Beadle as secretary. This was the first revision the laws of the territory had undergone since the beginning of law-making in Dakota, and a very creditable work was performed. The revised codes were adopted by the Legislature of 1877 and published together with the laws enacted at the same session. All the general statutes of the political code, as well as the civil and penal codes, the probate laws and the justices of the peace code, were much improved by this legislation, which gave to Dakota a code of laws and a system of jurisprudence not surpassed for excellence and completeness by any state or territory of the Union. General Beadle had been elected a member of the House from Yankton County mainly because of his familiarity with the new code, which had been quite largely his handiwork as secretary of the code commission. He also proved one of the most valuable members in framing the new legislation of the session.

The ability and acumen of this legislative body was generally recognized by the people of the territory, and in some respects it fixed a legislative standard that subsequent assemblies emulated with profit to the people; or disregarded at the risk of popular disfavor.

Governor Pennington sent the following nominations to the Territorial Council, January 31st, namely: Fred J. Cross, of Minnehaha County, commissioner of immigration; W. E. Caton, Union County, superintendent of public instruction; John S. Sands, Lincoln County, territorial auditor; E. A. Sherman, Minnehaha County, territorial treasurer. The appointments were all confirmed.

On the sixth day the governor's message was taken up by sections and referred as follows:

Grasshoppers, Committee on Education. Finance and Taxation, Committee on Finance. Interest on Money, Committee on Finance. Black Hills, Committee on Territorial Affairs and Counties, Highways, Bridges and Ferries. Immigration, Committee of Territorial Affairs. Railroads, Committee on Railroads. Codification of the Laws, Committee on Judiciary. Indians, Committee on Territorial Affairs. Public Buildings, Committee on Expenditures. Huron Territory, Committee on Engrossed Bills. Relief Bonds, Committee on Judiciary. Public Schools, Deaf and Dumb, Blind and Insane, Committee on Education. Arms, special committee of one to be appointed by the president of the Council.

The Black Hills Legislative District had not been organized at the time this session was held, but was provided for by this Legislature. Dr. C. W. Meyer and A. R. Z. Dawson, who had been sent from the Black Hills to represent the mining sections as lobby members, were invited to address a joint session of the Legislature, which they did, Doctor Meyer making a very valuable and exhaustive address regarding the mineral resources. George Heinckle, another Black Hills representative, and a gentleman of scientific attainments in exploring and developing mineral sections, also delivered a valuable address.

BLACK HILLS COUNTIES

The Legislature of 1877 made a new Judicial District of the Black Hills country and assigned Judge Bennett, of the First District, to the new district.

The Legislature re-defined the boundaries of the judicial districts of the territory, in order to supply courts to the Black Hills people. The first Judicial District heretofore embracing Clay County and the Big Sioux Valley to and including the Wahpeton and Sisseton Indian Reservation, was transferred to the country west of the Missouri River. The enactment declared:

All that portion of the Territory of Dakota west of the right bank of the Missouri River at low water mark, and south of the 46th parallel of north latitude, except the counties of Todd, Gregory, Lyman, and Presho, and so much of Boreman County as lies south of Grand River, shall constitute the first judicial district.

JOHN L. TIERNON, FORT RANDALL
Speaker of the House of Representatives in March, 1862

The Legislature also made provision for organizing four counties in the hills, contingent upon the ratification of the Black Hills treaty, then pending by Congress. The same contingency applied in the case of the Judicial District, for this legislation by the Territorial Legislature was had before the Black Hills country had become a part of political Dakota. The counties of Lawrence, Pennington and Custer were constituted the Thirteenth Council and Representative District, and were given one member of the Council and two members of the House of Representatives; and the counties of Charles Mix, including the Yankton Reservation, Brule, Hyde, Hughes, Buffalo and Sully, were attached to the Thirteenth District for election purposes. Provision was made in the apportionment act by which the members allowed the Black Hills should be apportioned to other counties in case of a failure of the treaty.

Anticipating the opening of the hills, the Legislature enacted a law concerning mines, which defined the length and width of quartz lodes; and the duties and rights of the discoverers of mineral bearing veins. It also provided for filing location certificates and what they should contain; the amount of work necessary to be done annually in order to protect the claimant in his property, and much more of the details necessary to be observed by miners in locating quartz claims. It was presumed that the law conformed to the statutes of other mining territories or states, and was probably drawn by practical miners, some of that profession being members and officers of the legislative body but not at the time engaged in mining.

The Black Hills country had not at this time reached that stage of settlement and organization when it occurred to any of its pioneers, whose time was largely taken up in avoiding the military police, that a delegate to the Legislature could be of service.

(The reader is referred to the separate chapters regarding the Black Hills for the legislation, organization of counties, and other matters affecting that section during 1876-77.)

TODD AND BURLEIGH

Both General Todd and Dr. W. A. Burleigh were out of place in the territorial legislatures of which they were members, having previously been members or delegates in Congress. Their attitude was that of "fallen chiefs," still living but shorn of their popularity and power. Their fellow-members appeared to feel that they had humbled themselves to accept a seat in the Territorial Legislature, and endeavored, by thrusting these honors upon them to atone for the cruel fate which had interrupted the forward progress of their early ambition. They ruled their legislative assemblages as a schoolmaster ruled his pupils, and finally, they were petulant, could not patiently brook having their rulings called in question, and while Todd tried to remove the capital from Yankton owing to some fancied grievance, Burleigh threw up the presidency of the Council because his rulings were disputed, and sent his resignation to the governor as a member, but as the session was near its close he was induced to withdraw it. A member of the House in 1862-63 named Harlan, from Clay County, had been a member of Congress from Missouri and was quite an able man. He was elected speaker, and managed to split the House into two bodies, the revolutionary body electing another speaker. Seventeen days elapsed before the cause of the division was removed, and when the bodies united a new speaker was elected as one of the terms of the compromise.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS REUNION

A reunion of the surviving soldiers and sailors, residing in Dakota, who had participated in the Civil war on the side of the United States, was held at the capital of the territory on the 4th of October, 1877. An organization was effected. Gen. Charles T. Campbell, of Scotland, a veteran of the Mexican war as well as a gallant officer of the Union army, was elected president. Addresses were made by Gen. W. H. H. Beadle, Maj. Alexander Hughes, and others. One purpose of the organization was to secure the names and residence of any soldier, soldier's widow, or soldier's orphan, in the Territory of Dakota. Attending this reunion were the following veterans of the great conflict: M. A. Baker, Millard A. Baker, Company G, Second New York Cavalry; L. U. Barron, Company L, Fourth New York Artillery; Lott S. Bayless, Seventh Indiana; Arthur Linn, Company H, Tenth New York Zouaves; W. H. Stearns, Company F, Thirty-fifth Illinois; Geo. S. The association was organized at Yankton, February 6, 1877, on which occasion Judge Granville G. Bennett, of Deadwood, delivered an address. The first officers were J. A. Wallace, of Union County, president, Gen. C. T. Campbell, of Bon Homme County, vice president, and Maj. T. S. Clarkson, of Charles Mix County, secretary. The next meeting was fixed for the 17th of September, proximo, at Yankton.

Capt. John B. Raymond was appointed United States marshal for Dakota in August, 1877, succeeding Marshal J. H. Burdick.

GRASSHOPPER PROCLAMATION—A DAY OF FASTING

The warm spring weather of 1877 hatched out myriads of young grasshoppers from the eggs that had been deposited the year before, and it became apparent that a serious calamity was threatened to the prosperity of the territory. In fact its baneful influence it was feared would result in the depopulation of some of the newer settled sections of the territory. Under these distressing circumstances, the governor moved thereto by an earnest appeal of the Christian clergy of the territory, issued a proclamation, appointing a day of fasting, humiliation and prayer to Almighty God, trusting that the calamity might by his good providence be averted. The petition of the clergymen was endorsed by the following named clergymen: Joseph Ward, pastor of the Congregational Church, Yankton; J. A. Potter, pastor of the Methodist Church, Yankton; James Buchanan, pastor of the Baptist Church, Yankton; Gilbert Higgs, pastor rector of the Episcopal Church, Yankton; Stewart Sheldon, general missionary of A. H. M. Society for D. T.; John Hauck, missionary of Sioux City and Yankton District among the Germans of the Methodist Episcopal Church; Melancthon Hoyt, dean of the Episcopal Church in Dakota.

The grasshopper convention of governors at Omaha held during the preceding fall having also adopted resolutions requesting the people of the several states afflicted by the destructive pests, to assemble in their respective places of worship, and beseech by prayer and praise, the interposition of the Almighty Father to preserve to the threatened people the fruits of their industry; the governor issued his proclamation in these words:

Now, therefore, in conformity with the action of the said convention, and in obedience to the wishes of the reverend clergy as expressed in their letter, and in truthful and devout recognition of Divine Providence, I appoint Friday, the 4th day of May next, to be observed as a day of fasting, humiliation and prayer to Almighty God for the forgiveness of our sins, and for his blessing in all the affairs and vicissitudes of life.

In the spirit of humility and supplication let the people of the territory assemble on that day in their accustomed places of public worship, and ask for the Divine assistance without which all human effort is made vain.

Let us pray for peace on earth and good will among men; that all strifes may cease, and that the nation may increase in wisdom, and be strengthened in unity and patriotism; that we may be blessed in our institutions, our industries and in our homes. Let us seek for wisdom and honesty in government, and for uprighteousness, temperance and godliness among our people, for the bounties of the earth, for succor and help, for the needy and distressed, and consolation for the sorrowful; for faith that doubteth not, for love that is steadfast and enduring, and for the peace which passeth understanding.

JOHN L. PENNINGTON.

(Seal) By the Governor, GEO. H. HAND, Secretary.

On the day appointed, Friday, May 4, there was a general observance of its purpose by the people of all Christian denominations as well as those of the Israelitish faith; and it was remarked as the season of growth in the planted fields grew on that the damage from insects of any kind was no greater than in the average seasons and the scourge of the grasshopper disappeared, not only for the season then impending but possibly for all time, as no general complaint of a recurrence of the plague has since been known. The people seem to have been generally reminded of these words in the Psalms of David: "Let the people praise Thee, O God; yea, let all the people praise Thee. Then shall the earth bring forth her increase; and God, even our own God, shall give us His blessing."

A little red bug was discovered late in April and early in May in the grasshopper infected sections of the territory at work destroying the infant hoppers and the unbatched eggs. This destruction had been observed in Minnehaha, Turner, Lincoln, Clay, Armstrong, Bon Homme, Hutchinson, and Yankton counties. Where the young grasshoppers were abundant a short time since not one was visible early in May, but the ground was fairly peopled with the red bug; and an examination of the eggs deposited in many places would indicate that the red parasite had been busy rendering them innocuous. This red bug had been observed a year or two earlier but it was then only a mite, barely visible to the eye and concealed under the wings of the full grown hopper; at this time it appeared increased in size manifold; farmers in different sections had dug up a spadeful or such a matter of the soil containing the hopper nests and therein discovered the little bug alive and at work exterminating the embryo hopper; the eggs were found in sacks, ten or twelve together, and it was claimed that one of the red bugs had capacity for several sacks.

Fast day, as it was called, May 4, was generally observed in all the Dakota churches, and the banks and many of the business houses suspended business, notwithstanding the operations of the red bug. By the middle of June the grasshopper plague had ceased to be more than a memory, and the grain crops promised an abundant yield. The promise was fulfilled, and since that season the territory has suffered no serious damage from the insect plague. Because of the grasshopper scourge which had infested the territory since 1874, and which had been greatly magnified in the public prints to the great detriment of immigration, and otherwise injurious to the territory, the following report of the executive of the territory to the commissioner of agriculture, at Washington, was given to the public in August, 1877:

Executive Office,

Yankton, Dakota Territory, July 30, 1877.

Gen. G. W. Le Duc, Commissioner.

Dear Sir: We are now in the midst of the harvest in Dakota, and it is safe to say that the yield from the small grain crops will be by far the largest ever gathered in this territory. The crops have received no damage from the grasshoppers, the season has been propitious, the acreage cultivated is greater than ever before, and the product to the acre is unprecedented. The rye and barley are harvested and are safe, while the largest part of the wheat and oats are in the stack and in the shock, and the remainder will be by the close of the present week. The potato crop is safe and almost beyond injury, and will be the largest ever produced in the territory, while the general vegetable crop is most abundant.

The corn looks well, and if not injured by the grasshoppers, a misfortune which but few now apprehend, the yield will be most abundant. Our people have great cause of rejoicing for the bountiful yield of the fruits of the earth. They have not only an abundance to supply all their own wants, but will have a large surplus for exportation, and notwithstanding the general business depression and financial distress that affects the country generally, the citizens of this territory are buoyant with hope, and the immense crop which they are now harvesting will place them in a more independent condition than they have ever occupied before since settling in the territory. And in this connection you may proclaim to sober, intelligent, industrious people of the over-crowded East, who are out of work and suffering for want of food, that our broad free acres are open to them. We have millions of unoccupied acres, and the Government of the United States gives a home in this territory to any who will occupy it. The lands to the bona-fide settlers are absolutely free, and any family who has means to get here and open up a few acres, cannot only provide for themselves, but with economy and industry may soon become independent.

JOHN L. PENNINGTON,
Governor.

This fortunate turn from the dismal apprehensions felt in the early spring when the young grasshoppers were threatening destruction to all vegetation, was by many very properly ascribable to the overruling Providence to whom intercession was publicly made by the people of the territory on the occasion of the day of fasting, humiliation and prayer, appointed by the governor in the early season in response to the petition from the clergymen. That such a striking and abundant vindication of the scriptural passage which declares that "the prayers of the righteous availeth much," was thankfully recognized by many may be confidently stated, and should have afforded great encouragement to all, especially to those who believed with the immortal Lincoln, that God answers the sincere prayers of his people.

THE PEACE POLICY

The Peace Policy had been in force or on trial for eight years; that is the earnest policy which had for its motto applied to the Indians: "work, or starve and go naked," but the policy was not yet strong enough to be trusted alone—it required the protection of the soldiers, and it will be observed that the territory was fairly well supplied by reference to General Sheridan's report given in chapter 79-1878.

The Indians were unusually troublesome along the wagon roads leading to the Black Hills, and were at times in comparatively large numbers. They were said to be from the Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies, with a sprinkling from other agencies. Their main purpose was plunder, in which they were quite successful, and though there was no lack of opportunity to kill, it appeared that they in most cases chose to refrain from resorting to it if they could get the stuff they were after by frightening away those who had it in charge. Four hundred Indians attacked a large freight cavalcade going into the Black Hills from Bismarck, in December, drove off the guards, and carried off large quantities of goods and such of the live stock as they could gather into a herd in a hurry. Some shots were exchanged, but no fatalities and none even wounded, according to the reports of the freighters' crew, which numbered in the neighborhood of fifty. Another band attacked a large hunting party near the Bismarck route. A hot fight was reported. The Indians captured the camp finally; no whites were injured, but the hunters claimed to have killed three Indians. The redskins, however, forced the hunters to abandon everything, horses, mules, equipment, large quantity of game meat and all their camping paraphernalia, and these trophies of victory were borne away to the Indian villages. Other parties were robbed of their live stock, and ranchers were driven from their abodes and their household goods carried off. General Sheridan responded to appeals for protection from Black Hills communities, and troops were sent into the dangerous zone, but the Indians were able to continue their depredations for several months and must have amassed a large quantity of the spoils of war. A train of eight wagons were captured on the Niobrara route—the Indians took the horses and provisions, but spared the lives of those in charge of the train. The Indians, to a large extent, appear to have learned that the killing of white people was of no benefit to them and greatly exasperated the soldiers; whereas, the capture of a caravan of supplies and sparing the parties in charge was apt to invoke a favorable comment, as tending to prove that the redmen were not the bloodthirsty wretches so commonly supposed. This might have been due to the humane influences of the peace policy.

NORTHERN DAKOTA WHEAT FIELDS

In the early years of the settlement of the northern portion of Dakota Territory wheat farming was conducted on a scale surpassing in extent any similar enterprise in the history of our country. The name of "Dalrymple" has become interwoven with these colossal farms in Dakota from the fact that he was one of the best informed and experienced grain growers in the country, and had beside a daring enterprise that few agriculturists possessed when Dalrymple became famous for his colossal achievements in wheat production on the new lands of the territory. Fortunately Mr. Dalrymple's enterprise was one that the whole world felt like applauding, and he was lauded appropriately and without cost by the press of the country, and in this way Dakota gained an envious celebrity the country over for the excellence of its soil as a producer of the finest grades of wheat, which became known as "No. 1, Hard," and with that title Dakota wheat won its way to leadership in the great grain markets. In his great grain growing enterprises Mr. Dalrymple was associated with others who held leading positions in the directory of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and was thus enabled to control an empire of land. The governors of Dakota, as a rule, were quite proud of their realm and the achievements of the people, especially in the field of agriculture, and as early as September, 1877, Governor Pennington officially reported to the commissioner of agriculture at Washington his personal observations of the agricultural development of that section. He said in part:

Along the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad, west of Fargo for twenty miles or more, the wheat fields stretch out on both sides of the road as far as the eye can reach. At Casselton, eighteen miles west of Fargo, we could see six or eight steam threshers going in different directions, and we were told by the Messrs. Dalrymple that the yield ran from twenty-five to thirty bushels to the acre. One piece of 320 acres had just been threshed, by itself, and measured just thirty bushels to the acre. The Messrs. Dalrymple and those associated with them had 7,000 acres in wheat this year, and next year they propose to have 12,000.

The success of these gentlemen and others has caused great inquiry for lands, and the country is settling up with great rapidity. The country along the Red River of the North as far down as Grand Forks, a distance of seventy-five miles below Fargo, is pretty well settled, and everywhere the crops are splendid. Five thousand bushels of wheat per day were being shipped from Casselton.

To people who wish to engage in wheat growing no better lands can be found in the United States for that purpose than in Northern Dakota; in fact, there are millions of fertile acres all over the territory, and families who can come with small means and will work hard and manage well may soon render themselves independent.

Around Bismarck, in Burleigh County, while there is not much doing as yet in Burleigh County, we found small crops of splendid wheat and corn, and the most abundant vegetable crops. There can be no doubt that the lands of Burleigh County are well adapted to agriculture. Both Burleigh and Cass sent collections of their cereals, vegetables, etc., to the state fair of Minnesota, and it was a notorious fact that they were among the very finest collections exhibited there, and the largest and finest potatoes exhibited were grown near Bismarck.

The whole country along the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad is susceptible of improvement, will yield the means of subsistence and can be made to support a dense population. In my judgment the next quarter of a century will see it all well settled up. Besides the fertility and productive quality of the soil, coal of superior quality has been found in several localities in the neighborhood of Bismarck.

Very respectfully,

JOHN L. PENNINGTON,
Governor.

COLOSSAL FARMS

The settlement of the northern part of the territory was inaugurated by farming enterprises on a scale unprecedented for magnitude in the Northwest, if not in the country generally, save Texas. In 1876 Mr. George W. Cass, president of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, joined with Mr. Dalrymple, the king of wheat farmers in Minnesota, and opened a wheat farm near Casselton, about twenty miles west of Fargo, which contained 27,000 acres. They had 4,500 acres broken, and in 1877 planted this field to wheat, which produced an average of twenty-five bushels to the acre.

Dalrymple, with the Grandin Brothers, owned a tract of about twenty-five thousand acres at Elm River, in the then new County of Traill, where 3,000 acres were sown to wheat in 1877.

This celebrated Dalrymple farm was the property of General Cass, president of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and Messrs. Cheney and Grandin, when it began its career as a wheat producer in 1876. The farm of about eighteen thousand acres was valued, unimproved, at $100,000, and Mr. Oliver Dalrymple undertook its management under an agreement that when one-half that investment had been realized from the soil he was to receive a deed to one-half the land. The third crop, raised in 1878, added to previous crops, netted the owners the sum of $50,000, and Mr. Dalrymple then received the deeds entitling him to the ownership of 9,000 acres of the big farm, worth at this time over a quarter of a million dollars; but its value to the Territory of Dakota, and particularly to the northern part thereof, would be difficult to compute in dollars. It had proved the sterling character of the country as a food producing region of the best and most valuable class, and its unprecedented performance had gone out to the people of every civilized country on the globe, with the result that during the following decade nearly twice one hundred thousand immigrants, representing many nationalities and all of a desirable character, found their way to the northern wheat garden and founded homes upon its lands or within its thriving towns. The publicity feature furnished a lesson to enterprising men, and communities that has since proved of great value in every department of industry, and was possibly wisely designed for the purpose it accomplished in such a notable and remunerative manner.

Mr. Dalrymple had been an extensive wheat grower in Minnesota for several years before going to Dakota. His wheat farms were about twenty miles southeast of St. Paul, and covered about three thousand acres, and were named respectively the Grant, Sherman and Sheridan farms. Dalrymple had been a lawyer, and was a native of Western Pennsylvania, and came to Minnesota in 1856. His first big crop of wheat in Minnesota was grown in 1867, and amounted to 35,700 bushels. He sent it all to Milwaukee, paying 21 cents a bushel transportation charges, and sold it for $1.60 to $1.85 a bushel. These were war prices. His receipts were $53,550, and his net profits $14,500. He paid $2.50 a bushel for his seed. In 1868 he raised 39,000 bushels, an average of twenty-three bushels to the acre. He began operations in Northern Dakota in 1875, in company with Gen. George W. Cass, president of the Northern Pacific Railway.

A NATIONAL IMMIGRATION BUREAU

Possibly as an outgrowth of the Centennial Exposition of 1876, but not connected with it, was the organization of the National Immigration Bureau at Philadelphia early in 1877. Its president was Col. Lee Crandall, and it had representatives in every subdivision of the Union. Other officers were Judge O. A. Lochrane, vice president, and Col. J. C. Hess, general agent. There was also a vice president and general agent in every state and territory. Mr. West, of Yankton, was general agent of Dakota, and Col. A. W. Edwards, of Fargo, vice president.

The objects of the bureau were to collect and diffuse trustworthy information concerning the resources of the country and their development; to distribute the capital and population of the country proportionately to its natural resources and industrial advantages of the different sections; to furnish capitalists with the most desirable opportunities for safe and remunerative investments, and enable people of limited means to procure cheap homes and the laboring man to improve his condition.

The organization had secured possession of Machinery Hall used at the centennial, in which were arranged exhibits of the agricultural and mineral resources of the country in several territorial and state departments. The plan of the bureau was to make Philadelphia and its immigration bureau a national repository for information, of a practical and visible kind, for all people, native born and foreign, who wished to emigrate to any quarter, where they could receive absolutely reliable information regarding the natural resources and advantages or drawbacks of any section within the confines of the republic. The plan of the bureau was founded in part upon Horace Greeley's opinion, expressed a few years earlier, that every state and territory of the Union should be represented, at least once a year, in a great national agricultural and mineral exhibition—that such an institution, properly maintained, could furnish cheaply and accurately, all information desired by emigrants, and would prove a powerful agent in developing the wealth of the country, and in relieving cities of their needy population, which was ever abundant.

The plan was one that Dakotans warmly approved; it seemed to have been devised more particularly to meet the needs of Dakota than any other section of the country. The territory had held an annual fair at Yankton, in September, 1877, and Governor Pennington, always public spirited, with Sec. Isaac E. West, of the fair, arranged an exhibit of the most attractive articles shown in the home exposition, and shipped it to Philadelphia, where it was given a favorable location in Machinery Hall, and was admiringly viewed by many people. The Philadelphia newspapers reviewed the exhibits, and the Times, of October 31st, gave place to the Dakota exhibit as follows:

The articles from Dakota were shipped on the 10th and arrived at the hall on the 23d. They fairly represent the agricultural products of the entire territory, although most of them grew in the vicinity of Yankton and Bismarek, which are situated respectively in the south-eastern and central sections. These exhibits are remarkable—some of them for their novelty and nearly all for their size. Among them are specimens of purple "rabbi," a sort of cross between the cabbage and the turnip. These roots are as large as a man's head, and grew about two miles north of Bismarek, in soil 1,800 feet above the level of the sea, and which is described as being a fair sample of that extending thence for hundreds of miles in every direction. They were raised in the open air without forcing, and from seed sown in the latter part of April last. The roots are transplanted like cabbage, which vegetable they resemble in taste when cooked. With them are shown a new variety of potatoes (Scotch Greys), weighing from ten ounces to a pound each, and which were planted June 23d and sent to the fair in September, being the growth of but ninety days. Hubbard pumpkins, from two and a half to three feet in diameter, and weighing from one hundred and thirty to one hundred and sixty pounds apiece; radishes from Burleigh County as long as a man's arm and as thick as his leg; strap leaf and field turnips nearly as large as a water bucket; "bushel" blood beets, one of which could not be forced without difficulty into the sleeve of a man's overcoat; and Early Rose potatoes as large as a ten-year-old baby boy's head, and which, according to the label, were planted on the 8th of May in unmanured ground, which had been plowed but once and which produced 200 bushels to the acre. This ground is near Bismarck, and up to the 10th of this month (October) there had been no frost there since the 20th of April. Excellent yellow corn from Odessa, Yankton County, is shown, which was planted June 2d, and reached the territorial fair September 2d.

Dakota's Black Hills were opened to settlement in 1877, which explains the absence of a mineral exhibit.

In September, 1877, all Dakota prisoners were removed from Fort Madison, Iowa, where they were being kept under contract in the state penitentiary. There were thirty prisoners transferred, in charge of Millard A. Baker, sheriff of Yankton County; Secretary of the Territory George H. Hand, United States Marshal J. H. Burdick and Deputy United States Marshal Charles P. Edmunds. This change was made as a matter of economy; the charge for keeping the prisoners at Detroit being 25 cents per day for each prisoner, less than the price charged by the Iowa institution, resulting in a saving to the territory of about twenty-seven hundred dollars a year, or $50 a year on each prisoner.

IMMIGRATION—CROPS

Immigration was quite active in 1877 both in the northern portion of the territory and through the central counties. The Sioux Valley was occupied, though not compactly, throughout its entire length; the public lands in the eastern tier of counties, from the mouth of the Big Sioux to the international boundary above Pembina, were largely exhausted. The Vermillion Valley was fairly well settled, and the James River to points north of Firesteel. Settlements had also been founded in the upper valley both north and south of Jamestown.

The immigration to the Black Hills continued in large proportions during the year, and it was also observed that a great many who had gone in the year previous, or early in 1877, were returning. They had not been able to "strike it rich," and had exhausted their purse. The placer mining districts had been overrun by gold hunters, and the best claims, those that would yield "gold from the grass roots to bed-rock," had been appropriated. The poor man's treasure-house had been stormed and taken; henceforth, as a rule, it would require a fortune invested in equipment and development, in order to realize a larger fortune. A respectable number of the returning element settled in Eastern Dakota.

The farming season was favored by timely rains, and had it not been for one of the most destructive hailstorms that ever struck Dakota a bountiful crop throughout the settled portions of the territory would have been garnered. The hail stripped a belt nearly two miles wide and possibly fifteen miles in length, beginning in Turner County, thence south through Clay and its compact farming district, and thence through Union to the Big Sioux. No hailstorm equaling it in area and destructive force was known to the oldest inhabitant.

Governor Pennington, following a custom he had adopted, sent in a crop report to the commissioner of agriculture at Washington, Hon. William G. LeDuc, the last of July, 1877, and that official acknowledged its receipt, and added a brief comment, as follows:

It is very gratifying to have your statement of the crops in Dakota. It has been known for many years that the lower part of your territory was exceedingly fertile, but the doubt has been whether upon the high arid plains anything like a certainty of producing cereal crops could be obtained. I have in mind the transplanting of a large forest in that region, as also in the Grand Coteau of the Missouri, miles in extent, if authority and money can be obtained from Congress, in the hope of restoring fertility, which, no doubt, once made that a blooming and beautiful country. I wish the many poor of this city (Washington), and other cities East, could be induced to avail themselves of the advantages offered by your fertile soil. What can we do to persuade them to thus act for their own benefit?

The Black Hills, and the events leading to their being opened to settlement, gave to the Territory of Dakota much publicity throughout the United States. It was the most interesting theme in the news columns of our metropolitan journals for a number of years prior to the treaty of cession, and including that and the following year, and during that period the prairie lands of the territory were receiving population in numbers aggregating many thousands each year, each succeeding year exhibiting an increasing ratio.

The Sioux Valley was occupied its entire length; the Vermillion and its branches was quite compactly settled. Settlement along the James River had reached from its mouth to its headwaters, 400 miles in extent, and along the Missouri slope farms had been opened up as far as Fort Sully. North of the forty-sixth parallel the lands had also been largely taken along the Red and Cheyenne rivers, and on the Missouri slope in Burleigh County, south to the forty-sixth. And while the Black Hills had initiated the publicity, the fertile acres of the territory and the simple method by which they could be acquired at small cost also formed a substantial part of the information that was scattered abroad and found a wonderful response in the coming of 100,000 hardy, energetic and intelligent yeomen who sought Dakota for a home.

Concerning the Black Hills and the Bad Lands the public had much information many years before the Custer expedition of 1874. The Bad Lands were associated with the Black Hills by scientists and explorers, and the former was looked upon as much the more valuable from the standpoint of the geologist.

DEATH OF UNITED STATES ATTORNEY WILLIAM POUND—APPOINTMENT OF CAMPBELL

William Pound, United States attorney for Dakota, died suddenly on the cars, while journeying from Fargo to St. Paul, at a point called Akin, October 18, 1877. Mr. Pound had been afflicted with consumption for a number of years, and as is usually the case with that malady, had suffered through a number of serious attacks, gradually growing weaker and less able to resist them. His residence was at Yankton, to which point he was returning after attending court in the northern part of the territory. About the 1st of October, under the impression that a journey up river would prove helpful, he took passage on the steamboat Nellie Peck for Bismarck. His wife and eldest son accompanied him. He intended returning by boat, but as none were on the way down at the time, he concluded to come by rail, and was seized with a violent hemorrhage on the way, which had a fatal result.

Mr. Pound was born in Salem, Columbia County, Ohio, of Quaker parents, September 14, 1840. He enlisted in the Union army in 1861, under the first call for volunteers for 75,000 90-day men in the Seventh Indiana Infantry. On leaving the army he engaged in the practice of law at Ravenna, Ohio, and from thence removed to Greensburg, Ind., where for two years he published and edited the Greensburg Chronicle. He was married at the age of twenty-one. He came to Dakota in 1869 as private secretary to Governor Burbank, and was first appointed United States attorney for Dakota in 1870, and was reappointed in 1875. He had been a worthy citizen, was possessed of good ability, and was highly esteemed throughout Dakota.

He was succeeded in office by Hon. Hugh J. Campbell, of New Orleans, who was appointed by President Hayes, in November, 1877. Judge Campbell, as he was usually called, was a native Pennsylvanian, had resided in Iowa before the Civil war, had enlisted from that state, and had been a resident of Louisiana since the war closed.

COMMON SCHOOLS—SUPERINTENDENT CATON

The condition of the common schools at the close of 1876, as shown by the annual report of W. E. Caton, superintendent of public instruction, was quite encouraging. The report embraced reports from Burleigh, Bon Homme, Brookings, Cass, Clay, Davison, Grand Forks, Hutchinson, Hanson, Lake, Lincoln, Moody, Minnehaha, Pembina, Richland, Traill, Turner, Union, and Yankton counties. No reports were received from Armstrong County (then the northern part of the present Hutchinson County), Brule, Lawrence (just organized), Stutsman, Pennington, or Custer, both of which had just been organized. The number of pupils between the ages of five and twenty-one years were: Males, 5,656; females, 5,390. Male teachers, 100; female teachers, 154. Average salaries paid teachers: Males, $33.06 per month; females, $29.50. There were 369 school districts in the territory. The average cost of tuition of each pupil was $1.55 per month. Mr. Caton's was the eighth territorial report that had been given out. Thereafter the educational department of the territory grew rapidly, and was quite properly the principal public concern of the people during the remainder of the territorial era.

PROSECUTION AND PERSECUTION OF INDIAN AGENTS

GRANT'S INDIAN PEACE POLICY—ITS SUCCESSFUL ADMINISTRATION FOR EIGHT YEARS—AN IGNOBLE AND VICIOUS PLOT TO DEFAME IT—THE NEW ADMINISTRATION ASSAULTS PAST INDIAN MANAGEMENT—WHOLESALE SUDDEN ARREST OF INDIAN AGENTS—THE CROW CREEK SUDDENLY "POUNCHED UPON" BY SOLDIERS—SECRETARY SCHURZ AND SUPERINTENDENT HAMMOND—THE PLAN OF THE PROSECUTORS—THE AGENT INDICTED, TRIED AND ACQUITTED IN EVERY CASE—A SKETCH OF A PORTION OF THE COURT PROCEEDINGS—EVER THE RIGHT COMES UPPERMOST AND EVER IS JUSTICE DONE.

MISSIONARY INFLUENCE WITH INDIANS

From the earliest occupation of this continent by the whites, the religious denominations, through their missionaries, had been represented more or less among all the Indian tribes—the Roman Catholic predominating; and the Quakers, led by William Penn, setting the earliest practical example of a peace policy for their government instead of a policy of war and retaliation, hence it was that these representatives of the cross had gained an ascendancy in the estimation of the savage and had to a great extent won their confidence. The Indians had realized the benefits which came to them through the wise and patient and self-sacrificing labors of these friends. No other class of white people who mingled with the Indians were possessed with a tithe of the influence which the missionary wielded, and while they were not able to prevent all wars and massacres, that they did so on many occasions is well authenticated. No one understood better than the faithful missionaries the character of the wrongs practiced upon the Indians by unworthy representatives of the Government, and none used this information with more wise discretion, always seeking to impress upon the Indians that their best course was to seek reparation for aggravating wrongs through peaceful channels; that a resort to war invariably left them in worse condition than the one they had expected to be relieved from.

The Roman Catholic representatives among the missionaries appear to have excelled other religious denominations in gaining the affection of the race, by their zeal and devotion; thus it is found that Selkirk, though a Protestant, favored the Romanists for his people in the Red River Valley, and it is also found that such leading chieftains as Red Cloud, Spotted Tail and Sitting Bull and many others demanded Roman Catholic missionaries. The Indians did not appear to understand that in this they were asking the Government to exceed its powers, for the Government appointed no missionaries and paid none. All denominations were free to come and go among them, and paid their own expenses, which as a rule were furnished by missionary boards who collected funds for this purpose.

President Grant was aware of the influence of the church with the Indian tribes, and he wanted to make it of greater service by enlisting it in the practical work of the peace or industrial policy. He knew that his own party friends wanted the patronage of the Indian service, but he foresaw that to make progress with the new system partyism could not be relied upon. There seemed to be a logical reason that the religious denominations already possessing an influence for good—for peace, for industry—among the Indians should have charge of their temporal affairs as well, which would insure a greater zeal on their part to promote their civilization. It was a correct view, proven by eight years of practical trial, during which time the Indian was largely withdrawn from his wild life—the chase and the warpath—and brought under the influence of the industrial feature of the new system, though he may not have made the progress his over-sanguine friends had predicted; and, as has already been stated elsewhere, this was partly due to the undetermined policy of the Government whether to colonize all the red people in the Indian Territory, which, if it could be done, it was conscientiously believed, would be the best for all concerned. But the most difficult part of the work was partially performed, and that was in separating the Indian from his accustomed hunt, war and indolence, and teaching him so much of the rudiments of manual labor in an enlightened industry as to largely remove his prejudice against it.

One hindrance to the more rapid progress of the peace policy had been the partially matured plans of the Government to gather the Indians of the country in one body in the Indian Territory, south of Kansas, and the establishment of some sort of territorial government for them. This plan is revealed in Commissioner Smith's speech to the Yanktons, and plainly urged in 1876 by the Black Hills Commission, who sent Spotted Tail and a large delegation of Sioux to the Indian Territory to investigate.

While the Indian peace policy of General Grant's administration, and the appointment of Indian agents on the recommendation of the churches, worked out results of surpassing benefit to the Indians, it was opposed by powerful influences because it was separated from party politics, and had arrayed against it the non-religious element of the country; also the strictly partisan element who believed that "to the victors belong the spoils," and also some of the religious denominations and those of anti-church proclivities, who claimed it was bringing about too close a relation between politics and religion, or church and state, and they were apprehensive religion might suffer from such intimate association; and there was also the never-ending struggle of the War department to regain control of the Indian bureau.

The religious denominations were all represented among the several tribes, and understood more thoroughly than any other class the nature and character of the Indian, hence understood how to proceed best with the development of the new industrial policy, which had now reached that stage when its success was assured by a wise and common sense system in control of its progress—a wise and patient perseverance along the lines laid down which did not seek to make a white man of the Indian, but to make him a civilized Indian.

INDIANS APPORTIONED TO RELIGIOUS DENOMINATIONS

The apportionment of the various Indian tribes among the several religious denominations of the United States was quite impartial, as will be learned from a perusal of the following list, which was given out by the Indian bureau. The Sioux Nation had been made a Protestant Episcopal bishop's see by the Protestant Episcopal Mission Board, and Bishop William Hobart Hare had been the missionary of that denomination working among the Sioux for a number of years, which probably explains why the great majority of the Sioux, who were all, except the Santees, in Dakota, were placed under the agents of that denomination with the exception of two tribes that were apportioned to the Catholics. The list follows:

The figures refer to the number of Indians belonging to the several agencies.

Friends (Hicksite)—The northern superintendency and the agencies therein, namely, Great Nemaha, 313; Omaha, 969; Winnebago, 1,440; Pawnee, 2,447; Otoe, 464; Santee Sioux, 965; all located in the State of Nebraska.

Friends (Orthodox)—The central superintendency and the agencies therein, namely, Pottawatomie, 400; Kaw, 290; Kickapoo, 598; all located in Kansas. The Quapaw, 1,000; Osage, 4,000; Sac and Fox, 463; Shawnee, 663; Wichita, 1,250; Kiowa, 5,490; Upper Arkansas, 3,500; all located in the Indian Territory.

Baptist—The Cherokee, 18,000; Creek, 12,300, in the Indian Territory. Walker River, 6,000; Piute, 2,500, in Nevada. Special, 3,000, in Utah.

Presbyterian—The Choctaw, 16,000; Seminoles, 2,398, in the Indian Territory. Abiquiqui, or Tiera Amarilla, 1,920; Navajo, 9,114; Mescalero Apache, 830; Tularosa, or Southern Apache, 1,200, in New Mexico Territory. Moquis Pueblo, 3,000, in Arizona Territory. Nez Perce, 2,807, in Idaho Territory. Uintah Valley, 800, in Utah.

Christian—The Pueblo, 7,683, in New Mexico. Noah Bay, 604, in Washington Territory.

Methodist—Huopa Valley, 725; Round Valley, 1,700; Tule River, 374, in California. Yokahama, 3,000; Skokomish, 919; Quintelt, 520, in Washington Territory. Warm Springs, 626; Siletz, 2,500; Klamath, 4,000, in Oregon. Blackfeet, 7,500; Crow, 2,700; Milk River, 19,755, in Montana Territory. Fort Hall, 1,037, in Idaho. Michigan, 9,110, in Michigan.

Catholic—Tulalip, 3,600; Colville, 3,349, in Washington Territory. Grand Ronde, 870; Umatilla, 837, in Oregon. Flathead, 1,780, in Montana. Grand River, 6,700; Devil's Lake, 720, in Dakota.

Reformed Dutch—Colorado River, 828; Pluma and Maricopa, 4,342; Camp Grant, 900; Camp Verde, 748; White Mountain, or Camp Apache, 1,300, in Arizona.

Congregationalists—Green Bay, 2,871; Chippewas, of Lake Superior, 5,150, in Wisconsin. Chippewas, of the Mississippi, 6,455, in Minnesota.

Protestant Episcopal—Whetstone (Spotted Tail), 5,000; Ponca, 735; Upper Missouri (Crow Creek), 2,547; Fort Berthold, 2,700; Cheyenne River, 6,000; Yankton, 1,947; Ogalala (Red Cloud), 7,000, in Dakota Territory. Shoshone, 1,000, in Wyoming Territory.

American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions—Sisseton, 1,496, in Dakota Territory.

Unitarian—Los Pinos, 3,000; White River, 800, in Colorado.

Lutheran—Sac and Fox, 273, in Iowa.

President Grant was succeeded by President Hayes, who had come into the presidency under strenuous circumstances. The reconstruction of the seceded states had been going forward and was about completed when Mr. Hayes was inaugurated. Mr. Tilden, the democratic candidate for President, had run so close a race that it was found necessary to appoint a special electoral commission to decide the result. The election in Louisiana had been of such a turbulent and lawless character that the ablest men of both parties found it beyond the scope of existing law to decide which of the parties had carried the state for President, and as Louisiana was decided the presidential office fell to the party that secured it. Many leading republicans, President Grant among the number, were quoted as believing that Tilden had carried Louisiana. For the purpose of settling the controversy a novel and most extraordinary compromise proceeding was resorted to. An electoral commission was formed composed of judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, senators and representatives in Congress, numbering in all fifteen persons, and while the commission was strictly non-partisan, it so happened that eight of its members had been known as republicans prior to their elevation to the eminent positions they occupied, and seven of the number had belonged to the veteran organization known as the democratic party. This commission was created by act of Congress and was harmoniously accepted by all parties—it was agreeable to the pacific and conscientious sentiment of the people of the United States. It was also constitutional, and the Supreme Court, by virtue of its membership of five on the commission, was thus committed to its constitutional soundness in advance. During the long proceedings of the commission, which were not private, the Louisiana election was very thoroughly threshed out, and as the investigation progressed questions arose which required a vote of the commissioners to decide; and in nearly every instance these questions, where they affected the vital issue at stake, had been decided by a vote of eight to seven—the eight republican members voting together and the democrats voting likewise; and yet this was strictly a non-partisan commission. Finally the testimony had all been taken, and the commission retired to make up its verdict. There was world-wide speculation as to what the verdict would be, for the testimony had shown that the Louisiana election had been grossly irregular in many districts, and it might have been thrown out altogether but for the momentous issue which hung upon it. Finally the hour arrived when the commission was to vote upon the question as to which contestant, Tilden or Hayes, was entitled to the electoral vote of Louisiana, and when this vote was taken the result showed eight for Hayes and seven for Tilden. This lent to the verdict the color of a partisanship decision instead of the impartial and non-partisan opinion of a judicial tribunal. There was, however, general acquiescence in the verdict by all law-abiding citizens for the purpose of insuring public tranquility and the stability of the Government.

Much had transpired from the time Mr. Hayes was first nominated at Cincinnati by the National Republican Convention, continuing through the campaign, and including these electoral commission proceedings, to engender prejudice in the minds of Mr. Hayes' friends toward the administration of his predecessor, President Grant, and when he became President his cabinet was selected from a class of honest and capable statesmen who had been conspicuous in opposing many features of the policies formerly pursued. They were eminent men who had rendered valuable public service in the tented field and in important civic stations, but seemed to be theorists in many matters, and felt that with all the vast power they had succeeded to, and with such an inviting field for its display, they could accomplish great achievements in the way of Government reforms.

Mr. Carl Schurz, who was appointed secretary of the interior by President Hayes, conceived that he was especially gifted with the genius of reform, and resolved to test its capabilities first in reconstructing and bettering the prevailing system of Indian management.

SECRETARY CARL SCHURZ

Hon. Carl Schurz had not been friendly to the Grant administration, and this feeling, it was claimed, dated back to the Civil war when some of the military commanders did not receive all the credit they deserved—in their own judgment. He was a leading citizen of the great republic, a representative German of commanding influence in the republican party. His ability and probity were acknowledged and his private life unblemished.

It was an opinion shared by a number of his fellow citizens that he had come into his high office imbued with the prejudice and opinion somewhat prevalent since the early days of the republic that the conduct of our Indian affairs was criminally corrupted and had been so for many years (and this in face of the fact that the peace policy had been in practical operation for about ten years). There were always circumstances connected with the management of the Indians that gave color and support to such an opinion, and Mr. Schurz's first move was to probe the methods of the Indian bureau, particularly the methods governing and practiced at the several Indian agencies by the United States agents. But prior to this he appointed a commission of three competent gentlemen from the heads of three different bureaus in his department to investigate the Indian service generally. This board performed the duty and made a formal report in November, 1877, wherein it claimed to have found abundant evidence of fraud and irregularities in the eastern purchasing and contracting division of the service, and some minor affairs not strictly in accordance with good business methods at some of the agencies, but made no mention of any in particular.

The writer knew Mr. Schurz personally, but not familiarly. He was in Watertown, Wis., in 1856-57, when Carl Schurz reached there from Germany, from which country he had escaped from the authorities, being charged with serious political offenses, but not of a character to discredit him in this country, and he had sought an asylum in America, in the Badger State, in the German City of Watertown, where resided his father-in-law, Colonel Jensen, and a brother-in-law, both highly respected citizens of the place; from which it will be properly inferred that Mr. Schurz was a married man. He did not appear to have a particle of vindictiveness in his make-up, and from that and his general bearing we are satisfied that he was not governed by such a sentiment when he advanced to the high office of secretary of the interior twenty years later. He had probably become thoroughly imbued with the largely prevailing sentiment, founded on tradition, that all Indian agents were dishonest. Everybody said so, and it must be so, and Mr. Schurz resolved to catch them at it, and thus win the confidence and regard of the great American people. Therefore, in his first annual report, made at the opening of Congress in 1877, he confidently declared that:

The office of Indian agent is a very responsible one, requiring high moral qualities and a superior business capacity; and a salary of $1,500 a year, without a fair prospect of advancement, is, under ordinary circumstances, inadequate to induce men of such caliber to expose themselves and their families to the discomforts and privations of frontier life.

I do not deem the present machinery of the Indian service sufficient for the prevention and discovery of abuses and fraudulent practices. The inspectors and superintendents who are charged, among other things, with such duty have in but rare instances been successful in ferreting out the wily expedients resorted to by dishonest contractors or agents. To discover evidences of fraud and mismanagement by having an inspector visit an agency is like "catching birds with a brass band." What the Indian bureau needs, perhaps, more than any other branch of the Government, is a special service, composed of efficient agents, who, under the immediate control of the department, can move secretly, and pounce upon the point to be investigated without premonition. I venture to express the hope that Congress will not refuse the appropriation asked for to serve this purpose.

The present system of permitting religious societies to nominate candidates for Indian agents is, in some respects, undoubtedly an improvement upon the former practice of making appointments in the Indian service upon political grounds.

J. H. Hammond, of Iowa, had also been appointed superintendent of Indian affairs for Dakota, a position that had formerly, and up to 1874, been attached to the office of governor of Dakota. General Hammond arrived in the territory in April, 1877, accompanied by Preston Wolfe, his secretary. Hammond went at once into the country where the Indians and Indian agencies were located, to look over his field of labor. He had been a citizen of Council Bluffs, Iowa, and had been in the volunteer army, but his record in that field was not notable in any way. He had probably been selected for superintendent because of some supposed ability he possessed in the detective profession. Concerning his antecedents the following furnishes in brief all that was known of him when he reached Dakota:

He appeared in the United States army during 1862. He had a staff appointment, and was on some sort of duty about General Sherman's headquarters in Mississippi in 1863—a sort of upper clerk. Private soldiers were detailed to do duty as clerks. Mr. Hammond was apparently in charge of them in their clerical work. He was never on duty in the field, at least the record contains no mention of it. It was claimed that Sherman was dissatisfied with him because of some personal characteristics that were not pleasant, and turned him over to General Logan, where he was a clerk in Logan's headquarters for a time. His idiosyncracies of disposition found no favor with Logan, who had him transferred to some duty at Louisville, Kentucky, where he remained during the period of Sherman's famous march to the sea. At the close of the war he married a lady in Kentucky who was posessed of some property, and soon after set up as a capitalist, went to Chillicothe, Missouri, and figured in a railroad enterprise, which proved a profitless venture. From Chillicothe he went to Chicago, where he engaged in a savings bank enterprise, but without success. The next we hear of him he was appointed by President Hayes, in 1877, superintendent of Indian affairs of Dakota, Nebraska and Kansas, an office it would seem that had been recently revived, as there was no superintendent in Dakota at the time of his appointment.

He had his headquarters office in Yankton, which he abandoned in July, 1878. His society chums said of him that during his leisure hours in his office he was fond of telling them how he spent an afternoon with Grant; slept at the Soldiers' Home with Hayes; how for six weeks he ran the office of commissioner of Indian affairs; how he built railroads in the South; turned down thousands of acres of Kentucky land rather than pay taxes on it; how he lost $1,000,000 in Missouri in one business transaction, and how he and Bill Sherman gave rebellion its quietus in the famous march through Georgia.

The attention of the reader is now, 1877 and on, called to the peaceable and prosperous condition of affairs on the frontier and among the majority of the Sioux Indians, known as "Agency Indians," embracing probably five-sixths of the 30,000 comprising the Dakota, or Sioux Nation—the result of the practical application of the peace policy through eight years of President Grant's administration. And though the Custer massacre had occurred, led by the incorrigible Sitting Bull, that awful tragedy was not due to any miscarriage of the peace policy, but to the hostility of his people to the building of the Northern Pacific Railroad and the uncompromising hostility of the leader, the avowed enemy of the palefaces, whose boast was that he had never signed a treaty, never would, and every treaty the Indians had ever made was a fraud, unless every Indian of the tribe consented to it and signed it. And as an evidence that the forces under Sitting Bull were not of the class known as agency Indians, meaning peaceably disposed people who resided upon their reservations and were under the superintendency of their agents, it is only necessary to refer to the surrender of his forces some three or four years later, where it will be seen that the numbers who had then voluntarily come in and gave up their arms and ponies nearly equaled the number engaged in the battle of the Little Big Horn.

PLAN OF THE CONSPIRATORS

Accordingly, about the middle of April, 1878, in accordance with a plan for forestalling public opinion, an article in defense of General Hammond appeared in a leading Sioux City newspaper. The following paragraph taken from the article will show its purport. The article stated, in substance, that it was a presentation of the military and inspector's (Hammond's) side of the agency troubles up the river, and appeared the day following Hammond's arrival in Sioux City. The following is quoted from the article in question:

It is estimated that when the full details of the causes of the summary proceedings of General Hammond and Lieutenant Dougherty are given to the public it will create the greatest commotion ever occasioned in the western country; and men in high standing in the West, and in fact all over the country, will be implicated in one of the most gigantic series of swindling operations ever unearthed in the country. It is estimated that there are thousands of dollars ready to be put up against the life of General Hammond by parties interested in his taking away; and that the creation of the office of general inspector of Indian affairs, with its almost unlimited authority, and the appointment of a man of General Hammond's well known ability and tenacity of purpose to the position was for the very purpose of unearthing this very scheme of gigantic fraud. The nature of it is unknown to the public. The military is reticent, and the opposing party are said to be afraid to give a clue to the real trouble; but it is said not to be confined to the Indian agents and traders, but to pursue its ramifications into various walks of society. So dangerous is the experiment of unearthing and exposing these complications regarded that the friends of General Hammond have warned him not to move about without a guard, and Lieutenant Dougherty has been to St. Paul for the purpose of attempting to get relieved from his portion of the onerous task without effect.

From subsequent articles in the same paper, and from a number of defamatory letters appearing in the Chicago Tribune, it was evident that General Hammond had arranged a systematic plan to prejudice the public mind and prepare it for something exceedingly sensational.

CROW CREEK AGENCY SEIZED BY SOLDIERS

About the 22d of March, 1878, an extraordinary proceeding took place at Fort Thompson, the Indian agency on the Crow Creek Reservation, where Dr. H. F. Livingston had been performing the duties of United States Indian agent for nearly eight years, and been highly commended for the success which had attended his administration. The policy being pursued by the Government to win over the Indians to an industrial life and civilized customs was meeting with encouraging success among the 25,000 Sioux Indians who had been located on the Great Sioux Reservation, of which the Crow Creek Reservation formed a part by special agreement, and while it was the most difficult agency to administer and control, it had not been the theater of the least trouble for about ten years.

Doctor Livingston, the agent, had come to Dakota in 1865 from Davenport, Iowa. He was a young physician, a single man, and came west expecting to locate and practice his profession. He was a member of an excellent family. An elder brother was then a missionary of the Protestant Episcopal Church laboring in Turkish fields. The young doctor located at Yankton, then the capital, and entered upon the practice of medicine, though owing possibly to the healthful character of the climate he found abundant leisure. Early in 1867 he was appointed surgeon at the Crow Creek Agency, then in charge of Maj. Joseph R. Hanson, and remained at the agency in that capacity until 1870, being appointed United States agent early in that year, or in the closing month of the year preceding, by President Grant, on the recommendation of the bishop and the authorities of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The other United States agents for the Sioux Indians in Dakota, appointed about the same time and similarly recommended were: James F. Cravens, Cheyenne Agency; Henry F. Livingston, Crow Creek; John T. Williamson, Flandrau, special; Edwin H. Alden, Fort Berthold; Henry E. Gregory, Lower Brule; James Erwin, Red Cloud, Pine Ridge Agency; E. H. C. Cooper, Sisseton Agency; James Lawrence, Lower Brules, Spotted Tail Agency; John G. Gassman, Yanktons, Yankton Agency, Greenwood.

And on the recommendation of the bishop and authorities of the Catholic church: James McLaughlin, Devil's Lake (Fort Totten); W. T. Hughes, Standing Rock Agency.

The agency at Crow Creek was regarded as the largest and most important of those on the Missouri River, and was peopled by the Lower Yanktonnais tribe largely, though a sprinkling of other Upper Missouri tribes drew rations there. In the list giving the distribution of the agencies among the religious denominations, and the numbers of each tribe, the Crow Creek Agency is mentioned as the Upper Missouri, and its population is set down at 2,547, which had been the number supplied from that agency under Major Hanson, but a new division had given a portion of these Indians to Standing Rock.

On the date above named the Crow Creek Agency was seized—"pounced upon," as Secretary Schurz expressed it—without notice, by a squad of United States soldiers, under command of Lieutenant Dougherty, who suddenly appeared, and thrust into the hands of Agent Livingston a paper containing the following, bearing date, "Headquarters of the Military District of Dakota Territory, March 15, 1878:"

By direction of the general-in-chief, at the request of the interior department, the following named officers are hereby designated to act as Indian agents at the Indian agencies hereinafter named, to-wit: Capt. Theodore Schwan, Eleventh Infantry, Cheyenne Agency, Dakota Territory; First Lieut. W. E. Dougherty, First Infantry, at Crow Creek and Lower Brule, Dakota Territory.

TILDEN FOUNDATIONS

This order was all that was given to Major Cravens at Cheyenne or Major Livingston at Crow Creek. There had been no intimation from the Interior department that they were to be superseded. The proceeding was without precedent. The agent at Crow Creek was suddenly confronted by an armed force, and, figuratively, told to "throw up his hands." He was allowed to take nothing with him but his wearing apparel. All the papers, public and private, or personal, that had accumulated during the eight years of his residence as the agent there were seized, together with everything belonging to the agency. No receipts were given for the public or private property. Not the slightest courtesy shown.

Nearly a year prior to the violent seizure of the Crow Creek Agency had been spent by Hammond in his quiet efforts to get hold of tangible evidence of Livingston's alleged rascality, and in the meantime he had become quite intimate with Lieutenant Dougherty, who was stationed at Fort Hale, nearly opposite Crow Creek, and the twain were occasionally in conference.

The agency at Lower Brule, on the west side of the river and a few miles below Thompson, was taken possession of in the same manner a few days later by Lieutenant Dougherty during the temporary absence of the agent, Maj. H. E. Gregory, who on his return found himself homeless, with all his private effects as well as Government property, in the possession of the military. Dougherty exhibited his orders, and informed Gregory that he was removed. The seizure here, as at Crow Creek, included not only the agency property, but all of the agent's personal and private letters and other property.

Some twenty days later Gregory's private papers were returned to him, and he was informed there were no charges against him, but he was removed. This was the end of the matter in Gregory's case.

The trader at Crow Creek (Fort Thompson), E. E. Hudson, had about twelve thousand dollars worth of merchandise in his store. This was likewise taken forcible possession of, together with the trader's private papers. It was evident, from the seizure of the private effects and correspondence of the agent, that the responsible authorities who had authorized the seizure expected that some astounding disclosures would follow a summary seizure and an investigation of the papers of the former officials, and it now transpired that the superintendent of Indian affairs for Dakota, Gen. J. H. Hammond, had been nosing about the agencies and privately conferring with the employes for over a year, and he assumed that he had in this way discovered a scandalous state of affairs, which, however, could not be proved and punished, unless the agents were taken by surprise with the stolen property in their possession and the proof of their turpitude laid bare in their private correspondence.

The seizure of the trader's stock was presumed upon the theory that in his stock would be found many thousand dollars worth of stolen Indian goods. It had been taken for granted that the Indian trader made his money by stealing the goods furnished by the Government for the Indians and then selling them to the Indians. But in this case there was not so much as a string of beads or a yard of cloth in the trader's stock that he had not proof of purchase in his invoice bills; and all these papers were in Hammond's custody and in charge of the military people, who were practically acting under his direction.

Livingston made an effort to institute legal proceedings for the purpose of recovering his personal property, and also to compel Dougherty to receipt for the public property, and remained on the agency after his removal, and sent for Attorney S. A. Boyles, of Yankton, to initiate proceedings, but upon the attorney's arrival at the agency he was notified by Agent Dougherty that civil law had been superseded by military law at the agency, and no legal proceedings would be recognized coming from the civil courts. Hammond had now become a resident, practically, at Crow Creek, and refused to permit any legal papers to be served on the agency soil. After making this effort Livingston was ordered to remove from the reservation, which he did, returning to Yankton.

It became evident that in connection with the seizure of the agencies there had been a plan premeditated to give a biased account of the affair to the public through certain newspapers in Sioux City and Chicago, for the remarkable proceedings pursued by authority of the Government were sufficient to awaken widespread interest, and Hammond evidently believed that there would be some advantage in having the public opinion in favor of the arbitrary course pursued by giving out an exaggerated statement, impliedly founded on fact, but having not the slightest foundation except the suspicions of Hammond and Dougherty, which were never nearer confirmation than they were the day the seizure was made.

FARMER BROCKMAN'S STATEMENT

Congress was not necessarily in sympathy with the radical plan of the new secretary of the interior, but its members were annually treated to about the same character of complaints about the Indian service that had come to Mr. Schurz and controlled his action, and was ready to support any policy that would correct the abuses. The Crow Creek administration had been singularly free from these abuses for ten years, so much so that General Sherman, in his annual report for 1878, significantly excepts it from his list of the agencies whose agents were unable to keep their Indians under control, and the reason for this may be found quite largely in the public statement made by Henry Brockman, the farmer at Crow Creek under Livingston. Brockman was a very plain and candid man and of irreproachable character. He had been selected for his position by the consent of the church officials, who were largely responsible for the moral as well as the physical well-being of the Indians over whom they exercised supervisory control, and kept a close scrutiny of all their agency affairs. No neglect or abuse or wrongful act could have taken place without coming to their ears. Mr. Brockman stated:

The agency was suddenly seized on the 22d of March by Lieutenant Dougherty at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, Doctor Livingston having no previous intimation that forcible possession was to be taken. Lieutenant Dougherty and Durfee were accompanied by a squad of six soldiers. The keys to all the buildings and corrals were turned over that afternoon. A military guard was placed in the office and a military patrol walked about the enclosure.

Mr. Brockman stated that he had occupied the position of farmer at the Crow Creek Agency for the past five years. The Indians have been well cared for in every respect. "Seven years ago," he said, "there was not an Indian home upon the reservation, and now almost every Indian family is provided with a comfortable log cabin. The Indians have been well fed and well clothed, have been taught to work and are generally a contented people. No war parties have gone forth from this agency since Doctor Livingston took charge, and this is good evidence that their physical wants have been well looked after. Nine or ten years ago these Indians were a bad lot, and the progress they have made speaks well for Livingston's management."

A few days afterwards General Hammond arrived, and by his orders Mr. Brockman was arrested and taken to Brule Agency, on the opposite side of the river, and placed in the guardhouse. He was taken in custody by two soldiers and was told that his arrest was made on the charge of selling Government property. This was the last, however, that he heard of this charge. He was kept in the guardhouse two nights and one day, and during this time his deposition was taken. The object of these summary proceedings seemed to be to induce him to make statements derogatory to Dr. Livingston. General Hammond visited him and urged this matter upon him, saying if he did not tell the truth he would be a dead man. He was questioned about past contracts, particularly those for cutting hay. His deposition, when finished, contained no matter of any importance in sustaining any charges of wrongdoing. He was then released from the guardhouse, but was not permitted to go away from Brule Agency for a week afterwards, when he was placed under military escort, conducted to Fort Randall, and there released. His instructions were to get out of the Indian country.

(Brockman's deposition was never presented during any of the subsequent trials by the prosecution.)

It will be observed that all of these alleged offenses which were made the basis of the indictments found, nine in number, were based on transactions entirely disconnected with the papers and property seized. They were connected with transactions between Livingston and other parties, including Indians, and running lack through the entire term of the agent. It seems that Hammond and Dougherty had been made aware of the failure of the seized papers to disclose any criminal acts, and had gone carefully through the agency transactions, and, closely questioning the agency employes and the Indians concerning each transaction, had been able to collect in this way the material upon which a grand jury, which hears but one side of a case and allows no opportunity for explanation to the defendant party, could base an indictment. The testimony and incidents of the trial reveal this, and reveal also that Dougherty had coached his Indian witnesses in regard to the evidence they must give.

A newspaper correspondent, J. N. Rea, representing Chicago journals, was maintained at Yankton during the grand jury investigation of Livingston, and later during the trials, who sent out reports prejudicial to Livingston almost daily, receiving his information largely from the United States attorney who was the lawful counselor of the grand jury. Rea telegraphed in advance of any trial that the evidence against Livingston was voluminous, and that General Hammond, the Indian inspector had been before the jury two days. Also, that there were 140 witnesses summoned nearly all in the Indian cases. There were fifty Indian witnesses who had come with their tepees and other paraphernalia. Besides Livingston, every effort was to be made to indict his clerk and trader, and several parties at the Lower Brule Agency who were upset the same time Livingston was. This Mr. Rea was called the "spy of the grand jury room," as he was quite intimate with United States Attorney Campbell, with possibly Hammond as the go-between.

The United States court which convened in April, 1870, took up the trial of the Livingston cases early in the session, the first one being on an indictment charging him with issuing a false and fraudulent voucher. The petit jury for the trial of the case was composed of Lucius Kingsbury, John A. Stafford, David B. Conway, Thomas S. Peck, Charles Boerig, Robert Z. Barnett, Elijah S. Mosher, George Bolles, Thos. H. Abbott, Edward B. Cushman, Otto Holthe, Peter Burgland.

The cases were tried in the Second Judicial District Court, held at Yankton; Chief Justice P. C. Shannon, presiding. The first trial was called April 15, 1870. The indictment was for falsifying a voucher for $111.00.

The facts of this case were something like this: In an emergency steamboats had landed some Indian goods for Red Cloud Agency on a sandbar. Red Cloud Agency had been located on the west side of the Missouri River on Medicine Creek, a few miles below Crow Creek, and Livingston had been given temporary charge of it, it having been only recently established at that point, and the Red Cloud Indians at Pine Ridge had been required under the Black Hills Treaty to receive their supplies there where they could be conveniently landed from the steamboats, but President Hayes had already promised them that they might return to the interior of the reservation the following year, which gave to the Medicine Creek Agency a temporary character. In order to save the goods Livingston found it necessary to have them removed from the sandbar to the Medicine Creek Agency, and for this purpose he employed four or five men with teams. He paid $3 a day for teams, and $1 a day for each man. The charge of these parties, all told, amounted to $111.00. Saul Demans was the only one among the parties so employed who could write, therefore Livingston had the voucher made in Demans's name for all the men, which was an ordinary way. When the voucher was returned from Washington, a draft for $111.00 accompanied it.

Demans endorsed the draft, and the money was fairly divided among the four or five men entitled to it.

The jury returned a verdict of not guilty.

This was the first case and was selected by the prosecution as the strongest. If a conviction could have been gained in this case it would have been a great moral as well as legal victory. The jury after retiring, returned into court for further instructions as to the first two counts of the indictment. After receiving which it retired and in fifteen minutes returned with their verdict of not guilty.

The evidence showed a perfectly straight transaction; but the prosecuting attorney endeavored to magnify the signing of the voucher or draft into an act of forgery because Demans had signed his name differently to other papers. Demans was not a lettered man and it is doubtful whether he could write more than his name, which he wrote Demans and sometimes Demasn. He signed the papers under the direction of Agent Livingston. There was not the slightest evidence presented showing forgery.

This case exposed the weakness of the prosecution, for it had been heralded over the country (see the excerpt from the Sioux City paper), that there had been the most monstrous frauds committed at Crow Creek under Livingston amounting to scores of thousands, and here it was discovered that this strongest case did not pretend to charge any fraud whatever, nor any offense by which the Government or the Indians were to lose a penny. It was simply a desperate attempt on the part of Hammond and Dougherty to throw dust in the eyes of the public. It was a most villainous attempt to blacken an innocent man's character and the prosecuting attorney for the United States and the judge could hardly fail to observe it.

The second case was one that charged Livingston with collecting $225 on a voucher running to John Flury, agency herder, in 1873, and that of this sum Flury only received $111. The alleged transaction had taken place six years before the trial, and was outlawed, which Prosecuting Attorney Campbell must have known when he permitted the grand jury to find the bill, but he had another purpose in view. The trial proceeded until the prosecution had introduced all its evidence, which must have been of no value, for the prosecuting attorney then arose and abruptly stated that the case was outlawed under the law of limitation, and suggested that further proceedings be dispensed with.

To this the defense strenuously objected to being thus shut out, as it had abundant evidence to prove the innocence of the defendant, and urged that it was due the defendant, he having been publicly charged with a crime, to show the falsity of the charges.

In sustaining the prosecuting attorney, the judge stated that he was not concerned about the feelings or the character of the defendant and it was useless to take up time with a case that had no foundation. He instructed the jury to return a verdict of "not guilty." It was evidently the expectation of the prosecution, in this case, that Livingston would avail himself of the statute of limitation, and thus secure an acquittal, which would have been heralded to Washington and to the newspapers as a virtual victory for the prosecution. That Livingston, afraid of the exposure which a trial would have brought out, sought refuge behind the statute of limitation, and as the trial progressed until United States Attorney Campbell discovered that he had no case (which he probably knew beforehand), and no plea coming from the defendant concerning the outlawed character of the case, the prosecution, to choke off the defendant's testimony, was obliged to make use of the plea, and the court took the prosecutor's view of it.

Further quotations could be made from the three succeeding cases that were tried during this and the succeeding term of court held in the spring of 1880, but the reader may feel assured that none of them reflected upon the official conduct of the agent nor upon his personal probity. He was acquitted by the unanimous verdict of the jury in all save one case, the charge in which had been reduced by the prosecuting attorney from forgery to a misdemeanor. In this case under the strict ruling of the judge, the jury disagreed, the point at issue being whether the agent had followed strictly the instructions of the Indian bureau; but on the second trial of the same cases the agent was not only acquitted, but congratulated by the jury. Attention is called, however, to the important fact, that instead of the monstrous frauds which the public were led to expect from the newspaper articles which preceded the confiscation of Livingston's official and private papers, the entire amount of money involved in the five cases tried would foot up less than one thousand dollars, and the testimony was clear that every dollar of it was paid to the parties entitled to it.

It was a growing sentiment in the public mind that the "Livingston cases" were aimed at the Grant administration to show corruption in the Indian service. One of the Interior Department witnesses was said to have made a statement that one purpose of the court proceedings was to support the charge of Secretary Schurz, that the former administration had been flagrantly corrupt.

For these cases the witnesses were brought down to Yankton by private conveyances; the distance was not far from 200 miles, and their expenses paid while detained at Yankton, and then returned to the Crow Creek country. This expense the Government paid for its prosecuting witnesses, but Livingston was obliged to bear the burden of those subpoenaed at his request as well as the expense of the officers who performed the subpoenaing. It was a very heavy burden, for nearly all the cases occupied more than a week to each, and some of them two weeks. The prosecution possibly had this feature of the cases in mind as one circumstance that would prove to be in their favor.

The seizure of Trader Hudson's store was a sagacious move, according to the plans of Hammond. Livingston had been for three or four years surgeon at Crow Creek Agency before he became agent, having been appointed surgeon by Governor Faulk, who was ex-officio superintendent of Indian Affairs; and Hudson had been first trader's clerk, though practically in charge of the whole business, from 1866 to 1869 when he purchased the stock of Maj. F. J. Dewitt, the former trader, and thereafter conducted the business under a license issued to himself. Hammond and Dougherty knew enough about frauds at Indian agencies to know if there was fraud, the place to find it, unfaillingly, was in a collusion between the agent and trader, and by "pouncing upon" them both at the same time—securing all their goods and all their papers, public and private—they would have all the evidence needed to sustain the monstrous frauds foretold the year before in the Sioux City paper following the passage east through Sioux City of Superintendent Hammond.

No indictment was found against Hudson, but he was arrested on a complaint filed with United States Commissioner Congleton, charged with forging two vouchers. The case was heard by the commissioners. The information had been filed by Lieutenant Dougherty, charging that in October, 1875, Hudson fraudulently signed the name of James McGarry to a voucher and procured the money from the Government. James McGarry, the principal witness, testified in substance that he was employed as carpenter at Crow Creek Agency in the fall of 1875, and about October 8, he received a proposition to go to another agency. When he left Crow Creek the Government was owing him something over one hundred dollars for services, and the agent had no funds to pay his claim. Hudson, who was then managing Major Dewitt's store, advanced the money due him, and McGarry authorized him to receipt to the Government for the amount advanced, when pay-day arrived. Hudson accordingly signed the name of James McGarry to the vouchers, and received his money at the quarterly settlement. This is in substance what McGarry swore to.

Dougherty was then called as a witness. All he could say was that McGarry had made affidavit to certain statements before him, and that he (Dougherty), had embodied those statements in the complaint.

(This case would have been outlawed had Hudson cared to plead the privilege, but knowing the facts he was determined to have it fully investigated in order to show up the "bull-dozing" methods Dougherty and Hammond had been pursuing at Crow Creek in order to find pretexts for charging criminality.)

Dougherty must have known it was outlawed, and may have expected Hudson to plead this in order to escape investigation.

It will be observed in this case that McGarry had made no complaint against Hudson, but he had been approached by Dougherty and asked about the transaction. And Dougherty, who was called as a witness, was obliged to testify that he had made the complaint himself after his conversation with McGarry, and finding grounds, as he supposed for a charge of forgery when he learned that Hudson had signed the receipt for the money as instructed by McGarry.

Dougherty, at this trial, also presented a number of other signed vouchers, twenty-two in all, where Mr. Hudson had signed the names of H. D. Booge & Co., and F. J. DeWitt, the traders. At the time the vouchers were made these parties were proprietors of the trading store, and Mr. Hudson was their manager and had authority to sign their name. It would seem that in this matter the prosecution had entirely lost its head, and desired only to breed some sort of a scandal.

The United States commissioner, after listening to an exhaustive investigation, conducted on the part of Dougherty by United States Attorney Campbell and his assistant, I. E. West, decided that there was no foundation for the case and dismissed it.

The value of the goods belonging to Hudson that were "pounced upon" by Hammond and Dougherty, was about thirteen thousand dollars. They were taken to Yankton and stored by the Government. The flour and hides were sold by the Government for $3,000 and the money withheld.

Mr. Hudson visited Washington in May for the purpose of having his goods released, as a valuable portion of them were deteriorating in value. The commissioner of Indian Affairs openly insulted him when he stated his business, accusing him of being connected with murders and various minor offenses. Mr. Hudson had been a resident of Illinois, and enlisted from that state and served during the Civil war. He had been introduced at the Interior Department and the Indian office by United States Sen. David Davis of that state, and by Delegate Kidder, of Dakota, also. A member of the House from Illinois told him that "if he was an honest man, he was to be pitied, as it was the honest men who suffered now-days."

Mr. Hudson had also been ousted from the postmastership at Crow Creek, and he visited the Postoffice Department where he was well received, his explanation listened to, and he was reinstated in the position.

It was presumed that the Government contemplated procuring authority from the courts to authorize the confiscation of Hudson's stock, as a penalty for trading without a license, but as the proceedings advanced, Hammond and Hayt fell into disrepute and were turned out of office, and the vindictive policy was abandoned, completely vanquished. Hudson was finally able to have the remainder of his goods sold at a sacrifice, and received whatever they brought, but he was subjected to a loss of several thousand dollars, and had no recourse.

Such an inquisition under such circumstances might have been worth the while if in the end the victims had been rewarded for the integrity shown in their long public service and the people been made acquainted with the truths brought to light by the inquisition, and the persecuted parties restored to their places with the commendation of the Government for their faithful and efficient service; but such deserved vindication was denied. Defeated, baffled, and demoralized at every point, their calumniators and persecutors sought to leave a taint of suspicion by abandoning some untried cases, on the implied plea that the popular prejudice was too strongly in favor of the accused to secure a just verdict. The remainder of the cases, whatever they were, and they must have been more flimsy than those which had been given the preference, were never brought to trial; the indictments were quashed a year or more later; and the accused agent left to bear the financial burden of an expensive contest involving the transportation and keeping of scores of people from distant agencies whose testimony was wanted to clear away the fog which the prosecution was an adept in producing.

The United States grand jury that had been summoned for the spring term, 1870, was rather abruptly discharged on the 12th of April, and a local paper, commenting on the event, said:

We know no reason for the involuntary and unreasonable discharge of such an exceptionally able, impartial and fearless jury, but we can do no harm in stating that the prevailing opinion about the city is that they were about to begin an inquiry into allegations of criminality made against General Hammond and other officials, which proposition did not meet the sanction of the United States district attorney, hence their summary discharge.

This was claimed to be the prevailing opinion regarding the abrupt and unnecessary winding up of the grand jury proceedings, and no denial of it was made by the members of that body, though their oaths required them to keep secret the proceedings within the grand jury room, which they were inclined to do. Hammond, at that time, was at the beginning of the end of a singularly torturous career.

During these court proceedings a vacancy occurred on the board of education of the City of Yankton, and the city council, as an evidence of its confidence in Doctor Livingston and as an acknowledgment of the esteem in which he was held, elected him by a unanimous vote to fill the vacancy.

The petit jurors in these Livingston cases were from all sections of the territory. The reader who was acquainted in the territory at the time will recognize names from Brookings County, Lincoln, Beadle and other counties. These jurors were summoned by the United States marshal and the method was the same as the one still pursued, which was to take one or two from a county, seldom more. No partiality was extended to the county where the court was held. There was no charge that the juries were "packed," but the prosecuting attorney, Campbell, alleged in his affidavit for a continuance, that there was a prejudice against half-breed and Indian evidence, and if it was practicable to print this evidence herewith, the reader would doubtless share the prejudice. From one to two weeks were consumed in taking the testimony in each case.

The proceedings in these cases attracted widespread attention. Witnesses were brought from Washington, as well as from the various Indian tribes; from the half-breed people; from all the disgruntled elements which make up the hangers on about Indian agencies. The trials were the culmination of a year or more of plotting, followed by the sudden seizure of all the private property, letters, and documents of the agent, Livingston, as well as the trader, Hudson, the purpose being to get absolute control of every avenue where a shred of implicating evidence would be likely to have an abiding place, and leave the accused parties no opportunity whatever to secrete or destroy such implicating evidence, so that having their victims by the throat thus ensnared, the exposure of their perfidy could be made undeniable and complete, and the transgressors brought before the bar of justice, where they could be confronted with their iniquities, convicted, disgraced, and adequately punished. And it was most remarkable that with all this secret plotting, with complete control over the persons and effects of those they sought to defame and punish, after ransacking to the utmost the correspondence seized in such manner, and obtaining interviews with scores of people with whom the agent had transacted the ordinary and important business of the agency for many years, many of whom may have been afflicted with a grudge, they were still unable to sift out the slightest semblance of dishonesty or wrong doing; but on the contrary only proved to the unprejudiced world that their official as well as private and personal transactions had been throughout, clean and upright, untainted by either legal or moral wrong doing. Even the majority of business men, of unquestioned probity, conducting a business of their own through a series of years, would not wish to invite such an abrupt seizure of their personal effects and private business correspondence, to go before an unfriendly inquisition without explanation, and upon the result of such investigation risk their reputation for honest dealing and straight forward business methods; and the disadvantage is not lessened in the case of an Indian agent remote from civilization, transacting the daily and complicated affairs of thousands of uncultured people, where the liability to mistake and to misunderstand is largely increased.

The War Department, which had not given up its fight for the control of the Indians was not averse to lending its aid to oust Indian agents appointed by the civil authority, or in exposing them in their unlawful practices. The defendant in this case appears to have been opposed by both the Interior and Judicial departments of the Government, who were apparently governed by a preconceived belief that being an Indian agent he must be a rascal; which opposition became more pronounced as the several indictments were prosecuted, and one after another of the trials ended with the verdict of "not guilty." The zeal of the prosecution seemed to increase with each failure to convict, until the personal element of prejudice became quite conspicuous. It finally appeared that the local prosecuting machinery felt that its standing at the departments in Washington would be seriously and detrimentally affected if a conviction on some of the numerous indictments was not secured. Witnesses were sent on from Washington, who during their sojourn betrayed the desire of their superiors for conviction, and paid correspondents were present connected with the metropolitan newspapers who daily sent out gross misrepresentations of the evidence submitted. It was not known, however, that the local prosecutors were held responsible at Washington for the ignominious termination of the suits. That was attributed to the vicious public sentiment prevalent in this portion of the West. Certainly the local prosecutors made every effort to convict, and were openly charged in court with the most unscrupulous conduct, and yet they failed in every instance to establish the slightest criminal charge, though they succeeded in burdening an innocent man with a load of anxiety that seriously affected his health, and compelled him to spend much time and a large portion of his worldly wealth, to defend the several suits.

Hammond continued in the Indian service for some time after these court proceedings and the supposed temporary discontinuance of the prosecution, for at that time there was no hint of the abandonment of the remaining cases, but Hammond's activities were transferred to other territories, Utah being one. It was while thus engaged that a serious controversy and disagreement occurred between Commissioners Hayt and Hammond, and the latter disappeared entirely from Government employment. He was next heard from in Manitoba, where he was promoting a railroad enterprise. In the course of his business he visited Ottawa, Canada, while parliament was in session, and was given the privilege of the floor. He claimed to represent the Manitoba and Southwestern Railway. His conduct became offensive. He had an altercation, resulting in a fist fight, with a member, and the result was that the speaker ordered his arrest in case he made his appearance upon the floor again. He was also forbidden entrance to the House or grounds. Hammond claimed that the member struck him first, and he had to defend himself.

About four years had elapsed since a number of parties, to-wit, H. W. Bingham, agent, Robert Cox and J. C. Robb, traders, Kirk and Lowe, J. Lawler and others, were indicted for various offenses while serving the Indians at the Cheyenne Agency. (Bingham preceded Cravens as agent). They were indicted on charges made by J. H. Hammond, the superintendent, in 1879. In April, 1883, at a term of the United States Court at Deadwood, no trial having been undertaken, United States Attorney Campbell moved that the several indictments against these parties be dismissed, and ordered erased from the docket, which motion was granted by the court, W. C. Church, presiding judge.

Indian Commissioner Hayt was indicted by the grand jury of Hudson County, New York, charged with defrauding the public through the medium of the International Trust Company of Jersey City, in 1879. The charge was, as president of the company, he knew his company was insolvent, but at the same time solicited the deposits of children and laborers. The trust company did an insurance business and operated a savings bank, and had been closed as insolvent. Hayt was acquitted on the trial of the case.

A few months later the following official document appeared in the telegraphic columns of the newspapers:

Washington, D. C., January 29, 1886.

Sir—It has become my duty to inform you that the public interest demands a change in the commissionership of Indian affairs, and that your further services in the office are dispensed with.

C. SCHURZ,

Secretary of the Interior.

To E. C. Hayt, Washington, D. C.

William J. Vance, of West Virginia, was appointed commissioner of Indian Affairs, to succeed Mr. Hayt.

CHAPTER LXXIX
INDIAN TROUBLES ON THE RIVER JAMES

1878-79

INDIAN WAR ON THE JAMES RIVER—DRIFTING GOOSE A TROUBLE MAKER—SETTLERS DRIVEN OFF AND SURVEYORS COMPELLED TO QUIT—DRIFTING GOOSE HAS PALE FACED FRIENDS—GENERAL SIBLEY WRITES A LETTER—THE INDIANS CLAIM THE LAND WAS NEVER CEDED—JUDGE KIDDER'S IMPORTANT DECISION THAT THE SIOUX SURRENDERED THE LAND BY THE TREATY OF 1868—PRESIDENT HAYES GRANTS THE INDIANS A RESERVATION AND THE WHITES ARE ALARMED—THE FIRST MAIL SERVICE FROM YANKTON TO JAMESTOWN.

Serious trouble with the Indians was encountered by the early settlers of the James River Valley north of Firesteel, and particularly those who came into the country in 1878-79 and 1880, and made settlement in Spink and Beadle counties. These immigrants came in quite largely through the Kampeska or Watertown gateway, and took up lands along the valley that were then being surveyed.

To understand the conditions existing at the time the reader should be reminded that as early as 1863, before there was a white settlement in that section, the "dirt lodges" on James River had acquired a notoriety as the abode of a comparatively numerous body of Indians, presumably from Minnesota, who had built a number of substantial dirt lodges on the banks of the James River in Township No. 117, probably, as subsequently surveyed, some of them large enough to accommodate seventy-five or one hundred people. (See this history for the year 1863 for full description.) This village was occupied by the Indians and their families, and had probably been in existence a score of years. A small farm was cultivated by the squaws, some corn, squash, pumpkins, potatoes, and other vegetables produced. Whatever may have been the original purpose of the founders of this village (it was called the "Dirt Lodge Village"), at the time Dakota was opened to settlement and the serious trouble with the Indians began in 1862, it was known as the rendezvous of hostile Indians, who in small bands infested the settlements, plundering the settlers and on occasions committing atrocious murders. As these depredations became known, the military people who undertook to pursue and capture the perpetrators, would almost invariably trail the retreating band to the dirt lodges, to find there a number of old men, also squaws and papooses, who would know nothing of any war parties, but were there leading a peaceful and quiet life, very much annoyed at the coming of the pale-faced soldiers, and drawing rations and other supplies from some of the Indian agencies or supply depots in Minnesota. No warrior Indians were ever discovered there, but a lookout station erected in the village indicated that the warriors were enabled to detect the approach of a hostile force when many miles distant, giving them ample time in which to seek a safe refuge. This village occupied ground near where the earliest settlement of Spink County was afterward made, and was said to have been known as the Jim River crossing by the early itinerant Indian traders. It appears to have been practically abandoned by the Indians and possibly partially dismantled before the whites came in; and as the settlers came and took up land the village plot was included by some of these in their pre-emption or homestead. It does not appear that the Indians made any claim to the ground occupied as their village, based on their right of occupancy, but having no further use for the rendezvous at that point, voluntarily abandoned it.

Among these warrior Indians, inhabitants of the old village, were a number who held the "old camp ground" in grateful remembrance: "though lost to sight—to memory dear." A number of years elapse before the whites begin the settlement in the country at and surrounding the Dirt Lodge Region. In the meantime a notable Indian war has raged and the Indians have been brought into subjection; a number of military posts have been erected on the Missouri, James and Big Sioux rivers, garrisoned with soldiers; the Minnesota Indians have been removed to Dakota, and nearly all the Sioux Indians of every tribe had been settled on reservations in the territory with established agencies on the Missouri River. The Lower Yanktonnais Tribe, which had been among those accounted hostile, had been located at the Crow Creek Reservation (originally set apart for the Santees and Winnebagoes), and one of its bands under a wily chief called Drifting Goose (Indian name: Mada-bo-des or ba-da), with his band numbering about two hundred people, had made a summer residence on the James River some seventy-five miles from the Crow Creek Reservation, and about twenty miles north of the old original Dirt Lodge Village, probably about 1870. It will be well to bear in mind that Drifting Goose and a number of his followers were among the former warrior inhabitants of the old Dirt Lodge Camp of Refuge. Subsequent events justify such an opinion.

There are circumstances connected with this Drifting Goose movement and its subsequent career that indicate something more than a summer village for himself and band, in their new James River settlement, and that white men of prominence and influence had formed a plan that would enable the Indians to secure the withdrawal of a large tract of land along the James Valley, to be given to them as a separate reservation—the purpose of it to be developed as the plan matured.

When the immigration to that region by the whites began in 1878, it was discovered that Drifting Goose denied that the land belonged to the Government, and refused to give way to the settlers who were moving in. Drifting Goose first held that when the land was ceded by the Yanktons in 1850, the Yanktonnais Tribe did not join in the treaty, and never consented to it, therefore the land still belonged to the Indians.

In June, 1878, G. C. Williams, register of the Watertown land office, referred written complaints from two settlers in the neighborhood of the new Drifting Goose Village to the department at Washington. The papers were sent by the commissioner of Indian affairs, Mr. Hayt, to Lieutenant Dougherty, agent at Crow Creek Agency, with orders to investigate and remove the Indians to Crow Creek. Dougherty visited the village, and then informed the commissioner of Indian affairs that he found there about forty Indians in thirteen lodges with Drifting Goose. Four log houses had been built; fifteen acres of corn was under cultivation. Drifting Goose told him he obtained rations from Sisseton. Gabrielle Renville had assisted the band from the supplies of his own people. He claimed the lands as his own and that the Yanktons had sold it to the Government, but without his consent. Dougherty explained the sale of the land to the old chief, and also informed him of the order to return to Crow Creek. Drifting Goose parleyed, and said he would have to see Renville at Sisseton. Later in the fall Drifting Goose and his people were removed under protest, to Crow Creek, by a squad of men sent out by Dougherty, and remained there all winter.

These lands were surveyed during the summer of 1878, by Thomas F. Marshall, deputy United States surveyor, then of Yankton. Mr. Marshall subsequently settled at Oakes, Dickey County, north of the famous 46th parallel, and became one of the early members of Congress from the State of North Dakota. A letter from Mr. Jacob Zielach, who was one of Mr. Marshall's surveying party, dated in September, 1878, tells of the lawlessness of these Indians at that time, and their determined opposition to the survey and settlement of the country. A portion of his letter is given herewith:

General Beadle arrived here yesterday, and as the man who brought him starts back in the morning, I thought I would write you some Indian news. About two weeks ago some Indians undertook to steal our horses. They got one pony when we commenced shooting at them. The pony either broke loose from the Indians or they concluded it was getting too hot for them, and let him go. The pony ran back to our camp, and the Indians got away.

A week ago yesterday two Indians and two white men came to our camp while we were out in the field, and told our cook to tell us that we must get out of the country; that we had no right here; that this country belonged to them; that we could not survey this country. We thought they were trying to bulldoze us, but we did not bulldoze worth a cent. The next day two Indians caught one of our men, Mr. Sutley, and stripped him of everything he had on him, and told him to "git." He "got," and they commenced shooting at him. He was four miles from camp and ran all the way in barefooted. He was scared nearly to death, and has not yet wholly recovered from his fright. He lost a watch worth $40 and $5 in money. He was riding a pony which threw him when he was attacked, and ran back to camp.

The Indians told us the dirt lodges were fifteen miles north of us. We have a township line to run right through their camp, and we are going to run it tomorrow. This will decide whether we can stay here or not—whether we can do this work or must draw off. They can't talk us out of it, that is sure. I do not think there is any such place as the dirt lodges. We have been all over the country where they were reported to be. We have found plenty of places where Indians have camped, but no signs of any dirt lodges.

Marshall went ahead with his surveys. There were about seventy-five Indians in the Indian Village at the time, and they objected strongly to the survey, believing that it meant their early removal, and even threatened Mr. Marshall and his men with bodily injury; but the intrepid band concluded to survey or fight and if necessary, do both; therefore preparatory to entering the classic shades of Dirt Lodge, every member of the party buckled on his revolver, and shouldered his rifle, carrying his professional equipment as best he could, and thus arrayed, the order to "forward march" was given, and Marshall and his clan moved forward into the village. The enemy, composed of both sexes and papooses, hung about the entrances to their domiciles, but observing the preparations for trouble the white invaders had made, gratified their cruel and bloodthirsty nature and longing for fresh scalps, by sullen mutterings; an occasional gesture, and a vindictive demeanor. They did not lift a hand to interfere with proceedings. These lodges were in township 117, north range 63 west, sections 19 and 24. There were twenty tepees; 10 dirt lodges, and some stables. The Indians had a farm under cultivation embracing about forty acres; planted largely to corn; with some potatoes and garden truck. Section 24 contained about one hundred acres of good timber, principally ash.

These Indians were known to belong to the Yanktonnais Tribe whose home was on the Crow Creek Reservation; but had been roaming at large for ten years or more in the uninhabited country where they were now found, living on the James River during the warm seasons and going into Fort Thompson for the winter. They numbered about two hundred and drew rations indiscriminately at Fort Thompson, Sisseton and Grand River agencies. While Crow Creek or Fort Thompson was under the control of Dr. H. F. Livingston as agent, he represented their case to headquarters and received an order to bring them into the limits of his reservation. While executing his instructions the order for bringing them in was countermanded by the Indian commissioner, based on representations made by Major Hamilton, then agent of the Sissetons. This proceeding encouraged the Indians to believe that the Government recognized their right to the country, and as these efforts to remove them to their proper home on the Crow Creek Reserve were repeated, without effect, it became apparent that the Indians were sustained by white influences that controlled the situation, and the object in view was to secure the withdrawal of land in that rich and growing section which was to be set apart for these Dirt Lodge people.

That the situation was serious is evident from the fact that in the winter of 1878-79, Governor Howard, who was then Dakota's executive, was appealed to by parties who had been compelled to abandon their improvements in the valley by the "Blowing Goose" Indians (Blowing Goose was an alias of Drifting Goose), and go to Wah Bay. They desired to learn from the governor whether they or the Indians were to be permitted to occupy that country. It was a case where the governor was powerless to afford any relief, except to report the matter to the Indian Department, which he did.

For a year or two prior to this time, quiet efforts had been making headway to secure from the Government a recognition of the Drifting Goose claims to land on the James. It was claimed that Bishop Whipple, General Sibley, Byron M. Smith, and others favored this claim. And in December, 1878, Mr. Hayt, commissioner of Indian affairs, sent the following communication to Agent Dougherty:

Sir: Referring to your report, dated July 25th last, in regard to the Chief "Drifting Goose" and his band, on the James River, I have now to transmit a copy of a letter, dated November 25, 1878, addressed to Gen. H. H. Sibley, St. Paul, Minnesota, by Lieut. M. Burns, Seventeenth Infantry, and copy of the general's endorsement upon the same. It appears from the communication of that officer that he made a personal visit to the camp of "Drifting Goose" and has changed his views since his visit in regard to these Indians, and for reasons that seem to be very satisfactory, strongly urges that they be permitted to remain on James River, and that they be protected in the possession of the lands which they are now cultivating. He suggests that these lands be set apart, five or ten miles square, as a reservation for them.

You will also notice the statement made by General Sibley, and his suggestion to the same effect, and it is deemed best in view of the facts presented to reconsider the matter, and, if there are no serious objections to the recommendations referred to, that measures be taken to afford the protection which they desire.

You will therefore give the subject early attention and report the exact location of these Indians, the particular township which they occupy, or may require, defining the boundaries of the same explicitly, and forward a recommendation (if, as suggested, you deem it proper), that the President may be requested to set apart the land so defined, by an executive order, as a reservation for their benefit.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HAYT,
Commissioner.

The letter of the Sisseton agent to General Sibley contained an earnest defense of the Drifting Goose claims to land on the Upper James River, and requested the general to interest himself with the authorities at Washington in their behalf. The general, ever ready to support the just claims of Indians of all tribes, forwarded the letter to Washington endorsed as follows:

St. Paul, Minnesota, November 20, 1878.

This communication is respectfully forwarded to Hon. Carl Schurz, secretary of the interior, with an earnest request that he will give it a favorable consideration. He will doubtless recall to mind the fact that I have already presented the case to him as an exceptionally meritorious one, and ask that the Indians in question be protected in possession of the land, which they have possessed and partially cultivated for so many years, also that the heads of families be given the benefits of the homestead laws, if not inconsistent with their provisions.

HENRY H. SIBLEY.

Agent Dougherty, of Crow Creek, replied to the letter of Lieutenant Burns in a communication to the commissioner of Indian affairs, denying claims of Drifting Goose so far as they were based on the settlement, improvement and cultivation of the land, and concluding his letter with allusions to the individuals composing the Drifting Goose party, which is here reproduced, as follows:

This band of Indians has given me a great deal of annoyance about their land. For the last three or four years they have lived over there in a precarious manner, begging, hunting and marauding. When winter approaches they scatter to the agencies in Dakota and Minnesota, and regularly return to the same place on the James, where they establish a summer camp as soon as the grass is green. Thence the adventurous spirits sally forth to the settlements and remote agencies to beg and rob. Several of the band are known to have been concerned in atrocious murders in Minnesota and the Red River country. Two of them were apprehended a few years ago near Fort Pembina, for the murder of a whole family on Red River, and were confined in the guard house at Fort Pembina, where they broke out, and one of them was killed by the guard. There are very good reasons for suspecting one of this band of the murder of I. C. Johnston, who was killed sometime since near Fort Sully. He has since fled to Sitting Bull's camp. (Brave Bear—tried and executed at Yankton.) They have repeatedly interfered with the work of surveying parties, and warned away settlers from the country. Next spring these immigrants will return in greater numbers and prepared to defend their rights, and I regard it as greatly to the disadvantage of these Indians to place them in competition or contact with this increasing population. If these Indians are permitted to return they must be, as heretofore, wholly beyond the reach of law or discipline, and their camp will be the rendezvous of every Indian horse thief, robber and murderer on the east side of the Missouri.

This report seems to have satisfied the Indian office that Drifting Goose had no claim to lands on James River based on settlement and cultivation, or any other lawful foundation, and Dougherty was instructed to refuse him permission to return there as the country had been largely occupied by the new settlers, and the Indians would be apt to cause serious trouble. Drifting Goose was greatly angered when informed of the orders from the commissioner, but made no attempt to defy the authority of the Government. He went off west of the Missouri and remained several months, and the affair appeared to be settled. In the meantime Drifting Goose's Camp and the valley of the James for many miles was settled upon by the incoming settlers.

This was the situation when in July, 1879, President Hayes issued the following proclamation:

Executive Mansion, Washington, June 27, 1879.

It is hereby ordered that townships 119, 120, and 121, north, of range 63 west, in the Territory of Dakota be, and the same are hereby set apart as a reservation for the use of the Mga-bo-des or Drifting Goose band of Yanktonais Indians.

R. B. HAYES.

This proclamation was received at Fort Sisseton first, and by the agent at Sisseton communicated to the agent at Crow Creek, which indicates that the Sisseton influence had brought about the issuance of the document, from which there was no appeal. Acting Agent Dougherty received instructions at the same time to permit the return of Drifting Goose and his band to their James River Reservation, with provision and clothing.

He made a roll of the band and it was found to number 108 souls. About forty of them refused to go back.

On the return of the Indians to James River their first demand was that all whites who had settled upon the reserved lands should be expelled.

That the reader may not misjudge the motives of President Hayes in setting apart these townships it should be borne in mind that the encouragement of the Indians to take up land for the purpose of tillage and pasturage, was the leading feature of the peace and industrial policy, and it doubtless occurred to the President that it did not matter much where the land was located if it was unincumbered public land. The entire Crow Creek Reservation had been public land, ceded by the Yankton Tribe in 1858, and subsequently withdrawn from market for an Indian Reservation, so that Mr. Hayes had substantial precedent for his action; and it is probable that the plats in the land department at Washington at that time showed the entire acreage of the Drifting Goose Reserve, vacant. The President should have been informed of the fact that the land he withdrew was in part already occupied by white settlers and was directly in the track of the incoming people whose numbers at that time and in that locality were taking up a township in a single week.

554 N. CHOTTBELL, ALONG A WOODLAWN

With a reservation of 65,000 acres of the choicest land in the valley, accorded them by the Great Father at Washington, the Drifting Goose Indians felt greatly elated and became obstreperous. They assumed that they were monarchs of the soil, and they concluded that their first duty was to eject the white invaders at the earliest possible moment, and with this purpose in view, they began a system of depredations and annoyances upon the property of the white settlers that inaugurated a reign of terror throughout the valley, particularly among the new comers who had wives and children.

Fear seized not only upon the settlers who had taken claims on the Drifting Goose Reservation (and that had nearly all been taken up by the whites), but upon hundreds below; and as a consequence the settlements were largely depopulated; some abandoning their claims, and others retreating to Watertown and vicinity to await the outcome of some amicable adjustment of the embryonic war.

The first white settlers to occupy lands in this portion of the James River Valley were a Mr. Slack and family, Mr. W. H. Hedges and Mr. C. B. Foster, who had been employed at Sisseton Agency, who went in during the spring of 1878. Their settlement was some miles north of the Village of Drifting Goose, on the river; after they had begun improvements and their corn was partially grown the Indians came in and drove them from their houses, and they were compelled to seek refuge in the white settlements twenty miles east. As heretofore stated the Indians were removed during the fall to the Crow Creek Reservation, and the settlers received assurances that they would not be annoyed by them in the future. Those who had been driven off returned and hundreds more came in during the fall of 1878, while the immigration in 1879 was very heavy. The Indians had abandoned their settlement in the valley for good, as it appeared, until this untimely proclamation of the President appeared in July, 1879, while, in the meantime nearly all the land in the tract covered by the President's order had been taken up by settlers, who had their first intimation that their lands had been given to the Indians when a band of nearly two hundred under Drifting Goose suddenly made their appearance in the valley, scattering themselves along the river for many miles. They entered the houses of settlers when the men were not at home, insulted and hustled the women, forcing the women to cook for them. They boldly entered the corn fields, husked the corn and carried it away in sacks. They informed the settlers that the country was theirs and all the whites would be compelled to leave; that the agent from Sisseton was coming over and would put them in possession. The result was to break up the settlements, all the families and many others leaving and sought refuge in Watertown, expecting that the Indians, emboldened by their success in securing permission to live in the valley would break out in open war on the settlers, and add a massacre to their other offenses.

Agent Crissey, of the Sisseton Agency and Agent Dougherty, of Crow Creek then came over accompanied by a special representative of the Interior Department, and called the Indians in council at Foster City, a town on the James that had been located by the new settlers and had been made the county seat of Spink County. The agents designed to put the Indians in possession but their plan was not such as the Indians had expected. They were told that the situation was entirely different from that represented to the President; that the Indians would not be permitted to dispossess any white settler who had moved there in good faith, and was engaged in improving his land. Further that the Indians were entitled to such land as they had improved by cultivation or had made other improvements upon; and finally that the purpose of the Government was not to give the tribe a large tract of land to be held by them in common, as that would interfere with the design of the Government, which was to permit the Indians to select claims here and there among the whites with a view of receiving instruction and benefit in their industries from their civilized neighbors, and have the advantage of the common schools for their children. To all of which the Indians entered a vigorous and prolonged protest. They would take no lands as individuals. Finally Agent Crissey told them they would have to return to Crow Creek and await further advices from the Great Father. That they would be notified of the Great Father's instructions, and would then be permitted to take such lands as would be allotted to their several families. The council then dissolved. The Indians refused to return to Crow Creek, and Agent Dougherty gave them two days' rations in case they concluded to return, and left them while the Sisseton agent notified them that he would send a company of troops after them and compel them to return.

This was practically the termination of Indian troubles on the James. The Indians would have been permitted to select claims on the "reservation," under an agreement to reside upon and cultivate them; they would undoubtedly have received material aid from the Government for a number of years had they shown a disposition to help themselves, as they were desired to do. This, however, seemed farthest from their intention, and they reluctantly and sullenly abandoned the places which had occupied their time and ambition for a number of years, and undoubtedly returned to their reservation, and if they have survived, they have undoubtedly been allotted a land and a home on the Crow Creek Reservation.

It is evident that the ground claimed in 1879 by Drifting Goose was not the same as that occupied by the original village in 1863, which was visited by Captain Tripp with a detachment of Company B, Dakota Cavalry, when in pursuit of the Weiseman murderers, though Drifting Goose may have been with the Indians who then occupied it, and were supposed to be Yanktonnais. Drifting Goose claimed to have resided on his land for thirty years, and was supported in this claim by Byron M. Smith, who knew him in 1857, during the years of the earliest settlement at Sioux Falls. This thirty years settlement would have been made about the year 1849, and was about the time of the founding of the old village in town 117.

In 1873, W. C. Smart took the first settlers into that section, and these located the Town of Frankfort or Ashton, near the old Dirt Lodge Village, which they found deserted and practically destroyed. Drifting Goose, in his claim made in 1879, may have assumed that the precise locality of the original village was of no consequence as their residence there and cultivation of the soil gave them the right to a large section of that country which no treaty had deprived them of.

The term "Earth Lodges," or "Dirt Lodges," applied to this modern settlement of Drifting Goose, was a misnomer, for they did not build any dirt lodges, but as shown by Captain Dougherty, built a few log buildings. The Drifting Goose Village was in town 120, range 62, and probably in the Fargo Land District.

It so happened that settlers had been pouring into the Valley of the James in such numbers, prior to the promulgation of the President's order withdrawing the lands that a large portion of the reservation had been occupied. Eighty families, in one colony from Minnesota, located at the same time, and a large proportion of the valley land along the river for thirty miles was taken up. A county government had been organized for Spink County, and the county seat, Ashton, located in town 117.

Regarding Bishop Whipple, General Sibley, Byron M. Smith and Lieutenant Burns and their interest in Drifting Goose and his band, in this matter, there is no doubt whatever that they were governed by the best of motives in whatever they did to promote the ambition of the Drifting Goose band of Indians. The "Peace Policy" was then "on duty" wherever the Indian was domiciled and manifested the slightest disposition to undertake the task of becoming civilized, and a leading feature of this policy was to induce the Indians to select a tract of land and make a home upon it, and cultivate it with the substantial assistance of the Great Father. The bishop and General Sibley had been life-long friends of the red man, believed he had been unjustly treated by the Government's agents, and that much of our Indian troubles could have been avoided had an honest and prudent course been pursued by those acting for the Government. But their friendship did not extend further than to give the Indians every reasonable opportunity to make a home for himself and substantial assistance in getting started. They undoubtedly expected, in recommending Drifting Goose to the favor of the Government that he would be informed that he might have land, and assistance, but not if he was inclined to spend his time in idleness.

FIRST MAIL ROUTE FROM YANKTON TO JAMESTOWN

The first mail service established in the James River Valley above the mouth of the Firesteel, or rather above the Town of Firesteel, was instituted about the first of July, 1870, Brinkerhoff and Jordan, contractors, who were then carrying the mail from Yankton to Firesteel in four-horse coaches.

The first section of the route above Firesteel covered a distance of 130 miles to Foster City, which was in the vicinity of the place known as Dirt Lodges, claimed by Drifting Goose and his band, and was within the limits of the three townships set apart by President Hayes June 27th, for the use of Drifting Goose and his people. All the land in the three townships mentioned, it was claimed, had been settled upon by white men before the presidential edict was issued, and these settlers determined to hold their claims should the Indians return in the spring, and make an effort to dispossess them. The valley is one of the choicest agricultural sections in the United States, in the opinion of the settlers. The mail from Firesteel to Foster City was run semi-weekly and was carried on a first-class buckboard.

Settlements extended at that time thirty miles above Foster City but from that point to within ten miles of Jamestown, a distance of ninety miles there were no settlements, and the stage or mail road for this distance was first broken by the mail vehicle and was laid along the east side of the river and the east bank of Lake Te-han-chi-ca-hah (Sand Lake), which at that time was a body of water nine miles in length, narrow, and swarmed with water fowl. The east bank of the river was found to be sloughy for a good portion of the distance to Jamestown, and a better road was subsequently found on the west side. On the Jamestown end light wagons were used from Jamestown to the end of settlements coming south, and from that point the mail was carried on horseback. During the year following the valley was substantially settled along its whole length between Yankton and Jamestown, and for some distance above Jamestown. It was alleged that the townsite interests were planning to have all the timber in that region set apart for the Indians. The James River Navigation Company was running a line of steamboats during the season of navigation from above Sand Lake to Grand Rapids in LaMoure County. The Richmond townsite was at the foot of Sand Lake.

IMMIGRATION

Immigration was very active in 1878. Immigrants came into the territory through all the gateways from the mouth of the Big Sioux to Pembina in surprising numbers, and thousands upon thousands of homesteads were taken up. The importunity of homeseekers was so determined and persistent that land officers and court officials having authority to make out the preliminary papers were frequently routed from their beds to accommodate parties who felt that a night's delay would give rival claimants an opportunity to file ahead of them. A similar rush was in evidence at the offices at Yankton, Watertown, Fargo and Bismarek.

Immigration poured in until it passed beyond the surveyed lands, and claims were taken in many cases haphazard. To relieve this situation, Congress had enacted a law permitting the claimants of land to deposit a sum of money with the surveyor general of the territory sufficient to cover the cost of surveying a township, about four hundred dollars, and that official would then order the survey extended. The surveyor general would issue a certificate when the money was deposited, and these certificates were made receivable in payment for the land in case of commutation, and could also be transferred to other parties. Under the provisions of this law many thousand acres, particularly in the northern part of the territory were surveyed but unscrupulous parties took fraudulent advantage of the privilege to such an extent that Congress found it expedient to repeal the law later.

Immigration into the Upper Big Sioux Valley during 1878 was quite active. A large German colony settled in Deuel and Codington counties, along the line of the new Northwestern Railroad which had been opened to Lake Kampeka. The settlers were largely from Minnesota, Wisconsin and Iowa, excellent farmers.

Immigration was brisk into Beadle, Thompson and Mills counties, then unorganized, all lying in the Valley of James River. Northwest from Watertown, toward the Northern Pacific Railroad, a steady stream of newcomers was observable during the summer, well equipped with household stuffs and farming implements and a few cattle. Thompson and Mills counties received new names from a later Legislature of which neither Messrs. Thompson or Mills were members. There were six new counties organized in 1878, namely, Codington, Grant, Barnes, Deuel, Hamlin, and McCook.

There was great activity in common school expansion in 1878. The number of schools increased over 20 per cent in some counties, and scores of new districts were organized. Gary, Deuel County was founded in 1878. A newspaper called the Inter-State was then established there by Fred I. Bowman, of Prairie du Chien, Wis. Gary adjoins the Minnesota-Dakota boundary line.

GROWTH OF DEADWOOD

Lawrence County developed with remarkable rapidity. Its lawful settlement began in February, 1877, immigration, however had been flowing in for several months prior, and some improvements of a temporary character had been made. In May, 1878, its first assessment was made under the territorial law. Deadwood was then a city of about seven thousand people, estimated; this population was, however, largely transient or shifting. The Homestake mines at Lead had been taken over by a rich California company headed by George Hearst, afterward United States senator from that state, but the mine could not have been much improved when the assessment of the county was made. The assessment of the property yielded an aggregate of $1,573,167; and this valuation had been so very moderate that the county board felt it their sworn duty to increase it in many particulars. There were at that time nine precincts in the county, and the assessment returned for each precinct or town footed up as follows, to-wit: Bears Gulch, $10,845; Lead, $260,073; Central, $397,910; Gayville, $159,835; Deadwood, $524,285; Elizabethtown, $61,675; Galena, $39,540; Spear Fish, $54,959; Crook City, $64,045.

CLAY COUNTY PROGRESS, 1877-78

In the beginning of settlement by the whites in Dakota, and until after the Civil war had closed, there were doubts in the minds of many who had taken up lands in the territory whether the soil, climate and natural conditions were such that farming could be pursued with even ordinary success. Clay County was one of the sections earliest settled, and her people were troubled with the same perplexing questions which had arisen because of the unfruitful season they had experienced, attended with drouth, early frosts, floods, Indians, blizzards, etc. But they lived through it all, and in the end were quite successful. In 1877 the then settled portion of the territory was in a position, viewed as an agricultural region, to send out a guarantee to whomsoever it should come, greeting, that Dakota was the peer of any portion of the United States. The conditions existing in 1877 in Clay County were typical of those prevalent in all the settled counties. That county was organized in July, 1862, with a population of less than one hundred. It embraced 240,000 acres, all tillable. The first school district was organized the same year, when there were only twenty-five children of school age in the county. In 1877 it contained 6,000 inhabitants, and 1,657 children of school age; it contained fifty-four school districts, and employed forty-eight teachers the year round. Vermillion, the county seat, was practically destroyed by fire January 13, 1875; but had been rebuilt more substantially than before, and contained 1,000 inhabitants. The choice land in the county had about all been taken up under the homestead and pre-emption laws. The majority of the farmer settlers were Skandinavians, who were frequently referred to in eulogistic terms for their enterprise, morality and public spirit. In the fall of 1877, from the crop of that year, there were shipped from Vermillion 435,000 bushels of wheat, 9,230 sacks of flour, and 33,000 bushels of oats. During the year 700 cattle and 750 hogs were shipped to Chicago, and 400 cattle and 800 hogs slaughtered to meet the home demand. Forest culture had been receiving general attention, and by the close of this decade half the farms in the county would have an abundance of cultivated timber for all domestic purposes. The Dakota Southern Railroad passed through the county from east to west, and two other roads were projected—an extension to Vermillion of the McGregor and Western, and a connection with the Northern Pacific Railroad by way of the Vermillion River Valley. Experiments in fruit culture had been gratifyingly successful. During this season the county had suffered the loss of many grain fields as a result of one of the most destructive hail storms that had visited the territory.

GOVERNOR PENNINGTON'S ADMINISTRATION

Governor Pennington's administration terminated April 12, 1878. Taken altogether it was quite creditable and generally satisfactory to the people. He not only gave intelligent attention to the duties enjoined upon him by law, but he took an active, leading, and successful part in all matters that promised to benefit the people. He had no ambition for any other office. He was public-spirited, and expended many thousand dollars of his private fortune, during the first years of his administration, in substantial improvements at the capital in the way of business houses and residence buildings. He was conspicuous in his friendship for the territory, and tireless in his efforts to induce immigration. He was always found among the optimists in whatever promised to promote the general interest. It was reported, at the time the appointment was made, that the President had charged him with the mission of harmonizing the warring political elements in the territory, by bringing into one fold the factious republicans who had by their long continued personal contests, destroyed the republican organization and transferred the control to the democrats, as was evidenced by the election of a democratic delegate to Congress. This mission the governor set to work upon shortly after his arrival in the territory and unquestionably was able to lay before the factionists some very substantial reasons why they should get together, for we find that the factional dissensions ceased from that time, and the campaign of 1874 saw the republican party united with Judge Kidder as the candidate for delegate, and from and after that there was no further "split" in the party.

Pennington's re-appointment was supported by Dakotans; but the new President, Mr. Hayes, had an old and tried friend whom he wished to recognize in the person of Hon. William A. Howard, of Michigan, to whom the appointment was given, and fortunately the selection was in every way one that proved of advantage to Dakota.

Governor Pennington was not ambitious to go to Congress, and he had sufficient tact to keep aloof from any and all alliances that would provoke sectional or factional animosities. As a whole his administration was attended with much that marked it with lasting credit. The Black Hills matter came up early in his term and was practically settled just about the time his tenure expired. He had been instrumental in aiding the settlement of the problems presented, in a manner highly satisfactory to the people.

WILLIAM A. HOWARD, GOVERNOR

There had been a number of governors of Dakota Territory before Governor Howard came. His inauguration, however, was the first one that was attended with ceremony of a public character. It took place at the executive office in Yankton, on Friday, April 12, 1878, where a large number of the citizens of Yankton assembled to greet and have a look at the new executive, who had been known by reputation throughout the nation as a citizen of high attainments, distinguished for valuable public services rendered in war and in peace, and had earned the gratitude of his countrymen by a well ordered life devoted to the betterment of whatever public interest he had been called to serve. Chief Justice Peter C. Shannon was present, to administer the oath; but preceding this ceremony an address of welcome was spoken by the retiring executive, Governor Pennington, as follows:

Governor Howard: I welcome you to the duties, cares, responsibilities, and to the honors and emoluments of the executive office of this territory; and I congratulate the people and myself that we are committing its responsible duties to one so entirely competent to perform them, and to one who will so eminently dignify the position. During a residence and public service of over four years among these people, I have received nothing but courtesy, kindness and the most generous hospitality from the entire respectability and intelligence of the territory, and as a citizen and in their name I pledge for them and myself the same open, manly, frank and generous treatment for you as my successor.

We who come to this frontier country as strangers, are not long in ascertaining the fact that, notwithstanding we are on the very outpost of civilization, all the professions and pursuits of business as well as those social relations that make up refined society, are represented by men and women who are the peers of the best people to be found among the older communities of the East; and that so far from that wild life of deprivation and discomfort that most of us expect, we find the usual comforts, elegancies, and refinements of the older settled portions of the country, together with a thrift and prosperity seldom to be met with elsewhere, certainly not to be found anywhere west of the Mississippi River.

And now, governor, with these remarks I welcome you to our young and growing territory; I welcome you to the cares and the honors of this important office, the duties of which you are about to assume, I trust, and have no doubt that you will find these duties pleasant and agreeable; and hoping also that we may be able to throw sunshine along the social pathway of yourself and family, and render all future recollections of your residence among us pleasing to you and to them, I now resign this chair and the duties it involves into your hands; again congratulating the citizens of Dakota and myself that I am succeeded by one so eminently worthy of our confidence and support.

Governor Howard's reply was extempore. In substance, he first expressed his gratitude for the attentions he had received, and extended his personal thanks to Governor Pennington, saying that he had received at his hands every courtesy which one man could give another, under similar circumstances. He was gratified at the cordiality and confidence of the people. As to the duties of the office, he did not think it proper to make promises in advance. He had reached that period in life when he had expected not to hold another public office—he had said that there was no position within the gift of the Government which would tempt his acceptance. Health had become the leading purpose of his life. As to money, he had become very rich in economical habits, and by the use of these habits he thought he had enough to carry him through. He sought neither honor nor profit, but if our climate would bring him health his labors would be freely given toward making Dakota one of the grandest states in the Union. He cared not for ephemeral honors; for titles; there was something better to be sought for. If he could fulfill the duties of his office as satisfactorily as had his predecessor, he would consider himself fortunate. His single aim would be to help achieve a great future for Dakota. Nature had done her share toward that end. It remained for the people to do theirs.

The oath of office was then administered by Chief Justice Shannon; the new governor was given a cordial round of hand shaking, and possibly the best, taken altogether, of Dakota's territorial executives, was installed.

Concerning Governor Howard's wife, who aided largely in making her husband's administration one of sterling worth to the people, and highly honorable, we have nothing better than an excerpt from a letter written by a Washington friend who was intimately acquainted with the family during its residence at the capital. The writer says:

Governor Howard has one of the dearest little angelic dumplings of a wife. She is small and plump, and has a round baby face, big blue eyes, and hair as white and fine as frost. She wears it in a low coil, and curled about her face, and she is always knitting on things. All sorts of soft socks, blankets and hoods, come like magic from her dimpled fat hands. She has a string of poor people always on hand, and although she is always doing, the string is never shortened, and rain and shine, church and prayer meetings, temperance or Bible readings, are attended to first. In waterproof gum shoes, and umbrella, she has faced the tempest this winter, when in a whole household, not one, young or old, thought they could venture out to see the sick. Among the savages and wild people of the territory, Mrs. Howard will be in her element. Nursing sick papooses, making the savage lords wear flannels for possible rheumatism, seeing that the squaws bathe three times a day, in cold water, and wear thick shoes, will be a small part of her labors; and in intelligence, beauty and refinement, sympathy and gentleness, no governor's wife in the whole land will stand higher than the beautiful old wife of the new governor of Dakota.

During the spring and summer of 1878 there was more than the customary interest manifested in the approaching political conventions and the candidates for delegate to Congress, an office that would be filled at the next November election. Judge Jefferson P. Kidder, of Clay County, was the incumbent and was serving his second term. He had given general satisfaction as delegate, was a candidate for a third term, and was probably the choice of a majority of the republicans. But this did not deter the friends of other aspirants from urging the claims of their favorites. The people of the Black Hills were now a factor in territorial politics; had become a part of political Dakota since the election held two years before, and in proportion to their population they had a larger proportion of experienced politicians and voters than the "cow counties" as the inhabitants of Eastern Dakota were familiarly referred to. The hills people claimed to have one-fifth the voting population of the territory, and with the precociousness that characterizes youth and confidence, they demanded that the delegate be taken from that section. Their candidate was the federal judge, Granville G. Bennett, of Deadwood. Col. G. C. Moody, of Yankton, who had been a prominent leader of the party for many years and at one time the candidate of one faction for delegate, had a numerous following throughout the territory; and it was reported on creditable authority that there had been some understanding among the leaders two years before that Moody should be given the republican "right of way" for delegate in 1878.

When the convention assembled in August Judge Kidder was said to have nearly one-half its membership, and there was little doubt about his nomination except in the councils of Bennett's and Moody's friends. The proceedings of the convention show that these factions controlled throughout and virtually worked in harmony.

The republicans of the territory met in delegate convention at Yankton, the territorial capital, on Thursday, August 29, 1878, for the purpose of nominating a candidate for delegate to Congress. The convention was composed of 139 delegates, representing thirty counties, whose names appear in the report of the Committee on Credentials. The Black Hills counties were represented for the first time in this territorial gathering, and as a rule their delegates were all present, and proved themselves no amateurs in the art of practical politics. The convention was held in the courthouse. It was the most numerous body of representative men ever gathered together in Dakota.

The convention was called to order by Col. G. C. Moody, chairman of the Central Committee, and after roll call, Alexander McHenry, of Cass County, was elected temporary chairman, and Col. C. V. Gardner, of Lawrence, temporary secretary. A Committee on Credentials was then appointed consisting of A. W. Hastie, of Lawrence; Fred Cross, of Custer; F. T. Evans, of Pennington; Wm. Elliott, of Clay; G. W. Kingsbury, of Yankton; W. F. Dunham, of Lincoln; Judson LaMoure, of Pembina; J. E. Burbank, of Richland; and E. A. Williams, of Burleigh. After recess, the Credentials Committee presented the following report of persons entitled to seats in the convention:

Armstrong County, W. H. Spooner, proxy, C. T. McCoy; Bon Homme County, A. F. McAuley, Joseph H. Petak, Jacob Robbins, Ed F. Hughes, Chas. Boerig, Christopher Suess; proxies, L. D. F. Poore for Robbins; J. H. Stephens, Mallaban, proxy for Mosher; Yankton County, Newton Edmunds, Jacob Brauch, H. B. Wynn, J. R. Gable, L. Congleton, Joseph Peir, Geo. W. Kingsbury, W. H. H. Beadle, Ole Sampson, Clark West.

E. Bailey was admitted as a delegate from Morton County, and D. C. Thomas from Hamlin County.

The Committee on Resolutions was composed of W. H. H. Beadle, Alex. Hughes, G. W. Harlan, G. R. Hildebrand, F. J. Cross, S. S. Adams, E. A. Williams, G. W. Walsh, C. Morgan.

The Committee on Permanent Organization, A. F. McAuley, R. F. Pettigrew, J. A. Wallace, F. T. Evans, F. J. Cross, J. P. Belden, L. N. Griffin, W. H. Woodruff, J. E. Haggart.

The Committee on Permanent Organization reported recommending Col. W. H. Parker for chairman, and E. A. Williams and W. H. H. Beadle, of Yankton, for secretaries. The report was adopted. General Beadle withdrew as secretary, and G. W. Kingsbury was appointed.

Nominations for delegate in Congress being in order, the names of the following persons were formally presented as candidates: G. G. Bennett, of Lawrence County; W. P. Dewey, of Yankton County, presented by Stutsman County; J. P. Kidder, present congressman; G. C. Moody, of Yankton.

The sentiment of the various delegations was presumed to be divided among the leading candidates as follows: The vote of a number of the northern counties was cast for Mr. Tyler of Cass County, for a number of ballots, and when he was dropped Colonel Lounsberry, of Burleigh County, was voted for. The counties finally voted:

For Kidder—Barnes, 2; Bon Homme, 6; Burleigh, 6; Clay, 10; Codrington, 1; Grand Forks, 4; Lake, 1; Lincoln, 10; Minnehaha, 10; Morton, 1; Moody, 3; Pembina, 3; Richland, 3. Total, 60.

For Bennett—Cass, 4; Custer, 4; Lawrence, 20; Pennington, 5. Total, 34.

For Moody—Armstrong, 1; Brookings, 2; Cass had 7 votes, 4 went to Bennett, 3 for Moody; Charles Mix, 1; Davison, 1; Deuel, 1; Hanson, 1; Hamlin, 1; McCook, 1; Traill, 3; Turner, 5; Yankton, 10. Total, 30.

The informal ballot resulted—Kidder, 59; Moody, 31; Bennett, 30; Dewey, 5.

First formal ballot—Kidder, 60; Bennett, 30; Moody, 30; Tyler, 16; Dewey, 3. Necessary to a choice, 70.

A number of ballots were taken without disclosing any significant change. The seventh ballot stood, Kidder, 62; Moody, 29; Bennett, 30; Tyler, 18. Mr. Tyler was a Cass County citizen.

The convention then took a recess until 8 o'clock P. M.

After recess the convention entered upon the eighth ballot which resulted, Kidder, 60; Bennett, 57; Moody, 20; Lounsberry, 2.

The significant change here was the transfer of ten of Moody's votes from Union County to Bennett, as it had been the Moody delegates that had been most conspicuous in the efforts to defeat a renomination of Mr. Kidder, and before the vote was announced Hutchinson County changed three votes from Moody to Bennett, which was followed by a number of changes to Bennett, and finally Yankton County joined in the stampede; but before any announcement of the vote was made, Williams, of Burleigh County, moved that the nomination of G. G. Bennett, be made unanimous. The motion prevailed, and Granville G. Bennett, of Lawrence County, was declared the unanimous nominee for delegate to Congress.

The claim was made after the convention adjourned, and found its way into the newspapers, that during the tumult that attended the change of votes, Judge Kidder at one time had a majority, and that he was nominated. Mr. E. A. Williams, of Burleigh, one of the secretaries, and a Kidder delegate, who kept account of the balloting and changes as they proceeded, called for an unanimous vote for Bennett when he discovered that he had a majority, and he would not have missed an opportunity to have made a similar motion for the nomination of Kidder had that candidate at any time received seventy votes. The incident, however, left an unpleasant feeling in the minds of the Kidder men, which was largely shared throughout the territory by the friends of the defeated judge.

It will be observed that Colonel Moody was a member of the nominating committee from Yankton County. The colonel was an influential member and at the critical time gave his support to Bennett and secured his nomination. And it will be further observed that Bennett resigned his judgeship after being nominated and Colonel Moody was appointed to succeed him.

Clay County resented Kidder's defeat, as unfair, by opposing Bennett throughout the campaign, and though having a fair majority for the republican candidates, as a rule, gave a majority at the election for Bartlett Tripp, the democratic candidate.

The Committee on Resolutions presented the following, as the platform of the territorial republican party, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we hold an undoubting faith that the better judgment of mankind approves the record of the republican party in patriotism and civil achievement, and the humane and lofty principles which in times of public trial created and inspired it.

Resolved, That to be and continue a great nation the United States must be a government founded throughout upon principles of law which make citizenship honorable and secure to it all its franchises and privileges, and which secures free suffrage, keeps untrammelled all political rights and responds to loyal fealty with every means necessary to promote its honest welfare.

Resolved, That we pledge the republican party of Dakota and its representatives in whatever department, to advance with all its zeal the promotion of these ends and the development of the territory, to build up free local government, enact wise and wholesome laws, enforce strict economy in public expenditures, extend the blessing of education and make pure and liberal the safeguards of society, and lay broad and deep the foundations of our growing commonwealth.

Resolved, That we present to the people of the territory the name of Hon. Granville G. Bennett, for delegate to Congress, and under his leadership we congratulate the people on the certain assurance of republican victory in every county throughout the territory.

Alexander Hughes, of Union, was elected chairman of the Territorial Central Committee by the convention, and the following names were appointed members of that body—four from each Judicial District, to-wit:

First District—(Black Hills)—John Hildebrand and Mr. Marshman, Lawrence County; F. J. Cross, Custer County; E. VanCise, Pennington County.

Second District—E. B. Dawson, Clay County; R. F. Pettigrew, Minnehaha County; G. C. Moody, Yankton County; W. M. Cuppett, Lincoln County.

Third District—E. A. Williams, Burleigh County; Geo. H. Walsh, Grand Forks County; Alex. McHench, Cass County; T. S. Collins, Cass County.

A brief address of acceptance by Judge Bennett, the nominee, closed the proceedings, when the convention adjourned.

Mr. Bennett had been judge of the First District and a citizen of Clay County, prior to being assigned to the Black Hills in 1877, and was highly regarded by the people of all sections.

SETTLEMENT OF ICELANDERS

In the early modern settlement of the Red River Valley by the agricultural class, the Icelanders performed a conspicuous part, coming by way of the North from Hudson Bay and from the Fatherland, and also from the Icelandic settlement in Wisconsin, where they had been living as sojourners. These people appear to have performed the same kind of valuable service for the Red River of the North Valley, and particularly for Pembina County, that the Scandinavians, Bohemians and German Russians did for the counties bordering the lower James River Valley a few years earlier. They endured all the privations incident to opening up a new country in a much severer form than was experienced by the southern pioneers. They were poorly provided with money and equipment for the arduous work, and the locality of their pioneer experiences was remote from other settlements and market places. They were meagrely supplied with the ordinary comforts of domestic life, almost empty-handed, but fortunately endowed with rugged constitutions hardened to privations in the inhospitable island where they first saw the light. They were frugal from life-long habits, temperate, industrious, Christians of the rigid Orthodox faith and practice, punctilious in the observance of the requirements of their church, intelligent and fairly well educated, while a number had attained respectable rank as scholars. And all this they had acquired before leaving the Fatherland, which notwithstanding the rigors of its climate and the poverty of its soil, was dear to them and they loyally remembered it. They were clannish, as nearly all foreign nationalities are during the lives of the first generation.

A colony of these people direct from Iceland, reached Washington Island, in Northern Wisconsin, in the summer of 1871. There had been a settlement of their countrymen in that section for a number of years; but this colony was headed for the North Pacific Railroad country, and Pembina County was their destination.

A settlement was made by these people in Pembina County as early as 1878; a number of natives of Iceland who had first settled in Manitoba near Lake Winnipeg, to which point they came direct from the old country, were led out of that section by Rev. Paul Thorlaksejn, Fridjohr Fridericksen, Samson Bjornason, Johann P. Hallson, Magnews Steffanson, Arni Bjornson, Jon Hingdal, Gisli Eigilsson, Jonas Jonsson being the pioneers, some of them with their families. The settlement was made near the headwaters of the Tongue River. The community began the cultivation of the soil the first year of their arrival. Some land was broken up, and in 1879 a small crop of wheat was produced, but it is related that the colonists were compelled to put themselves on short rations during the winter succeeding. Further additions were made to the population in 1879, and new settlements were formed in the same portion of the county. Jon Bergisson from New Iceland on Winnipeg Bay, and Butler Olsen came out from the settlement in Wisconsin, together with Olsen Siginjon, Semineson and Benedict Johannesson. These early farmers hauled their wheat to Fargo to market. In 1880, New Iceland, on Lake Winnipeg, sent up a large number of settlers, induced by the favorable reports received regarding the fertility of the soil and salubrity of the climate on the American side. And 1880 was a very fruitful year. The Icelanders prospered and were proportionately happy. They were good farmers as a rule. The first church was organized in 1880, under the direction and pastorate of Rev. Pall Thorlakssen, who had been the leader as well as pioneer of the settlement from the first. Thorlakssen died in 1882, and Rev. H. B. Thorgrimson succeeded him. The settlement continued to grow and thrive until the Icelanders were in political control of five townships in the county, Pembina having adopted township organization. Schools were established as early as 1881 and the school officers were native Icelanders, but conformed to the territorial law regarding common schools, scrupulously.

The Great Northern Railway was built up through Pembina County in 1881, and gave the farmers a nearer and more profitable market for their grain.

In politics, the Icelanders are said to scrutinize the records of men and parties closely, and vote for men and measures on merit and not as partisans. They are respected as among the best citizens of the county, and their settlements are a credit to the commonwealth.

DEMOCRATIC TERRITORIAL CONVENTION

A call for the Democratic Territorial Convention was proclaimed July 24th, calling the convention at Yankton, August 29th. Delegates were apportioned as follows:

Armstrong County, 2; Burleigh, 4; Barnes, 1; Bon Homme, 5; Brule, 1; Brookings, 1; Clay, 5; Custer, 3; Cass, 2; Codington, 1; Charles Mix, 1; Davison, 1; Deuel, 1; Grant, 1; Grand Forks, 1; Hutchinson, 1; Hanson, 1; Lincoln, 5; Lawrence, 22; Lake, 1; Minnehaha, 24; Moody, 1; McCook, 1; Pembina, 1; Pennington, 5; Stutsman, 2; Richland, 1; Sully, 1; Turner, 3; Traill, 1; Union, 7; Yankton, 8. Total, 95.

The convention assembled at Yankton on the 29th, and was called to order by Capt. F. M. Zeibach, chairman of the Territorial Committee, who presented Hon. J. W. Turner, as temporary chairman of the convention, and he was duly elected. C. H. McKinnis, of Lawrence County, was chosen secretary. Responding to the wish of the convention, the chair then appointed the following committees:

On Credentials—First District, John Manning, Jerome Hollenbeck, C. W. McKinnis; Second District, M. H. Day, F. E. Foster, Miles Russell; Third District, J. A. Emmons, Aleck McKenzie, D. W. Maratta.

On Resolutions—First District, Robert Neil, C. W. Meyer, John Manning; Second District, S. L. Spink, D. M. Inman, Jerry Gehon; Third District, Dan W. Maratta, J. A. Emmons, Aleck McKenzie.

On Permanent Organization—First District, C. H. McKinnis, Robert Neil, John Conway; Second District, A. Boynton, H. W. Corson, George Stickney; Third District, D. W. Maratta, Dennis Hennefin, Aleck McKenzie.

The only avowed candidate for the nomination of delegate before the convention was Dr. C. W. Meyer, of Lawrence County, and it was evident that the convention, and even the delegates from his own section, were displaying no effort in his behalf.

The Committee on Credentials reported the following delegates entitled to seats in the convention:

Armstrong County, C. J. Rardin, Frank P. Baum; Burleigh County, D. W. Maratta, James A. Emmons, Aleck McKenzie, Dennis Hennefin; Brule County, D. W. Spaulding; Bon Homme County, C. T. Campbell, C. S. Rome, H. E. Bonesteel, E. G. Armstrong, Frank Richmond; Brookings County, William Wagner; Clay County, Marcus Robbins, Jacob Pruett, George M. Kimball, Miles Russell, H. P. Lounsbury; Cass County, H. S. Back, George Egbert; proxy, Maris Taylor; Charles Mix, Felicia Fallas; proxy, M. H. Day; Custer County, Thomas Foley, W. E. Hoffman, J. C. Sanders; Davison, H. C. Greene; proxy, S. L. Spink; Hutchinson, A. E. Parmenter; Hanson, Frank B. Foster; Lawrence County, Robert Neil, C. W. Meyer, C. H. McKinnis, J. Hollenbeck, Frank Abt, William Nelson, H. Wilkinson, J. McDermott, Eugene Wood, W. G. Gates, George Wustum, H. B. Beaman, S. P. Romans, J. M. Murphy, Thomas Tarpy, John Conway, C. C. Higbee, C. W. Anderson, H. C. Clark, L. M. Stone, M. W. Robinson, T. J. Webster, John Manning; Lincoln County, Abe Boynton, J. V. Conkling, Jerry Gehon, O. D. Hinckley, J. S. Kibby; Lake County, Lewis E. Gibbs; Minnehaha County, W. H. Corson, William Howie, J. Huntamer, W. G. Blow, C. K. Howard, proxy for Howie, and J. Huntamer, for Blow; Moody County, William Jones, proxy, C. K. Howard; Morton County, F. F. Gerard, G. Hamon, proxy, J. A. Emmons; Pennington County, D. W. Flick, C. L. Wood, J. N. Dedrick, W. H. Beedle, N. Newbanks, proxy, C. H. McKinnis; Stutsman County, D. M. Kelleher, J. W. Goodrich, proxy, D. W. Maratta; Turner County, John W. Turner, J. Murphy, J. Johnson; Union County, E. W. Miller, G. W. Kellogg, J. Ryan, George Stickney, Vincent LaBelle, E. B. Wixson, Cyrill Montague; Yankton County, S. L. Spink, F. M. Zeibach, L. B. Partridge, J. R. Sanborn, A. M. English, J. Brinkerhoff, J. B. VanVelsor, Charles VanEpps; Codington, Deuel, Grant, Grand Forks, Pembina, Richland, Sully, and Traill counties, entitled to one vote each, were not represented. Emmons County was given two votes, and the report was adopted.

The Committee on Permanent Organization reported recommending C. W. Meyer, of Lawrence County, for president of the convention, and D. W. Inman, of Clay, and J. A. Emmons, of Burleigh, secretaries. The report was adopted.

On motion of Oliver Shannon the convention then proceeded to the nomination of a candidate for delegate to Congress.

Dan W. Maratta, of Burleigh County, presented the name of Bartlett Tripp, of Yankton, for nomination; and J. W. Turner seconded the nomination, and moved that Bartlett Tripp be declared the unanimous choice of the convention for delegate. The motion of Mr. Turner was unanimously agreed to, and Bartlett Tripp was declared duly nominated.

A committee consisting of Robert Neil, D. W. Maratta, and A. Boynton was appointed to notify Mr. Tripp of his nomination.

Dr. C. W. Meyer, of Lawrence County, was elected chairman of the Democratic Territorial Committee.

The Committee on Resolutions submitted the following report, which was adopted as the party platform:

Resolved, That the withholding from settlement of large tracts of land within our territory and reserving the same for the use of roaming bands of savages is detrimental to the best interests of the people, not only of Dakota but of the whole country; that these lands of Indians should be removed to the territory set apart for their use or confined to smaller tracts of country, and the balance of such reservations opened to settlers under the pre-emption and homestead laws of the United States.

Resolved, That all military reservations in Dakota should be of the smallest practical dimensions, leaving the largest possible area of lands for the benefit of the actual settlers from the overcrowded communities of the East.

Resolved, That we deprecate and condemn the policy adopted by the national administration, of filling all the important offices of the territory with non-residents—men who have no interests in common with the people, and no knowledge of their wants and necessities.

Resolved, That Dakota Territory, having been organized for more than seventeen years, and having at the present time a population of more than one hundred thousand inhabitants, has within her limits men of sufficient ability and integrity to fill all her offices, from the lowest to the highest, and that sound policy would dictate that her officers be selected from her own people.

Resolved, That the Legislature about to be elected should take as a basis of apportionment in the Council and House of Representatives, the vote actually cast by each county at the last election preceding such apportionment, and every organized county in the territory should be represented in the Territorial Assembly.

Resolved, That in presenting to the voters of Dakota, as our candidate for delegate in Congress, Bartlett Tripp, of Yankton County, a man whose interests during a residence of ten years have been identified with those of the whole people, we are affording a sufficient guarantee to the whole people, electors of our territory, that their interests in Congress will be faithfully and efficiently guarded, irrespective of section or locality.

Resolved, That we cordially invite men of all parties who endorse the principles above enunciated to unite with us in securing the triumphant success of our nominee at the polls next November.

The following Territorial Central Committee was then appointed. First District, W. S. Kuykendall, W. C. H. McKinnis, Lawrence County; Doctor Flick, of Custer, and N. Newbanks, of Pennington.

Second District—Abe Boynton, of Lincoln; F. M. Zeibach, of Yankton; D. M. Inman, of Clay, and E. W. Miller, of Union.

Third District—John P. Dunn, and Wm. Thompson, of Burleigh County; George Egbert, Cass County; D. M. Kelleher, of Stutsman County.

Bartlett Tripp then appeared before the convention and in a brief speech accepted the nomination and promised to make a thorough canvass of the territory during the campaign. The convention then adjourned.

It was generally conceded that the democrats had made a wise choice in selecting Mr. Tripp as their candidate. He was their strongest man before the people and possessed the esteem and confidence of thousands of republicans.

Owing to the open disaffection in the republican ranks, especially in Clay County, growing out of the defeat of Judge Kidder by reputed unfair means, there was a strong probability that the election was to be a close one. The vote of the Black Hills, claimed to be about four thousand, so far as it had been tested in the local election of 1877, the only election that had been held in that portion of the territory, was decidedly democratic.

The campaign that followed was spirited and marked with intelligent energy on behalf of the candidates, both of whom were able men, and popular with the masses. The Black Hills vote was relied upon by the democrats to turn the scale in their favor; the eastern and northern settled portions of the territory being regarded as safely republican, though Mr. Tripp had the support of influential elements among the republicans of the eastern counties. It was a strenuous campaign and the principals in the contest gave their whole time to the contest, and spoke at nearly every road crossing as well as at the larger settlements of the territory. The estimated vote of the territory was 20,000, which seemed to be justified by the influx of new people into every portion of the territory where settlements could be expected, especially in the Black Hills.

At the election in 1876, the total vote of the territory was 8,552 given by the various counties, as follows:

Armstrong, 69; Burleigh, 449; Barnes, 50; Bon Homme, 629; Brule, 17; Brookings, 76; Clay, 843; Cass, 364; Charles Mix, 69; Davison, 24; Grand Forks, 124; Hutchinson, 125; Hanson, 38; Lincoln, 883; Lake, 17; Minnehaha, 871; Moody, 153; Pembina, 207; Richland, 128; Stutsman, 150; Sully, 30; Turner, 336; Traill, 161; Union, 1,214; Yankton, 1,492.

Election in 1878 occurred on Tuesday, November 5th, and resulted in a republican victory, Bennett being elected by a majority of 1,962, out of a total vote of 10,076, as canvassed by the territorial board, which is best shown in a list of the counties, as thereby information of the growth of population in the various sections can be obtained. The official list follows:

County	Bennett	Tripp

When the territorial board canvassed the vote in December following, it threw out the vote of Brule, Grand Forks, and Lake counties. Brule County vote had been canvassed by two officers of the county; the law requiring three. Grand Forks canvass had been made by admitting a justice of the peace instead of one of the county commissioners to their canvass; and Lake County because the returns showed that both Bennett and Tripp had received the vote of the county as candidates for the Legislature.

The total vote of 1878 showed an increase of voters over the vote of 1876, of more than 10,000, a little over one-half of which was cast in the Black Hills counties. This would leave something over five thousand increase east of the Missouri River, and indicate an increase of 25,000 in population in the agricultural sections of Northern and Southern Dakota. The voting population of the Black Hills was much larger in proportion to the whole population, as is invariably the case in mining countries, than in the agricultural regions.

The Legislative Assembly of 1876-77 enacted a law providing for the election of a district attorney in 1878, for each Judicial District, and thereafter, for each Judicial District, and also providing that the office of county district attorney should cease after 1878. The district attorney became the prosecuting officer for all the counties in the Judicial District for which he was elected. There were at that time three judicial districts. The Black Hills region had become a part of the Territory of Dakota after the law was enacted; but provision had been made in the law for the first district to include the Black Hills in such contingency; the third district included all north of the 46th parallel of latitude, and the second district all south of the 4th parallel east of the Missouri River, except the counties of Gregory, Todd, Lyman and Presho and included the counties of Todd, Gregory, Lyman and Presho, west of the river. Edwin Van Cise was elected the first district attorney of the First District; Ellison G. Smith, of Yankton, was elected the first district attorney in the Second District; and John A. Stoyell, of Bismarck, the first in the Third District.

HAYES IN DAKOTA

The President of the United States, Rutherford B. Hayes, with Mrs. Hayes, paid a visit to Dakota in 1878, accompanied and escorted by Governor Howard, whom he had recently appointed governor, and with whom he had enjoyed many years of personal acquaintance. Both were veteran generals of the Civil war. Accompanying the presidential party were a number of notable citizens of the United States, southern and northern, eminent in war and in Congress. The entire party numbered about one hundred persons. General Sibley, of Minnesota; the governor and senators of Minnesota; Senator Butler, of South Carolina; Col. Ben. Yancey, of Georgia; Governor Smith, of Wisconsin, and Hon. J. V. Farwell, of Chicago.

The arrival at Fargo occurred at half past 8 o'clock in the morning and breakfast was taken at the Railroad Hotel, after which the President addressed an audience numbering about five hundred sturdy and intelligent Dakotans, from the balcony of the House, substantially, as here reported:

The President began by saying that this was not his first visit to the territory; that he had been here six years before at the time the Northern Pacific Railroad was being built across the territory, and he was thoroughly surprised at the progress he could witness in settlement and improvement. He made reference to the conditions of the country generally and the progress it was making under free institutions. Wherever he went he found intelligent, industrious and prosperous people, and even here, on almost the verge of agricultural settlement he found practical results of the resistless energy which characterizes our race. He then referred to the natural curiosity of the people to see men of note, and was glad that he was able to gratify that curiosity by introducing some of the eminent gentlemen who had accompanied him.

Attorney General Devens was the first introduced. He proved to be an excellent speaker and well informed of the history of the Dakota country. He dwelt eloquently upon the agricultural capacities and the future of the Northwest. Governor Howard followed and made a speech that fairly thrilled his listeners. He spoke for Dakota, and into the ears of the President and some of the members of his cabinet, and to a score or two of congressmen who were in the party. The governor seemed to have in mind that it was of more value to have at that time the assistance of the rulers of the country, than to use the opportunity in complimenting the people or praising the natural wealth of the Dakota domain. And he therefore made an urgent appeal to Congress to be more liberal with its appropriations. He cited the difficulties in procuring a survey of the public land, which retarded and discouraged settlement and added to the burdens of the pioneers. He stated that he had already, in 1878, organized five new counties, and that the population of Dakota had increased about 40 per cent in that period.

Count Levenhaupt, minister from Norway and Sweden, then spoke some fitting words for his countrymen in Dakota. His words fell upon scores of people in the audience who were natives of the fatherland the count represented, and raised a shout of approval after the fashion practiced in the "land of the midnight sun." This speech excited much cordiality. The count had struck a responsive chord.

Following the count came Senator Windom, and Senator McMillan, and Congressman Stewart, and Gen. H. H. Sibley, of Minnesota; Col. Ben Yancy, of Georgia; Governor Smith, of Wisconsin; Senator Butler, of South Carolina; and Hon J. A. Farwell, of Chicago.

The Northern Pacific Railway had been halted at Bismarek, for nearly five years, and was now prepared to resume the work of extending to the Pacific Coast, the importance of which movement was eloquently emphasized by the distinguished galaxy of orators.

A number of ladies were among the audience, and they were sincerely desirous of seeing the President's wife, who stepped to the balcony, and gratified their laudable curiosity. The "first lady of the land"—a successor to the honorable title born with Mrs. President Martha Washington, waved her handkerchief, smiled profusely, and exhibited her pleasure at the greeting which had come to her from her pioneer sisters of the Dakota plains.

During the forenoon the party rode out west to the Dalrymple farms, about eighteen miles. These famous acres bordered the railway, and the work of threshing the grain, just harvested, was in progress. The farms extended along the track six miles and embraced 13,000 acres. The yield this season had averaged about twenty-five bushels to the acre, and aggregated 325,000 bushels, from the portion that had been cultivated, all first grade. There were forty steam threshers at work on the great plantation, and thirty-six cars were loaded every day and shipped to Duluth and Minneapolis. Hundreds of teams were in sight, plowing for the crop of 1879. The President and his party spent two hours, under the escort of Mr. Dalrymple, riding about the farm, witnessing the novel and exhilarating industry which surrounded them, and securing a fund of information that would embellish their public addresses and private conversations for years to come. There was no other portion of the globe that could furnish a counterpart of that which they were witnessing, and although they had read and heard much of the great Dakota wheat fields, the demonstration before their eyes surpassed their expectations.

There was nothing more to show the visitors—that is, nothing that would equal in magnitude what they had seen and experienced, and the brief stay with Mr. Dalrymple closed the formalities of their Dakota visit, and the same evening the presidential train, traveling at an average speed of thirty miles an hour, departed for St. Paul.

GENERAL SHERIDAN'S REPORT—TROOPS IN DAKOTA

The annual report of Gen. Philip Sheridan, commanding the Military Division of the Missouri, for 1878, shows the names and number of the sub-departments, the commanders, the number of troops, the various forts and their garrisons, and other information. As 1878 was as near the crowning year of Dakota's military population and utility, as any, and was also much disturbed by important Indian problems having to do with the location of that element of Dakota's population, the commanding general's information will be valuable as historical matter, and also entertaining. The portion of interest to Dakotans is given following:

There has been no change in the organization of this military division during the past year. It consists of the following departments, namely: The Department of Dakota, embracing within its limits the State of Minnesota, and territories of Dakota and Montana, within twenty-five permanent forts, and three encampments of observation commanded by Brevet Maj.-Gen. John Gibbon, in the temporary absence of Brig.-Gen. Alfred H. Terry. The Department of the Platte, embracing the states of Iowa and Nebraska, the territories of Wyoming and Utah and a portion of Idaho, with twenty-one permanent posts and two camps of observation, commanded by Brig.-Gen. George Crook. The Department of the Missouri, embracing the states of Illinois, Missouri, Kansas and Colorado, the Territory of New Mexico and the Indian Territory, and the posts of Fort Bliss and Fort Elliott, in Texas, with twenty-four permanent posts, commanded by Brig.-Gen. John Pope. The Department of Texas, embracing the State of Texas, with thirteen permanent posts and numerous camps of observation, commanded by Brig.-Gen. E. O. C. Ord.

To garrison these eighty-two permanent posts and the camps of observation, covering the country from British America on the north to the Rio Grande on the south, we have only four companies of artillery, averaging fifty-three men each, eight regiments of cavalry, averaging seven hundred and sixty-five men each, and eighteen regiments of infantry, averaging four hundred and fifty-two men each, which, as will be seen by the reports of General Ord and General Gibbon, gives us only one man to 120 square miles in the Department of Texas, and one to every seventy-five square miles in the Department of Dakota, and about the same ratio in the departments of the Platte and the Missouri. When it is borne in mind that this immense section of country has to be constantly under surveillance against Indians and raiding parties from the Mexican side of the Rio Grande, the work that has to be performed by that portion of our army located in this military division will be appreciated by all military men, and by those who have ever lived upon our frontiers.

No other army in the world has such a difficult line to keep in order, and no army in modern times has had such an amount of work put upon the same number of men. In all other countries it is the custom to establish garrisons of not less than a regiment or a brigade where we leave the performance of similar duties to one or two companies. With us, regiments are rarely, if ever, together; the posts are generally garrisoned by one, two or four companies, who are expected to hold and guard against one of the most acute and wary foes in the world, a space of country that in any other land would be held by a brigade. To do this requires sleepless watchfulness, great activity, and tireless energy, and I am gratified to know that, as a general thing, our officers possess those soldierly qualities.

The frontiers have been greatly advanced, and mineral and agricultural interests have been largely developed, while the cattle and sheep interests are assuming extraordinary proportions. The valleys of the Yellowstone and the valleys along the eastern base of the Big Horn Mountains are gradually opening up with settlements and mail routes. The mineral wealth of the Black Hills is now undoubted, and ores exist in such quantities as to be almost inexhaustible, while the country around the foothills, embraced by the south branch of the Cheyenne River and the Belle Fourche, presents the most favorable prospects agriculturally.

The Territory of Dakota in 1878 contained sixteen military posts and camps, garrisoned by the troops and commanded by the officers named in the following list, to-wit:

General in Command—Brevet Maj.-Gen. Alfred H. Terry.

Aides-de-Camp—Capt. Edward W. Smith, Eighteenth Infantry; Capt. R. P. Hughes, Third Infantry; First Lieut. E. B. Gibbs, Sixth Infantry.

Department Staff—Maj. George D. Ruggles, adjutant general's department; Maj. Thomas F. Barr, judge advocate; Lieut.-Col. Chas. H. Tompkins, chief quartermaster; Maj. M. R. Morgan, chief commissary of subsistence; Col. W. J. Sloan, medical director; Maj. C. J. Sprague, chief paymaster; First Lieut. Edward Maguire, chief engineer; Capt. O. E. Michaelis, chief ordnance officer.

Quartermaster's Department—Maj. W. B. Hughes, depot quartermaster, Yankton, D. T.; Capt. Henry W. James, chief quartermaster, Helena, Mont.; Capt. James G. C. Lee, depot and post quartermaster, St. Paul, Minn.

Officers in the medical department will be found in the lists of the several posts named below

Pay Department—Maj. H. B. Reese, St. Paul, Minn., charged with payment at independent posts, Fort Buford excepted; Maj. William Smith, St. Paul, Minn., charged with payments at posts on the Missouri River from Standing Rock Agency to Fort Stevenson, D. T., inclusive; Maj. J. E. Blaine, charged with payments in the District of Montana, station at Helena; Maj. William Arthur, station Fort Buford, charged with payments at Fort Buford and in the District of the Yellowstone; Maj. Alexander Sharp, Yankton, D. T., charged with payments at posts on the Missouri River from Yankton to Cheyenne Agency, D. T., and Bear Butte, D. T.

Roster of Troops—Headquarters Seventh Infantry, Fort Snelling, Minn. Col. John Gibbon.

Lieut.-Col. C. C. Gilbert, commanding post; First Lieut. L. F. Burnett, regimental and post adjutant; First Lieut. J. W. Jacobs, R. Q. M., A. A. Q. M. and A. A. C. S.

Company B, Seventh Infantry—Capt. C. S. Kirtland, First Lieut. C. A. Booth, Second Lieut. Lewis D. Greene. Company C, Seventh Infantry—Capt. D. W. Benham, First Lieut. William Quinton, Second Lieut. C. A. Worden. Company E, Seventh Infantry—Capt. Walter Clifford, First Lieut. W. I. Reed, Second Lieut. G. S. Young. Company F, Seventh Infantry—Capt. C. Constant Williams, First Lieut. W. H. Nelson, Second Lieut. E. E. Harlin. Company H, Seventh Infantry—Capt. H. B. Freeman, First Lieut. H. M. Benson, Second Lieut. J. B. Jackson. Company K, Seventh Infantry—Capt. J. M. J. Sanno, First Lieut. J. H. Jackson, Second Lieut. D. A. Frederick. Maj. C. C. Byrne, medical director.

Fort Sisseton, D. T.—Company A, Seventeenth Infantry—Capt. W. M. VanHorne, First Lieut. I. M. Burns, adjutant, A. A. Q. M., and A. A. C. S., Second Lieut. Edgar W. Howe. Company F, Seventeenth Infantry—Capt. C. E. Bennett, commanding post; First Lieut. D. H. Brush, Second Lieut. A. E. Kilpatrick. Acting assistant surgeon, C. E. McChesney. Acting assistant surgeon, S. T. Weirich. Eleventh Infantry, First Lieut. D. B. Taylor, attached. There were ten Indian scouts at this post.

Five companies of the Third United States Cavalry were in camp on the Little Missouri in the summer of 1878, watching the hostile Indians. The entire Seventh Cavalry, Colonel Sturgis, was at Fort Abraham Lincoln, their headquarters, but made a campaign west and south in quest of the Indians who were committing depredations on Black Hills emigrants. The First United States Infantry was stationed at different posts in Dakota. The Sixth Infantry was also at different points in the territory. Four companies of the Eighth Infantry were in camp on the Little Missouri. A portion of the Eleventh Infantry was stationed in Dakota, the remainder in Montana. The Seventh Infantry, except one company, was also stationed at different posts in the territory. Except in the vicinity of the hills, the Indians were quiet, and their general conduct was encouraging for a return of substantial peace.

Fort Keogh was built in 1878, and was the principal military post in Montana. It was located at the junction of the Tongue and Yellowstone rivers. It was a fourteen company post for all arms, and was the headquarters of the military district, in command of Gen. Nelson A. Miles, which district extended into the Territory of Dakota. Miles City was about two miles from the post, on Tongue River.

STATE FAIR AT VERMILLION—GOVERNOR HOWARD SPLARKS

In the year 1878 the Territorial Fair was held at Vermillion in September. The fair itself was a creditable exhibition of the agricultural and pastoral resources of the territory at that time, except that the Northern Dakota settlements were not represented, and would have added a valuable addition to the great show. Gov. William O. Howard made the principal address at the opening of the exhibition, being introduced by the Hon. John W. Turner, president of the society. The address was largely historical and quite valuable in that particular, while it disclosed to the Dakota people that their governor had formed a very favorable and intelligent opinion of the natural resources of the territory.

The governor had not prepared his address, for want of time, but "congratulated himself" in his opening remarks, that the opportunity was presented which brought him face to face with the people of Dakota, with whom he felt an interest not alone for themselves but for their great territory. He said:

It is not simply great in the extent of its lauded domain and richness of soil, but it is great in many other things. I know of no other region of equal extent for which Providence had done more than for Dakota. It had been a custom of the past to speak of things about which little was known, that they were worthless. The geographies of only a short time ago had put down a large portion of the United States as the Great American Desert, the Bad Lands, the Rocky Mountains, and several other things that were intended to convey an idea of their worthless character. From this teaching many people have come to believe that Dakota was one vast desert; while in fact Dakota possesses fertile land sufficient to make more than two states as large as Ohio.

Illustrating the errors common among not only the masses of the people but extending to the leaders in the Government, regarding the Government domain, the speaker stated:

Congress once passed a law giving 6,000,000 acres of land to the soldiers of the War of 1812—2,000,000 acres in what was then known as Missouri, 2,000,000 in Illinois, and 2,000,000 in Michigan. Three years later the surveyor general reported that there was not 2,000,000 acres of land in Michigan fit for cultivation—that it was a low swampy region—that it would not be possible to lead a horse across the state—that there was not one acre in a thousand fit for cultivation. Congress believed this report and passed another law saying that the soldiers need not take this 2,000,000 acres of land from Michigan, but from Illinois. In the face of this early opinion against the value of these lands, the census returns of 1870 showed that the State of Michigan possessed at that time 230,000 horses, and this was the country over which it had been officially declared a horse could not be led. In less than forty-five years after the passage of this law the State of Michigan had sent to the war thousands of soldiers—and good soldiers, too—and many of them were cavalry mounted upon horses raised in their own state. There were now millions of acres of land under cultivation in the State of Michigan and railroads were running across it in all directions.

The governor went into these details to show how erroneous had been the general impression in regard to the unsettled lands of the great West.

The same feeling prevails largely at this day in reference to the region of which Dakota is a part. Any geography of a few years ago would show Dakota as a part of the Great American Desert. But the people will live and learn. Let them now think as they might, our destiny is in our own hands and cannot be set aside by croakers or by grasshoppers. Neither one nor the other can set aside the designs of Providence, and Providence had a design in spreading out this vast expanse of fertile country. Pluck, industry and honesty will win. We should quit trying to make something out of nothing, and make something out of the whole which is ours. I have recently visited a portion of this Great American Desert—a small fragment only—in the northern part of the territory, in which I saw a single farm of 18,000 acres. Two successive crops on this farm had paid for it, and all the improvements, all the horses, mules, and cattle, all the machinery necessary to work it, and there was now left as the result of these two years of work, $150,000 worth of property, which had cost not a cent that had not been taken from the farm. The natural resources are ours to use, and industry was the cooperative agent. The decree had gone forth that by the sweat of his brow man should earn his bread, and if a man would not sweat he should not eat. We will certainly have our troubles, our trials; but perseverance, industry and honesty will surely win.

East and north of the Missouri River there are 70,000,000 acres of new land, fit for the plow, stretching from the Canada border to the great river. Nearly all of this is susceptible of cultivation, and is being rapidly taken up. Five new counties have been organized in Dakota during the past summer, and all of them contain as good land as can be found anywhere. Providence had in his wisdom held back the tide of settlement until the time had come, and now all could come within our borders and possess the land.

Congress has done a wise thing in setting apart the sixteenth and thirty-second sections of every township for school purposes. The meaning of this law is that we are to have a population equal to any population for general intelligence, prosperity and honesty. Nine thousand square miles of our territory are dedicated to the cause of education and it is our solemn duty to protect the fund to come from this source. My speech may not seem much like an agricultural address, but in my opinion this subject of school lands is a subject of vital importance to agriculturists. When the State of Michigan was admitted, one section in every township was set apart for school purposes. When I first went to Detroit there was not a public school in the whole city, and now it has the finest free educational system to be found. The last census showed that of the persons in Michigan above the age of ten years, only 2 per cent were unable to read and write. If Michigan could accomplish this with only one section of school land to a township, Dakota, with its two sections, should certainly be able to wipe out the 2 per cent of ignorance from among its people.

In urging this subject of education I do not speak of the higher branches of information, but upon the diffusion of a reasonable amount of practical knowledge among all classes. It should be laid down as a fundamental rule that the liberties of a people cannot be forced above its intelligence—ignorant men could not be made free nor kept free. It is therefore of the highest importance that we be true to the educational trust given to us; that we be true to ourselves and worthy of the position we occupy.

A state, a territory, a kingdom, is not the land. The land was there before the state was organized. A state is the people and the institutions of the people, and the quality of freedom within the state will be measured by the intelligence of those who make the state. I am an old man, my race is nearly run, and my ambition is satisfied. I want nothing of the people, but want to aid them in moulding the institutions of their state. A close guard over educational interests will result in the best of state organizations.

The time will come when one-half the wheat of America will be raised north of the spot we are standing upon. The future of the state is thus assured and it remains with us to create a rightful government, to so organize in behalf of the people that we might resist the bad, restrain the vicious, and protect the weak. This is sufficient. When we attempt to do more we are ourselves committing usurpation. The sheriff in the performance of his duty is the representative of the rightful government. Should his power be inadequate to the emergency, the posse comitatus lent additional aid, and the next and final step was an appeal to the military of the Government. All this that the weak might be protected and the vicious restrained. With intelligence these forces will work in harmony. To obtain intelligence protect the school fund. Washington has told us that intelligence and virtue are the only safeguards for a republican form of government, and these elements should be fostered and lifted up.

A great deal has been said about inflation and contraction, and though I am not going to wander off into politics, I will say a word or two on those subjects. I am in favor of inflation and also of contraction. In favor of inflating wheat, corn and oats, and stock; and in favor of contracting everything the people were liable to run in debt for. Inflate the articles produced and sold—the collaterals—and there would be no lack of prosperity. Contract that which is bought and consumed, and the balance would fall on the right side every time. No attention should be paid to the political schemes of the great men who do the talking. Inflate production and success will come. Inflate expenditures and failure will result. The true course followed will bring a future of which any people, any country, may be proud.

FLOOD IN THE WEST VERMILLION

There was an unusual number of what are popularly termed "cloud bursts" during the summer of 1878, many of them quite destructive of life and property. Rapid City was deluged by one of these remarkable storms in July, which raised the waters of Rapid Creek twenty feet in an hour, inundated the streets to the depth of a foot or more, filled scores of cellars with water, and drove many families to seek shelter in the loft of their hastily constructed habitations. A few buildings were wrecked but no lives were lost in town.

A calamity of a similar nature visited the valley of the west branch of the Vermillion River in Turner County. A Mennonite colony had gone into the valley in 1874, and had by their industry built up a prosperous and peaceful settlement. The colony had its most extensive improvements and dwelling apartments on the lowlands of the river bottom. On the morning of the 23d of July the flood rushed in upon them, finding many yet asleep in their beds. A cloud burst a little distance above the settlement had emptied a vast volume of water into the Little Vermillion, and in a few minutes that stream was out of its banks and was climbing the slope of the bluffs that bordered the narrow valley. The water attained a depth of from ten to thirty feet, and filled the houses to their eaves, their occupants narrowly escaping death by drowning. It was claimed that for a time the Vermillion resembled the Missouri River in breadth. Seven persons were drowned. Four of them belonged to one family named Garings—the mother, two daughters and one son being overwhelmed before they could be rescued. The father was taken from out of the flood unconscious and nearly dead, but was revived. Jacob Goren, newly married, was drowned, and there were two other fatalities. One family was rescued from the roof of a building that soon after went to pieces in the flooded valley. All the crops in the valley were destroyed.

These cloudbursts and sudden storms occurred at many points during July, 1878, and in every instance thoroughly destroyed the grain and corn fields which at that time had been confined as far as practicable to the low lands bordering the various streams. The yield of farm produce of various kinds was greatly diminished by reason of excessive rains during the later growing and ripening season, coupled with extreme warm weather. It was estimated that fully one-third of the crop in the territory was lost by these causes, while much of the grain that was ripened was of an inferior quality.

The counties of Codrington, Hamlin, Barnes, Grant, McCook and Deuel were organized in 1878. The heavy immigration was into and through these counties, to the James River Valley; and through Richland and Cass counties to the same locality.

CHAPTER LXXXI

DAKOTA PROVIDES FOR CARE OF INSANE AND CONVICTS

1879

The thirteenth session of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota convened at Yankton, the capital, on Tuesday, January 14, 1879. This was the first session held under the administration of Gov. William A. Howard.

The membership of the Council was made up as follows: First District (Union County), Ira Ellis and Silas Rohr; Second District (Clay County), Nelson Miner; Third District (Yankton County), Newton Edmunds and H. B. Wynn; Fourth District (Bon Homme County), M. H. Day; Fifth District (Lincoln and Turner counties), William M. Cuppett, of Lincoln, and C. B. Valentine, of Turner; Sixth District (Minnehaha County), R. F. Pettigrew; Seventh District (Cass, Richland, Ransom, Barnes and Stutsman counties), S. G. Roberts, of Cass; Eighth District (Grand Forks and Pembina counties), George H. Walsh, of Grand Forks, or Traill; Ninth District (Burleigh and Stevens counties), R. McNider, of Burleigh County; Tenth District (Hutchinson, Armstrong, Hanson and Davison counties), no councilman; Eleventh District (Brookings, Lake and Moody counties), no councilman; Twelfth District (Traill County), no councilman; Thirteenth District (Lawrence, Pennington and Custer counties), W. L. Kuykendall, of Lawrence County. The counties of Charles Mix, including the Yankton Reservation (Brule, Hyde, Hughes, Buffalo and Sully), were attached to the Thirteenth District for election purposes.

The Council organized by the election of the following officers: President, George H. Walsh, of Grand Forks County; secretary, O. A. Hubbard, of Lincoln County; assistant clerk, E. H. Foster, Stutsman County; enrolling and engrossing clerk, A. W. Heil, of Union County; messenger, M. C. Lyons, of Minnehaha County; watchman, Thomas B. Buchanan, of Turner County; chaplain, Rev. J. A. Potter, of Yankton County; sergeant-at-arms and doorkeeper, Jacob Brauch, of Yankton County.

The membership of the House of Representatives was made up as follows: First District (Union County), J. M. Peterson, Sever Johnson, Joel Webber and Andrew Hoyt; Second District (Clay County), Knud Weeks, Johan Hager, Hans Gunderson and P. N. Cross; Third District (Yankton County), J. R. Gamble, E. C. Walton, Adolph Mauksch and Andrew Simonsen; Fourth District (Bon Homme County), J. H. Stephens; Fifth District (Lincoln and Turner counties), A. B. Foeckler and O. C. Helvig, of Lincoln, and D. Stewart, of Turner; Sixth District (Minnehaha County), J. R. Jackson and J. O. Longness; Seventh District (Cass, Richland, Ransom, Barnes and Stutsman counties), J. Q. Burbank; Eighth District, no representative; Ninth District (Burleigh and Stevens counties), Ainsley Gray, of Burleigh County; Tenth District (Hutchinson, Armstrong, Hanson and Davison counties), Alfred Brown, Hutchinson County; Eleventh District (Brookings, Lake and Moody counties), Martin Tryggsstad, of Brookings, and O. I. Huseboe, of Moody; Twelfth District (Traill County), Michael Shelley; Thirteenth District (Pennington, Lawrence and Custer counties, with Charles Mix, Brule, Hyde, Hughes, Buffalo and Sully counties attached for election purposes), N. C. Whitfield and D. W. Flick, of Pennington County.

The House organized by the election of the following officers: Speaker, J. R. Jackson, of Minnehaha County; chief clerk, T. A. Kingsbury, of Yankton County; assistant clerk, W. D. Percival, of Union County; enrolling and engrossing clerk, W. S. Grant, of Bon Homme County; sergeant-at-arms, Julian Dix, of Lawrence County; messenger, T. W. Clark, of Lincoln County; watchman, A. Culbertson, of Bon Homme County; chaplain, Rev. J. P. Coffman, of Yankton County.

THE MESSAGE

Governor Howard delivered his message in person at the joint session held in the hall of the House, during the afternoon on the first day of the session, as follows:

Gentlemen of the Council and House of Representatives:

In view of the greatly improved condition of the territory, it is a pleasing duty to welcome you to your legislative labors and responsibilities. During the last two years our population has increased steadily and rapidly, probably three-fold. Our taxable property has increased in a single year more than 60 per cent. The exceeding fertility of our soil has been demonstrated. The destructive power of the locust, heretofore overrated, has become less and less, until it has been established that labor can be rewarded and a large measure of prosperity secured in spite of the ravages of the grasshopper, incurred in the past, or apprehended in the future. A rich gold and silver mining region has been opened within our borders which has already produced a large value of the precious metals, and the development of which will be a source of permanent and increasing wealth. Our educational interests are better cared for; our laws are better enforced, and more generally respected. Our finances are improved and improving. Immigration has increased beyond all former precedent in the territory, with every indication of a still larger ratio of increase for the next year. In short, all the materials are flowing in and clustering around us that must soon form a great and prosperous state. Into what sort of a state these elements shall be molded; as to what institutions shall characterize the future Dakota, must largely depend upon the wisdom and fidelity with which we meet our present greatly increased responsibilities.

The highest of all duties, the greatest of all responsibilities, that can come upon a legislative body, is the proper moulding of the institutions, which are to give character to the new and growing commonwealth. With us the present is peculiarly a formative period. The quality of our acts at this very session may affect the interests of children as yet unborn.

STATEHOOD.—Our abundant and varied resources, developed and to be developed, show that Providence has placed here an exuberance of all those physical conditions, necessary to the formation, growth and maintenance of a great and prosperous community. And whether these elements of statehood shall ultimately be formed into one or more states, their number and volume have greatly increased and are still increasing, and the process of crystallization has already begun. Some clear ideas of what should characterize an organized community or a free state, would seem to be necessary and appropriate before we lay aside our territorial swaddling clothes.

What, then, is a state? What is a free state? What institutions should characterize a free state? What are its legitimate functions? What are its duties and powers? A free government is simply the organized power of the good, consolidated and welded to restrain the bad, and to protect the weak from the encroachments of the strong; or, in other words, to establish justice and secure the blessings of liberty to all the people. All courts interpret its will and all officers execute its decrees. The sheriff goes forth with its processes, and even when supported by the posse comitatus, or the whole military power, he is only the minister of its will. Such a government is right in its inception and organization, and so far must receive the approbation of heaven. "Order is heaven's first law," and such a government, existing for, and securing the good of the governed, is the "creature of God." We can hardly conceive of the existence of such a government without admitting the truth of the fundamental axioms of the Declaration of Independence; for such a government can only rightfully exist by the consent of the governed, and for the good of the governed.

A state is the people in a given territory and their institutions.

A free state consists of the people and such institutions as they make for themselves.

A despotic state consists of the people and such institutions as are imposed upon them.

A free state lives in the will of its people; public sentiment shapes its course and controls its action. We judge of a state by the same rules as of an individual. "By their fruits ye shall know them." Their character must be determined by what they do; but if they do what public opinion demands, it is essential that public opinion be enlightened and virtuous. Hence it has come to be an axiom, that the only true basis of a republic is the intelligence and morality of its people. Experience goes far toward proving that the more closely the public morality is allied to, and springs from, the personal religion of the individual citizens, the better it endures the trial. The basis of public morality is the enlightened consciences of the individual citizens.

The first duty of every free state, commanded by the highest of all laws, the instinct of self-preservation, is to foster institutions for the promotion of intelligence and virtue of its people. The "liberty of a people cannot be forced beyond its intelligence;" nor can it long survive the decay of public morality. Governments rise and fall, and nations decay and pass away, but the great principles that pertain to righteous government remain unchanged and unchangeable. The Creator seems to have impressed his own immutability upon the true principles of rightful government, such as justice and truth, and equality of right.

Another important function for a state is to provide for the unfortunate,—the deaf and dumb, the blind and the insane. Humanity requires this at the hands of the state, since a kind of treatment is often required that friends and relatives could not furnish; nor could any system of voluntary charity meet the case so well; and since all are liable to these terrible calamities, it is proper that all should aid, under the control of the state, in making suitable provision for unfortunates of this class.

INSANE.—When the Legislature completed its labors of the last session, only seven persons in the territory were confined as lunatics. The law made it the duty of the governor to contract with the authorities of one or more of the three states of Minnesota, Iowa and Nebraska for the care and confinement of the insane in the insane asylums of said states. A contract was made with the authorities of Minnesota to confine and care for our insane for $5.00 a week for each patient, with the cost of clothing, etc., to be added. But in June of the past year we received official notice that the asylum of Minnesota was full of patients of their own, and we must send no more there after the 1st of July, and we must take away all we had there by the 1st of October. Meanwhile the number of territorial patients had increased to above the number of twenty, and new cases were calling for admission. As Iowa and Nebraska were the only states where we could legally send them after Minnesota refused, attention was immediately turned to these two states; but the asylums of both were found full of their own. Application was made to several states East, but no place could be found in any public asylum where they could be sent even after the Legislature should meet and legalize their removal.

The best terms they could be kept in any asylum built by private enterprise was $400 per annum each, which would amount to at least $15,000 per year, including transportation from the remote parts of the territory to the extreme southern part of Illinois. In view of the extreme difficulties of the case, and the interests of humanity involved, the authorities of the Minnesota asylum so far modified their order as to extend the time for removing our insane from there until the 1st of February, 1879, thus giving the Legislature time to legalize some proper disposition of this most unfortunate class. While Nebraska had not room for a single male patient in their regular wards, the authorities of that state consented to receive a limited number of patients, on condition of our making such improvements in certain unfinished rooms as were necessary to confine them in the night time. As there was no law therefore I paid this out of means of my own. The expense thus incurred is much less than the extra cost of moving them to St. Peter, instead of stopping at Lincoln on the way from the Black Hills. In this way provision was made for the proper care of the insane until the 1st of February and no longer.

The question as to what could be done with these unfortunate people after the 1st of February demanded immediate attention. I could find no law for calling an extra session of the Legislature. There was no building in the territory at all suitable for the confinement and proper treatment of so large a number—probably thirty—and no law (except the law of necessity) for expending any money or contracting any debt to provide buildings. They must be provided, or at least in such a state of forwardness that the Legislature could complete them in time to receive the patients. To do this, a portion of the work must be done before cold weather. This has been done. The work so far has been paid for from my private funds. It now remains for you to adopt and complete the work, or reject it, as, in your wisdom, you may deem proper. I had no power to incur a debt, or create any legal obligation against the territory; nor do I wish to coerce you into the adoption of any particular plan.

But the honor of this territory—every consideration of patriotic duty—every tie that binds the good man to his country—every bond of social duty—every claim of humanity, demands that you make immediate and suitable provision for the care of this most unfortunate class. When all these utter their claims with united voice, what is it but the very voice of God?

It is believed that by promptly completing the arrangements, and securing an efficient organization, and by an economical management, the insane of the territory can be well cared for and a saving made in a single year of more than the entire cost of the building, and necessary furniture and fixtures. Even if this should prove an overestimate, the statistics collected from the various asylums in the country, show that of all the persons received and cared for the first year 50 per cent are cured; while of those received during the second year, only 10 per cent recover. These statistics show that prompt and proper treatment is demanded on the score of economy no less than by the imperative claims of humanity.

A full statement of the amount expended therefor with carefully prepared estimates of the cost of completing, furnishing and managing, will be the subject of another communication to be submitted at an early day.

PRISON.—One of the most important subjects that should, I think, demand your early attention, is the mode and expense of keeping our convicts. It appears from the auditor's report that the cost of keeping our convicts for the two years ending the 30th of November, 1878, was $7,391.67, while the cost of their transportation for the same time was $12,303.33. The number is increasing, and with our largely increasing population it will continue to increase. Unless some other arrangement can be adopted, the cost of transportation alone will soon reach $10,000 a year. So long as no steps are taken towards providing a prison of our own, this large expenditure may prove an increasing burden upon the tax payers, and an entire loss; for at the last a prison or prisons of some kind must and will be built.

The convicts are well cared for, and kept at a cheap rate at Detroit. The prison itself is all that could be desired, but the cost of transportation is a burden too great to be long endured. In view of the great extent of our territory, and of the remoteness of the different settlements from each other, and the difficulties and expense of inter-communication, it would be perhaps unwise to locate and build an expensive prison at the present time, even if we had the means at our command. For, locate it where we would, a heavy expense for transportation must continue until increased immigration shall blend our settlements, and increased railroad and other facilities shall have cheapened the cost of inter-communication. While I am not prepared to make, at this time, any very definite or distinct recommendations, I venture to suggest that cheap prisons or work houses, might be commenced, say one located in each judicial district, where convicts sentenced to hard labor for short terms, say one or two years, might be confined, and their labor utilized, with little if any cost for transportation. The large amount thus saved and the value of the convict labor, with only trifling additions, would furnish means of confinement as fast as required; while each would become the nucleus of such prison as would ultimately be required in the Black Hills, in Northern Dakota, and in Southeastern Dakota. The question is worthy of consideration whether short sentences, endured near the commission of the crime, would not be more salutary than punishment inflicted 1,000 miles away and among entire strangers. Should any of these suggestions be deemed of sufficient importance to receive any action within the next two years, some modification of the laws would be necessary at the present session.

Should Congress divide our territory, these prisons would be none the less useful and necessary. But in no event should any debt be created without making provision for its early liquidation. Half a dozen cells and a stockade would be enough to begin upon in each of the judicial districts, constructed so that they could be enlarged, if required. Meanwhile convicts for long periods could be sent as now, where they are kept at cheap rates, and the comparative cost of transportation per year would be lessened in proportion to the number of years. At present the average cost of transportation from the different counties to the territorial prison at Detroit is equivalent to their keeping for $3\frac{1}{2}$ years.

Should the plan above suggested be deemed objectionable, and it should be thought better to confine our efforts to the construction of one large and substantial prison in one locality, and with due regard to cheapness of material, even then prudence would dictate that we proceed very slowly, carefully avoiding the contraction of any large debt, even if we were obliged to build in small sections, and no faster than required for actual use. Should we show a disposition to begin, it is possible that Congress might see the justice and the wisdom of giving us substantial aid in the construction of such a prison as would be suitable for prisoners of the United States as well as of the territory. If we do nothing toward providing for our future and increasing necessities, our taxes will have been absorbed and we will have nothing to show for them. I commend this whole subject to your thoughtful consideration.

FINANCES.—The amount of warrants issued during the two years ending the 30th of November, 1878, was $48,483.08, of which amount $30,107.32 was for the year ending the 30th of November, 1878. Of the amount drawn in 1877, $10,015 may be regarded as extraordinary and unusual expenses. The most, if not all of this amount, it is believed, Congress should have refunded. This amount embraces the following items:

For locating roads from the Missouri River to the Black Hills, acquired by treaty, and approved by the secretary of war, $3,000; codifying the laws, $2,094; printing codes, $4,921.

If we deduct this amount from the total of warrants issued, it will leave $38,468.98 as the amount of ordinary current expenses for the two years, or $19,234.49 as the average ordinary yearly expenses, exclusive of interest on the outstanding warrants. This amount may be slightly increased, perhaps $1,000, by some unadjusted claims. It appears by the auditor's report that warrants to the amount of $29,149.87 have been canceled and are now on file in his office, thus:

Of these there were redeemed of the issue of 1874, $167.33; 1875, $1,770.44; 1876, $9,707.32; 1877, $16,202.79; 1878, $1,232.99. Warrants redeemed in two years on file with the auditor, $29,149.87. Deducting the amount paid on warrants issued in the years 1874 and 1875, $1,937.77, and it would leave $27,203.10 applicable to the cancellation of warrants issued during the two years ending November 30, 1878. This amount deducted from the whole issue of the two years, leaves $21,280.80 as the amount of outstanding warrants, exclusive of interest, on the 30th of November, 1878.

The treasurer reports warrants paid, now in his office and notified to be paid, to the amount of $9,150.47. Assuming this to be correct and deducting the $6,100.58 it should reduce the amount of outstanding warrants to $15,180.30 exclusive of accrued interest on the same, estimated at $1,500.

This should make our entire indebtedness upon outstanding warrants for principal and interest, on the 30th of November, $17,280.30 instead of $23,233.47 as by the statement of the treasurer.

The error of the treasurer seems to arise by his reporting warrants redeemed and in his office to the amount of $2,403.08, and the further sum of $3,637.50 as notified for redemption, amounting to $6,100.58, and taking credit for having paid this aggregate amount and using it to account for the money he has received, and then reporting them as outstanding warrants.

On the item of $2,403.08 he has charged interest $328.58, and on item of $3,637.50 accrued interest he has charged $520.55. Total interest in the two items used in accounting for the money received, $849.13.

The treasurer reports the total amount of receipts from all sources for the two years ending November 30th, 1878, as amounting to $38,805.55, and he gives the amount received from each county, but he does not give the date of the receipt of any portion of it. The full amount of interest claimed to have been paid is $3,049.49, but no dates are given when any portion of the interest was paid. To test the accuracy of such an interest account, it would seem to be essential to know when the interest on each warrant commenced, and when it was paid. I recommend that your honorable body take some action as will secure a full report from the territorial treasurer and a settlement of his account.

A large portion of our expenses has been for the care and confinement of our convicts and lunatics and the expenses of transportation to prisons and insane asylums outside of the territory; and, as our warrants were at a heavy discount, it was found impossible to use the warrants except with the understanding that, when certified, they should draw 10 per cent interest until paid. This rate has been paid on all warrants duly certified. The general law makes the rate of interest 7 per cent except by special contract, when it may be increased to any rate not exceeding 12 per cent. But it is equitable and just that the outstanding certified warrants should be paid as agreed upon and that the treasurer be allowed the 10 per cent which he has paid. I recommend that you legalize the 10 per cent interest on all certified warrants now outstanding.

The heavy discount on our warrants has heretofore proved a heavy burden on our tax payers. Our warrants have ruled from eighty to ninety cents. If they float on the average one year before payment, we sell one for 85 cents, or make all contracts 15 per cent higher than we would for cash, we pay interest on $1.00 for every 85 cents, and pay principal and interest in full at the end of the year. In this way we pay what is equivalent to 29.41 per cent interest on all outstanding warrants. With our greatly increased and increasing resources, and in the present state of the money market, all our warrants can be cashed at par, and at a rate of interest not exceeding 10 per cent, with the privilege of paying as fast as our funds will permit; so that no funds need lie idle, but may be applied as fast as realized from our taxes. In this way, without increasing our indebtedness, we may be able to save to the tax payers at least $3,000 per annum.

Forced loans are of the most expensive kind. And warrants that float below par are among the worst specimens. I recommend that you authorize and direct the board of equalization to take such action as will without increasing the debt, bring our warrants to par and maintain them, provided the means can be had at a rate of interest not exceeding 10 per centum.

EDUCATION.—Under this head the governor recommends a complete revision of the school law which is found to be made up to some extent of old statutes. He says, "the grant of lands made by Congress for school purposes, two sections in each township, or more than five million acres, if carefully preserved, and wisely applied, will at no very distant day make Dakota a model community for the general intelligence of its people, whether it shall be organized into one or more states." While the school law makes it the duty of the superintendent of public instruction to prepare and present to the governor in December of each year a full report of his transactions for the year preceding, no such report had been received for 1878; and the report of the auditor furnished the only evidence of the expenses of the office, the items therein relating merely to salary, mileage and institutes.

RAILROADS.—Our present railroad legislation has not, as yet, received any fair test; no railroad has been built under it as the law now stands. It is a great subject and is to have an important bearing upon the interests of our territory; but in the absence of the test of practical experience as applied to its particular provisions, I am not prepared at this time to enter upon any recommendations in detail, by way of modification or enlargement. But I content myself with the suggestion that the legislation on this subject, if any, should have two objects in view; the protection of the rights of our citizens on the one hand, and on the other such full and just security of capital, fairly invested, as shall develop the great railroad interests of the territory, so intimately connected with the prosperity of the Territory of Dakota. Indications are not wanting at the present time that this subject will assume vast importance and require very careful attention at no distant day.

IMMIGRATION.—The subject of immigration will deserve your consideration. Growth in population and wealth is the natural law of our territorial life—the necessity of our condition. With a denser population and greater wealth, all public advantages are increased and the welfare of all citizens is improved. With returning prosperity in the nation, and the more buoyant feeling of enterprise among the people, an increased attention is drawn toward this territory which is now augmented by the railroad enterprises within and near our borders. The favorable land laws of the United States have here their most perfect and complete application; and there remain large areas upon the borders of our settlements which offer permanent advantages to the immigrant.

It would, perhaps, be impossible to adopt any general system governing immigration, under a superintendent, without involving heavy expense, and which would be otherwise satisfactory to all sections. Our settlements are separated and hold different relations to the neighboring states and to the markets, while there is now little except official intercommunication. The several judicial districts represent the three great communities comprising our population; and it seems better to have three authorized agents of immigration, one for each of these districts, instead of a single superintendent. This arrangement would also save much in traveling and other expenses, while each would be able to organize efficiently the harmonious interests of his district and secure the co-operation of many other agencies. The expenditure of $1,000 would give $333 to each district, of which say $100 could apply as salary, and the remainder be expended for printing and other necessary expenses. There is now an increasing demand for accurate and reliable information concerning Dakota, and some economical method of supplying it would doubtless result in the general advantage.

CARE OF THE POOR.—The law requires that the paupers shall be supported at the expense of the several counties, and defines their residence or legal settlement, with a view of fixing the responsibility of each county, for the support of its own; and it makes the probate court of each county the tribunal for determining the insanity of such persons as are to be transported and cared for from the public treasury. The practical execution of these laws has led to grave abuses. There is a constant temptation on the part of county officers to send their paupers, at a heavy expense to the territory, to be supported as lunatics. In several instances those who should have been considered as mere paupers, to be supported by the county, have been sent to the asylum at a heavy expense for transportation and care. With the law in its present form, the want of skill on the part of some probate judges and a deplorable want of integrity on the part of others, has led to great confusion and injustice. In some instances men have been sent long distances and lodged in the insane asylum, at a heavy public charge, who were just simply paupers—drunken paupers or criminals. In these cases fraudulent amounts have been certified by the probate judges for transportation in which the judge himself is said to have been interested. To avoid the danger of such abuses I recommend that the law be so modified that any county sending an alleged insane person to the insane asylum, be required to pay for the transportation thereto and for his return to his own country when he shall have been discharged from the asylum. When any person without an estate has been received and treated as an insane patient at the expense of the territory, and has been discharged from the asylum, all the expense of his return and of his support shall then rest upon the county from which he is sent, since while a lunatic he can neither gain nor lose a residence.

THE PARDONING POWER.—The power to pardon offenses against the territorial laws is conferred by the organic act upon the governor. In its terms the power is absolute, perhaps necessarily so. Upon him rests the responsibility of its judicious exercise. I have introduced the subject here not for the purpose of asking legislation, for you scarcely have the power to make any laws of binding force upon the subject; but we have reached that point in the development and execution of our criminal laws when its proper exercise assumes great importance to our people, without regard to the question of where the power is placed. And as this is the first opportunity I have had to express my views of the proper limitation, and of the extent of its exercise, I avail myself of this occasion to state briefly the principles which I believe should control the action of the executive branch of the government of this important subject.

In early times, and among many nations at the present day, the doctrine of the divine right of kings has been and is maintained, and as a necessary result all crimes are against the king.

The power to pardon was a personal prerogative of the king, only absolute in form, but its exercise depended only upon his pleasure or caprice. The crime was against him, and he was the party in whose name all writs and prosecutions ran. To pardon was an act of personal grace and forgiveness, as much as to give of his own property to relieve the necessities of the poor.

But our system of government rests upon a different theory. With us the people are the source of power, and every crime, great or small, is a crime against the people. And while the pardoning power may remain absolute in form so far as it relates to the legal subjects of its exercise, in reality the whole thing is changed. The executive is simply the agent of the supreme power, and he cannot rightfully exercise clemency in any given case, except upon the ground of good and sufficient public reasons. Its exercise should be limited mainly to the discovery of new evidence which would have changed or modified the result, could all the facts have been known before judgment.

In my view the executive has no right to use this high prerogative in a way that can weaken the power of the law to restrain crime. Neither sympathy or prejudice should be permitted to break the force of a just judgment, except upon the strongest claims of humanity, or in some cases where the practical working of the law could not have been foreseen. The unerring certainty with which punishment, although not excessive, must and will follow conviction, is what restrains crime. It is believed fidelity to the public in the exercise of this high prerogative will diminish crime, and thus prove on a grand scale to be humane and merciful.

The law authorizes the governor to offer rewards for the arrest of criminals in two cases only, and these likely to occur and a wider scope for that power might prove advantageous toward the more certain punishment of crime.

APPORTIONMENT.—Congress at its last session passed a law reducing the number of the Territorial Council to twelve, and the number of representatives to twenty-four. This action of Congress imposes upon you the duty of making a new apportionment of council and representative districts at the present session. * * *

TERRITORIAL EXPENSES.—There is a necessity that the expenses of the territory should be kept at the lowest point consistent with our condition and the strict requirements of public interests. Economy is most valuable in every stage of a commonwealth's growth, and this habit should especially be cultivated in the period of our formation and development, that it may become the characteristic of our institutions and the public faith be kept as an honorable heritage of our citizens. I have confidence that a constant regard will be given to this necessity in all your acts. With the increased resources of our territory, it is earnestly hoped we may not be compelled to increase the rate of the territorial tax beyond three mills upon the dollar of valuation, and it is believed such tax will produce revenue sufficient for all territorial expenses, including adequate provisions for the outstanding unpaid warrants. * * *

I have purposely avoided any allusion to national affairs, that during the limited session allowed by law for your deliberations, we may devote ourselves more exclusively to that class of duties that legitimately pertain to us. You are assured that all your efforts intended to advance the interests of the territory will command my earnest attention, and receive my co-operation.

W. A. HOWARD.

The criticisms made by the governor upon the report of the territorial treasurer were displeasing to the councilman from Minnehaha County, the treasurer being one of his constituents and one of the ablest business men in the territory, and rather above the average in general character. Everybody who knew the treasurer felt confident that his accounts were all right, but he probably had not made his statement clearly understandable without some oral explanation. Whatever explanation was needed was forthcoming as soon as the treasurer learned of the criticism, and was entirely satisfactory, as is evidenced by the governor selecting the treasurer to negotiate with the state authorities of Minnesota with reference to a temporary extension of time in removing Dakota's insane, and the further vindication offered by the governor by reappointing the treasurer for another two-year term.

REDUCING LEGISLATIVE MEMBERSHIP

At the congressional session of 1877-78, late in the session, Congress passed a law reducing the membership in the legislatures of the several territories as follows:

That from and after the adjournment of the next session of the territorial legislatures, the Council of each of the territories of the United States shall not exceed twelve members, and the House of Representatives of each shall not exceed twenty-four members. And the members of each branch of said several legislatures shall receive a compensation of $4.00 a day, each during the sessions provided by law, and shall receive such mileage as the law provides. And the president of the Council and speaker of the House of Representatives shall receive $6.00 per day for the same time.

And the several legislatures, at their next sessions, are directed to divide their respective territories into as many council and representative districts as they desire, which districts shall be as nearly equal as practicable, taking into consideration population, except "Indians not taxed," provided, the number of council districts shall not exceed twelve, and the number of representative districts shall not exceed twenty-four in any one of the said territories. And all parts of sections 1847, 1849, 1853, and 1922, of the revised statutes of the United States, in conflict with the provisions herein, are repealed.

This law did not affect the Legislature of 1879.

DAKOTA TO ASSUME NEW RESPONSIBILITIES

Dakota Territory as an organized government had grown to be nearly ten years of age before its citizens were called upon to assume many of the burdens which are the portion of nearly all humane civilized governments in all quarters of the globe, and which are not only uncomplainingly but willingly borne as a matter of imperative duty. We refer to the care and custody of persons of unsound mind, to the deaf, dumb and blind, to the helpless and indigent poor, and to the convicted criminal class. While some convictions for penitentiary offenses had occurred in Dakota, they were in cases that came under the jurisdiction of the United States, and the convicts were sentenced to federal prisons. Jails of very ordinary construction had been provided in some counties for the confinement and punishment of persons guilty of light offenses, and for the temporary restraint of accused persons and the mildly lawless and unruly classes, but the territory had not been called upon to provide for the keeping and care, or to sustain the cost of such keeping and care, of any of these classes during the first decade and more of its existence. This fact will serve to illustrate the moral department of the people of the territory, as well as the moderate growth in population during that interval. But the day finally came during the earliest years of Dakota's second decade when this exemption from one of the highest public duties imposed by our Christian civilization could no longer be claimed or tolerated, and the law-making body was required to recognize a new and sacred responsibility, new to the annals of Dakota's legislation, and provide for its proper discharge. It cannot be claimed, however, that this duty had been at all evaded for any time whatever.

It is assumed that provision was made for the care and protection of persons so afflicted even earlier than it was generally known that the necessity existed.

The first official allusion to the subject of caring for Dakota's insane is found in the first message of Gov. John A. Burbank, delivered to the Legislature at Yankton, December 6, 1870, and reads as follows:

It is important that some provision should be made for the custody and treatment of insane persons. The care of their property is provided for in our laws, but we have no enactment under the authority of which the persons themselves may be properly cared for. Humanity dictates that this unfortunate class of persons, however few may be their numbers, should not be neglected, when prompt and careful treatment might result in their recovery. In view of this, it is important that provision should be made for their removal to the asylums of neighboring states, until their wants can be properly met within our own borders.

This recommendation of the governor was followed by an enactment authorizing the governor to arrange with the authorities of the neighboring states of Minnesota, Iowa and Nebraska, or any of them, for keeping the insane of the territory; and the Probate Court was given jurisdiction in cases of alleged insanity, to determine its validity, through the agency of proper testimony, and to commit or discharge the person suspected of mental unsoundness. Under this law an arrangement was made with the authorities of the State of Minnesota to restrain and care for the insane of the Territory of Dakota, furnishing all necessaries, except clothing, at the rate of $5 a week for each patient. Clothing was to be an additional charge. Under this arrangement the territory sent two or three patients to the St. Peter's Hospital in that state in 1873-74 and '75, and up to 1876-77, had but seven patients in that hospital. The opening of the Black Hills in 1876-77, appeared to augment the number of patients quite rapidly, so that in 1878, the territory was keeping twenty-two patients in the Minnesota institution, at a cost per week of $110.00, and it was claimed that thirteen of the patients were from the Black Hills, which may have been the case for a brief time, but a year later the Black Hills were charged with but eight.

In the month of June 17, 1878, the governor of Dakota, at that time, William A. Howard, was notified by the authorities of Minnesota that no more patients from Dakota would be received after the first of July following, owing to the crowded condition of their hospital, and further that the territory must arrange for the removal of the patients belonging to the territory then being cared for, by the first day of the ensuing October, 1878. Upon receiving this notice the governor immediately dispatched notice to all the counties directing the insane authorities to cease sending their insane to Minnesota, and then set to work to secure suitable accommodations elsewhere. The Iowa hospitals were in a condition of congestion with patients from that state alone, and Nebraska was the only other state that could be lawfully negotiated with. The governor visited Lincoln, where the Insane Hospital was located, and was greatly disappointed to find that institution over-crowded; but was able, by agreeing to fit up some unfinished rooms in the basement of the hospital building, to secure accommodations for five patients until February 1, 1879, and no longer. This exhausted his authority. To confine the insane in private hospitals was out of the question. He now made a further effort with the Minnesota people, and was able to secure an extension of time until February 1, 1879; and then turned his attention to providing a home for the insane within the territory. His first plan was to rent some large building in or near some of the towns in the territory, and fit it up in shape to suitably accommodate the patients after their discharge from Minnesota and Nebraska, and in the meantime (January, 1879), the Legislature would meet and could take such action as became necessary. There was no building in Yankton, the capital, suitable for the purpose; the governor visited Vermillion and Elk Point, to ascertain what could be furnished at those places, but was unable to find any structure that would answer the purpose. He informed the people of the towns of the situation, and laid before them his plan of providing a temporary asylum that could be used until the territory was prepared to erect something more substantial. His plan met with the heartiest encouragement and approval from the citizens of both places. No law had been passed by the Legislative Assembly locating the Insane Hospital of the territory, but the governor declared that necessity in this case made the law, and he resolved to erect a hospital building. There were two very large frame structures at Yankton that were not occupied, that could be transformed into suitable accommodations. These buildings had been erected by the people of Yankton, to accommodate a rush of German Russian immigration a few years before. One belonged to the territory and the other to the city. These the governor proposed to take over, have them taken apart and transported to the school section, two miles north of town, and reconstruct from this material Dakota's first Insane Hospital. It was estimated that this could be done at comparatively small outlay, and Governor Howard proposed to defray this expense from his private funds, trusting to the next Legislature, which would convene in January, 1870, to reimburse him. The plan provided for a frame structure—the main building to be in size on the ground 150x23 feet, with a wing 50x23 feet. The original plan was considerably modified as the work progressed. The immigrant buildings were commodious affairs, and had been constructed to comfortably accommodate fifty families with a view to their occupying them for weeks at a time, and until they could select claims or provide other accommodations.

Pursuing his plan, the governor caused the following advertisement for proposals to be given out:

Executive Office, Yankton, D. T., September 11, 1878.

Proposals will be received at this office up to 2 o'clock P. M., September 10, 1878, for the erection of a temporary asylum for the insane of Dakota. Plans and specifications may be seen at the counting rooms of J. R. Sanborn, in this city, until September 10, 1878.

W. A. HOWARD.

It will be understood that the Legislature had as yet taken no action toward locating any of the territorial institutions, except the capitol at Yankton; the university at Vermillion; and the penitentiary at Bon Homme. These institutions were located by the first Legislature in 1862, sixteen years prior to the time when this voluntary work was entered upon by the public-spirited governor.

The site for the asylum as it was then called, was selected by Governor Howard on Tuesday, September 24, 1878. This was about one thousand feet southeast of the present main building of the hospital, and not far from the south line of the school section—which was section 30, township 04, range 56, and on the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of said section. Proposals were also invited for the construction of two cisterns at the asylum, to hold 250 barrels each. The cisterns were to be walled and arched with hard brick laid in mortar, the whole to be thoroughly cemented; and to be completed to the satisfaction of the undersigned, W. A. Howard.

It is now in order to return to the proceedings of the Legislative Assembly of 1870, and particular attention is invited to that portion of the governor's annual message in which he discusses the care of the insane. As intimated in that paper, he made the Insane Asylum project the subject of a special message, which he transmitted to the Legislature on the 16th of January, 1879, as follows:

SPECIAL MESSAGE CONCERNING THE INSANE

To the Council and House of Representatives:

The necessity for immediate action for the care of the insane of the territory makes it my duty to bring the subject to your attention, and to ask that your action be as prompt as the due consideration of its importance and the interests of the people will permit. The cost of the necessary buildings when complete and ready for use, including grates, cooking utensils, heating, furniture, beds and bedding, should be carefully considered. The cost of running it economically and efficiently should have due consideration. A plan of organization that should have harmonious and humane results requires thoughtful care and patriotic devotion. In short, what is the best way to do it?

The amount expended to put the building in its present state of forwardness is $2,286.85. This includes all that was necessary to be done before cold weather, such as plastering, cisterns, etc. For ceiling, grating, construction of cells, etc., it will probably cost as much more—perhaps $2,500. Then for furniture, including beds and bedding, stoves, cooking and laundry articles, say $1,200. After careful consultation with experts, whose experience gives value to their opinions, I think it will cost nearly six thousand dollars, including what has already been done, to get it in running, with capacity to accommodate forty patients. The cost of the care and keeping, provided the number does not exceed thirty, will be about five thousand dollars per year, or about one hundred and sixty six dollars each, exclusive of clothing. But suppose it costs $200 each, or $6,000 for thirty, still the cost of the building would be saved in one year. For I know of no respectable private institution where they can be as well kept and cared for at a cost of less than $300 each.

The question of organization is a very important one. The statutes of the newer states embody the results substantially of their experience. The general features of the Iowa plan are as good as any I have seen. I make the following suggestions: There should be four trustees or commissioners, two of whom should be chosen for two years, and two of them for four years. The four should constitute a board, and the governor should be ex-official, a member. It would be well to locate one in each judicial district. Three should constitute a quorum. They should be men of high character—selected with great care, and should have ample powers, and be made responsible under the law for producing the best results.

Judge Bennett is well acquainted with the Iowa plan and has given much attention to the subject, and at my request he has drafted a bill for a plan of organization. This will be of service in considering the subject. To meet our responsibilities for the next two years, the expenditures will be large, and the appropriation should be ample, but be well guarded so as to secure economy, efficiency and fidelity. Should it be deemed best, it is probable the entire cost of construction and outfit could be divided into three annual payments of $2,000 each, and paid out of what will have been saved. I ask your immediate action on the whole subject.

WM. A. HOWARD.

This message was delivered to each branch of the Legislature on the 16th of January, and on the same day Councilman Newton Edmunds introduced a bill to provide for the care and keeping of the insane, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and Expenditure. The bill provided for the establishment of a hospital for the insane, for the Territory of Dakota, and located it on section 36, township 94, range 56. The bill provided for the appointment by the governor, subject to confirmation by the council, of a board of four trustees, one from each judicial district, and one from Yankton County, the governor to be ex-officio president of the board. The trustees were to receive no remuneration for their services, but their actual expenses were to be paid. The board had control of the management of the affairs, and appointed its superintendent, steward and subordinates. The superintendent to be a skillful physician, and was made the chief executive officer of the hospital, and was authorized to employ all attendants, nurses and servants, who should be under his control. No salaries were stated in the bill, but were left to be fixed by the board.

An official visit was made by the law-making body the following day to the new hospital, on the invitation of the governor, and the members expressed themselves well satisfied with what had been done.

On the 27th Councilman Edmunds from the Committee on Finance and Expenditure, reported a substitute bill for the care and keeping of the insane; and on the same day a special message was received from the governor regarding the removal of the insane from the State Hospital of the State of Minnesota, which expired by its own limitation on the first day of February, 1879 (the next Saturday). The special message follows:

As it is apparently impossible to complete any effective arrangements in time to meet the emergency, I respectfully recommend that you authorize and direct that application be made to the authorities of the State of Minnesota, for an extension of the time for the removal of our insane until some arrangements can be perfected, say sixty days. It is believed that sixty days additional time will be all that will be required. It will probably involve the necessity of convening a meeting of the board of trustees of the Minnesota Hospital. Owing to the importance of the subject, I would suggest that a special messenger or agent be sent to St. Peter to make success more certain. Owing to his personal acquaintance with their officers and his official intercourse with them, I suggest that you secure the services of Hon. E. A. Sherman, territorial treasurer, for this purpose, if they can be had, and that you make an appropriation sufficient to pay his expenses and reasonable compensation for the services. As the law does not provide for an official report from the asylums of the states where our insane are kept, I have prepared the following data which I submit for your information:

The present number confined is 25, of whom 20 are at St. Peter, Minn., and 5 at Lincoln, Neb. They are from the following counties: Bon Homme County, 2 patients; Cass County, 2; Pembina, Richland, Burleigh, Minnehaha and Yankton, 1 each; Lincoln County, 2; Union County, 6; Lawrence, 8. Two from Lawrence County have, during the year, been cured and discharged, and one more is reported to be cured and ready to be discharged as soon as means can be provided for transportation from St. Peter to Deadwood.

WM. A. HOWARD.

A bill authorizing the employment of Mr. Sherman to negotiate with the Minnesota authorities for sixty days additional time in which to remove Dakota's insane patients, was forthwith passed by the Legislature, and on the third of February following Mr. Sherman's report was transmitted by the governor to the Legislature, as follows:

To His Excellency, Gov. Wm. A. Howard, Yankton, D. T.

Dear Sir: As the special agent of the territory, by act of the Legislature, 27th ult., to make temporary arrangements with the authorities of Minnesota for the temporary care and keeping of the insane in accordance with your special message to that effect, I have the honor of submitting the following report:

Your letter to Governor Pillsbury was by his excellency referred to the trustees of the asylum, a majority of whom reside at St. Peter. A visit to the institution at that place, inspection of its management, and conference with the officers, reveals the following facts: That our patients from Dakota, eighteen in number, are receiving the best of care and attention, and are on the same footing and enjoying the same privileges as patients from the State of Minnesota. That the authorities in so doing have put themselves to great inconvenience during the past few months, owing to the increased number of patients from their own state, and the lack of accommodations for them. That the people of this territory are under the deepest obligations to the authorities of Minnesota for the spirit of accommodation they have manifested in this matter, and for the patient manner in which they have borne with us in view of our extremity. The completion of a building at Rochester, Minn., and the recent removal of fifty patients from St. Peter to that place relieves, temporarily, their overcrowded condition. It is estimated that the capacity of both institutions at Rochester and St. Peter, by crowding them all that is consistent with the welfare of the patients, is 700. They now have in both places 674, including our own. The increase in the number of their patients, as shown by their records, is eight per month, so that it is a question of about ninety days when they will again be crowded for room, unless the Legislature of that state, now in session, make some provision for the erection of another building or addition, which is not considered likely they will do. The trustees express themselves as disposed to further favor us to the greatest extent possible, but in view of their own needs earnestly desire the removal of our insane at the earliest practicable moment.

In closing, I wish to add a word in appreciation of the courteous manner in which your agent was received, for the attention shown him, and for the hearty sympathy expressed for the welfare and prosperity of the bordering State of Dakota.

Respectfully,
E. A. SHERMAN, Special Agent.

The governor adds to the information furnished by Mr. Sherman that his mission was successful so far as the local board at St. Peter had power to act. The time for removing Dakota's patients was extended until the 11th of March, when their full board will be together, and would probably grant the full sixty days asked for, which they did.

The bill establishing the Dakota Insane Hospital near Yankton had become a law; and the Legislature also passed appropriations for the institution as follows:

To complete, furnish and paint the hospital building.....	$3,900
For the return of patients from Minnesota and Nebraska.....	1,000
For the maintenance of patients and their necessary clothing, and the maintenance of employees for two years.....	9,000
For the salary of superintendent and matron, for two years.....	1,500
For pay of seven other employees for two years.....	5,020
For incidental expenses, including fuel, lights, tools, pay and expense of trustees, books and stationery, for two years.....	2,460
For insurance of building for two years.....	90

A county board of insanity was provided for to consist of the judge of probate and two others to be appointed by the Board of County Commissioners, one a practicing physician, and the other a respectable practicing attorney.

As before stated, Governor Howard had expended from his private funds quite a large sum constructing the new hospital prior to the convening of the Legislature, which, as will be seen from his message, he claimed to have done under the law of necessity, and stated in substance that the Legislature could use its own pleasure in the matter of re-imbursement. The Legislature accepted and ratified what the governor had done, and enacted a special law to re-imburse him for moneys expended as follows:

There is hereby appropriated the sum of $2,386.30, to be paid to William A. Howard, governor of this territory, for money advanced by him in the erection of the hospital for the insane, of this territory. The territorial auditor is hereby directed to issue to Governor Howard three territorial warrants in payment of the sum appropriated in the first section of this act: one for the sum of $1,337.10, payable in one year; and one for the sum of $1,000, payable in two years—both payable two years from the first day of February, 1879, both bearing interest at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, which interest shall be paid annually; and one for the sum of $49.20 in payment and in liquidation of the interest from the date of the advances made by the governor to the first day of February, 1879, from which last date interest shall be calculated on the warrants herein provided for to be issued in settlement of his claim. Approved February 10, 1879.

A description of Dakota's first insane hospital as viewed by the members of the Legislature of 1870, may be of interest and is added:

It was a large frame, one-story structure fronting the south, with wings extending east and west on the north end of the main building, the wings being equal in height to the main part. Entering by the main door, to the right led into the office of the superintendent, in which there was a cabinet of medical supplies, and also a steward's desk. Opposite this office was the ladies' reception room, and the next two rooms on the left were the private apartments of the superintendent and his family; two rooms directly opposite were for the steward and his wife who was to be the matron of the institution. The next room on the right was the officer's dining room, and opposite on the left a spare room. Adjoining this was a large wardrobe extending nearly across the hall, which, by the way extended from the entrance to this wardrobe. The north end was partitioned off affording a roomy kitchen, pantry, store-room and laundry. The two wings on the north end were for the patients—the east wing for the females, and the west wing for the males, with a hall through the center of each wing, on each side of the hall being the sleeping apartments. Each side of the kitchen and adjoining it were dining rooms for the patients, one for each sex. There were two large cisterns holding 250 barrels each; one good well 90 feet deep; also a root cellar, 16x31. Two tanks, holding twenty and thirty-five barrels respectively, were placed above the kitchen and were to be supplied from the cistern by force pumps. Rubber hose was to be kept ready for use in case of fire, which was the enemy most dreaded. There was a bath room in each wing or ward, and pipes from the bath room or laundry would connect with the main sewer which would be constructed of vitrified tile, and would be about a quarter of a mile in length, emptying into a ravine to the southwest.

An inventory of the live stock revealed two horses, three cows, ten pigs and a lot of poultry.

INSANE HOSPITAL ORGANIZED

The insane hospital bill became a law on the 22d of February, 1879, and on the 23d following, Governor Howard appointed Rev. Joseph Ward, Josiah R. Sanborn, of Yankton County, and Alexander Hughes, of Union County, the first board of trustees. Joseph Ward was elected president of the board, and Alexander Hughes, secretary. On the 13th of March, the board advertised for supplies for furnishing the hospital. The bids were opened on the 15th. The dry goods and bedding contract was let to R. A. Ketchum; groceries to Blatt & Buerdorf; meat to John Curry; crockery to T. F. Marshall & Company; wood to Sylvester & Barber, all of Yankton. No proposals were received from outside bidders.

The hospital building was completed, inspected, and accepted by the board of trustees on Monday, March 24, 1879. Ed Calhoun, a Yankton builder, had charge of the work, and did a portion of it under contract.

About the 31st of March, Dr. J. K. Rainey, of Illinois, was appointed superintendent of the hospital. Prior to this appointment the position had been tendered to Doctor Stewart, the superintendent of the Nebraska State Hospital, who declined it. J. H. Burdick, of Yankton, was appointed steward.

Doctor Rainey, with two assistants, Steward Burdick being one, left Yankton for St. Peters, Minn., on the 9th of April, for the purpose of transferring the territory's insane patients from the Minnesota to the Dakota Hospital. Rev. Joseph Ward and Mr. Sanborn went to Lincoln, Neb., on the 7th, for a similar purpose. All this was accomplished without difficulty, the Nebraska contingent reaching their new quarters on Friday, April 11th. The names of the patients from Lincoln were Bernard, Hatch, Rickard and Olsen—the first three from Deadwood; the last from Cass County. Bernard, who was sent to Yankton, under a misapprehension in December previous, had become very violent, and seemed to have developed a suicidal mania. Doctor Rainey and Steward Burdick reached the new hospital Saturday evening, the 12th of April, with seventeen patients from St. Peter's, who came through by special car.

The first patient to be admitted after the establishment of the hospital, was F. A. Keeler, of Minnehaha County, April 25, 1879.

Doctor Rainey resigned the superintendency in less than a month after being appointed, and returned to Illinois. The resignation came unexpected, and whether it was the voluntary act of the official or was induced by a suggestion from the board, was not known to the public. The board then tendered the position to Dr. S. B. McGlumphy, assistant superintendent of the Nebraska Insane Hospital, who accepted, and entered upon his duties Tuesday, April 29, 1879. Another Sioux Falls patient, Mads Christiansen, was admitted to the hospital, May 12th.

FIRST PATIENTS

It may be stated that the first patients sent from any county to the Territorial Insane Hospital, came from Lawrence County, and reached Yankton, December 19, 1878. The action of the Lawrence County authorities was premature, as the Dakota Hospital was not in condition to receive patients, and in fact had not yet been recognized by the legislative body, which did not convene until about three weeks later. The action of the court at Deadwood had been taken without authority, based upon a rumor that the institution was receiving patients. The contracts with Minnesota and Nebraska were still in force and would not expire until February 1, 1879.

The commitment papers for these two unfortunates were made for the Dakota Institution and they were sent to Yankton. As the expense of returning them to Deadwood, and then returning them to Lincoln would have been considerable, the Yankton County authorities were prevailed upon to adopt the lunatics, and give them another legal examination. This done, they were both pronounced insane, and committed to the hospital at Lincoln; Lawrence County being held for all the expense. Their sojourn in Yankton continued until December 23d. These crazy men were William Bernard and John Hatch; both were in an almost hopeless mental condition. They were in charge of Constable Beeman, of Deadwood. Bernard's mania developed while in the Black Hills, and induced him to obtain money or other valuables under false pretenses, then dispose of the other valuables and pocket the proceeds. Evidently a serious case, possibly contracted by exposure to contagion. Bernard had proved quite unruly on the way from Deadwood to Yankton, by way of Cheyenne, Omaha, and Council Bluffs. It became necessary to handcuff him at the latter place. Mr. Hatch had been considered a man of unsound mind for a long time. His mania had developed into an uncontrollable desire to witness conflagrations on a large scale, and to gratify this irresistible propensity he had set fire to his own house. When the officers went to arrest him afterwards, he made a determined resistance, erected a barricade, and having a loaded gun, opened fire on the sheriff and his guard. The officers returned the fire, wounded the maniac in the hip, when he laid down his arms and surrendered. He was duly pronounced insane, and offered no resistance on the way out. At that season of the year the usually travelled and most comfortable route from the hills was by stage to Cheyenne, Wyo., thence by the Union Pacific Railway to Council Bluffs, from which point the railway extended to Yankton. Mileage was a great item of expense in transporting insane and convicts at that time. A single trip from the hills with one or two patients or convicts would amount to about four hundred dollars. From Bismarck to the territorial prison at Detroit cost nearly as much, and from Pembina to Yankton about the same.

The Legislature had appropriated $3,900.00 to complete the building, but it proved insufficient by $766.00. Of the $1,000.00 appropriated to remove the patients from St. Peter and Lincoln, only $340 was found necessary. Of the $2,460.00 set apart for fuel, lights, trustees expenses, books, stationery, etc., for two years, $2,200.00 were expended the first six months. On a basis of forty persons to provide for, the appropriation for the two years allowed $1.90 per week to each, which included subsistence and clothing of patients and subsistence of the officers and employees. There were five employees, including attendants, at first, and twenty-four patients. During the first six months after the hospital was opened, thirty-one patients were cared for; one died of consumption; one was discharged unimproved, and five were discharged fully recovered. While the most rigid economy was observed it was found impossible to maintain the institution on the basis of $1.90 per week per patient, and it became necessary to exceed this estimate, so that in the aggregate a deficit was created for the first two years of the hospital's career.

The reader is to understand that making provision for the support of an insane hospital was a new experience for the members of the Legislature, and a new experience for the trustees, a majority of the members having a large farming constituency, who watched the expenditure of the public moneys closely, and held their members of the Legislative Assembly responsible for any apparent as well as real extravagance in appropriations. The people generally, though equal to the average of any state or territory in intelligence and public spirit, knew comparatively little about the treatment of the insane; they did not appear to realize that they needed much more than food and clothing, and the membership of the Legislature at that time, and for many years following, apparently shared this erroneous opinion, and were almost equally uninformed regarding the importance of the treatment of insane people with the view of restoring them to their normal healthful mental and physical condition. The legislatures were therefore inclined to dispute the recommendations of the authorities in charge of the Insane Hospital and other public institutions, and as a rule were disposed to refuse many of the improvements asked for, and would also, arbitrarily, without reliable information, materially reduce the allowances recommended for the care, treatment and support of the patients.

Thus would the usefulness of the institution be crippled, and the administration unjustly blamed. The officers were placed in a position similar to Pharaoh and the Hebrews, when the latter were no longer furnished with straw for brick making; but were told to go and gather straw, and at the same time were compelled to furnish the full tale of brick which had been required when their master furnished the straw.

Owing to this uninformed condition of the public, Dakota's early insane patients were placed at a disadvantage, and their recovery retarded. Governor Howard's comments on this subject, made in his message of 1879, were most timely. He points out the importance of skillful and early treatment of the malady in order to insure a cure.

HAMLIN COUNTY'S REPRESENTATIVE

Shortly after the session opened, Mr. G. D. Wicklin, of Hamlin County, presented credentials claiming a seat in the House as the representative of the counties of Hamlin, Deuel, Codington and Grant, four counties that were not organized when the apportionment of 1877 was made. They had since become reasonably well populated, and the estimate was made that they were then inhabited by at least one thousand homesteaders, or a population of four or five thousand, which fact indicates the rapid influx of immigrants during these years following the opening of the Black Hills. Mr. Wicklin's credentials were given by authority of the counties named. They did not demand that their representative be admitted on an equal footing with the regularly apportioned members, but that he be given the privileges of the floor and permitted to promote the legislative interests of the Upper Big Sioux Valley and Big Stone region by recommending certain measures through the committees. The House favored the request of Mr. Wicklin's numerous constituents and he was provided with a desk and a legislative chair. He made an excellent record as a representative, according to the testimony of the House members; and a law was enacted permitting the counties Mr. Wicklin represented to levy a tax to pay him for his services, there being no funds available for such purpose in the federal fund appropriated for the pay of members.

The Legislature took occasion to pass a memorial to Congress remonstrating against the bill introduced by Judge Kidder which provided for the admission of Dakota as one state, and Delegate Bennett, who succeeded the judge on the 4th of March, as delegate, took the first opportunity to introduce a bill providing for a division of the territory on the forty-sixth parallel, and the admission of the southern half into the Union.

A NEW RAILWAY INCORPORATION LAW—GROSS EARNINGS TAXED

A representative of the railroad interests was present as a lobbyist at this session, and held audiences with the legislators, imparting to them the view of the railway builders and operators regarding railway legislation. The Northwestern and the Milwaukee were pushing their lines into and across the territory at this time. The railway representative was Mr. Charles E. Simmonds, of the Chicago & Northwestern. He did not ask for any legislation specially in the interest of his company, but wanted a liberal law that would encourage the development of the territory through railway extension, and at this time it was quite well settled that the railway companies named and the Southern Minnesota and Northern Pacific would all be actively engaged in construction work in the territory before the close of the year, the Northern Pacific extension being north from Fargo to Grand Forks and on to the international boundary. The laws of the territory governing such corporations were therefore of the first importance. The existing law was a part of the general incorporation law, and was regarded as antiquated. Representative Ainsley Gray, of Bismarck, appears to have been the leader in the movement for a new law. He introduced a bill early in the session to provide for the organization of railroad corporations and to regulate their operation, and to provide for the taxation of their property. Its provisions were quite liberal from the viewpoint of railroad people, and credit for drafting the measure was ascribed to the general attorney of the Chicago & Northwestern corporation. The taxation feature of the bill required operating railroad companies, for the first five years after beginning operations in the territory, to pay into the territorial treasury annually 2 per cent of its gross earnings, and 3 per cent of its gross earnings every year thereafter. This tax was in lieu of all other taxation on the property of the corporation. The bill was amended in some particulars and became a law February 18, 1879. It formed control for many years thereafter, and many efforts were made to change the taxation feature, which was quite objectionable to a growing anti-monopolistic sentiment in territorial politics. But the gross earnings plan held on through the territorial era. There was unexampled activity in railroad building following its adoption. From that day forward the "railroad question" became a dominant factor in the politics of the territory. It had appeared before to a slight extent in the Society of the Patrons of Husbandry and in local organizations of the farmers, but had not been a dominating factor in politics. Loyalty to the people's interests was thenceforth, to a great extent, measured by one's position on the "railroad question."

REPEALING EXEMPTION LAW

An unsuccessful effort was made to modify the Territorial Exemption Law, and a bill introduced for that purpose. The friends of the measure in the law-making body felt that the bill would be willingly supported by a majority of each House. There was, however, a strong pressure from without, hostile to any interference with the law as it stood, which reached the Legislature in the form of petitions and the proceedings of public meetings. The voice of the people, so far as it came to the legislative ears, was potent and was heeded. The popular argument insisted that a liberal exemption law was a strong inducement in securing immigration. In support of modification it was urged that the law was so liberal that it injured the credit of the business men in the markets of the country, where they purchase their supplies, and that wholesalers taxed them a higher per cent to cover the exemption risks. And furthermore that it made the collection of all debts, through the legal channels, unless the debts were secured by mortgage, so difficult and costly that it was cheaper to lose the debt than to sue for its recovery.

At this session a law was enacted providing for the care and education and maintenance of the deaf and dumb, and also the blind, at the expense of the territory, and the governor was authorized to contract with the states, either of Iowa, Minnesota or Nebraska, where public institutions for the education and care of this class of unfortunates had been established, for the keeping of those of Dakota. It was, however, provided in the law, that where the parents or guardians of such deaf or blind persons were able to do so, they should be required to pay the expense incurred. The county commissioners had jurisdiction to investigate all applications, and to authorize the removal of applicants to the institution selected by the state authorities.

At this session, under the guise of a bill entitled: "An act to amend chapter one of the political code," Representative Ansley Gray, of Bismarck, Burleigh County, sought to remove the capital of the territory to Bismarck. The time and the occasion was not ripe for such a move, and the bill expired in the first stages of legislation. It was renewed, with better success, four years later.

FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT

Congress in 1879, passed an act providing for an additional associate justice of the Supreme Court of Dakota Territory, and Jefferson P. Kidder, whose term as delegate in Congress from Dakota, expired with that session, was appointed justice of the new district. The law provided:

Until changed by the Legislative Assembly of said territory, the Fourth District of said territory shall consist of the following counties, to-wit: Clay, Union, Lincoln, Minnehaha, Moody, Brookings, Deuel, Grant, Codington, Lake, Wood, Hamlin, Clark, Greeley, Stone, Turner and McCook, and the Sisseton Wahpeton Indian Reservation; and the second district shall consist of the remainder of the territory which now constitutes said Second District as defined by the statutes of said territory.

The District Court of said Fourth District shall have no jurisdiction to try, hear or determine any matter or cause wherein the United States is a party, and no United States grand or petit jury shall be summoned in such court; but the said fourth district is hereby attached to and made a part of the Second Judicial District, for the purpose of hearing and determining all matters and causes arising within said Fourth District in which the United States is a party.

No justice of said territory shall sit in the Supreme Court upon the hearing, or take any part in the decision or determination of any cause or matter tried or determined by or before him as presiding judge of the District Court.

The names of the counties of Wood, Greeley and Stone, used in the act of Congress, had been dropped from the map by the Legislature of 1879, and others less deserving of the honor substituted.

Stone County was named in memory of a Dakota pioneer of 1858, an early James River ferryman, later a member of the Legislature, four years agent of the Yankton Santee Indians, and one of the first of the Dakota pioneers to plant and successfully cultivate a large acreage of forest trees on the treeless plains of the territory, thereby demonstrating that timber would thrive on the Dakota prairies. His practical work in many directions was known and recognized by all early Dakotans. He had an important influence in bringing into the territory its first railroad. Mr. Wood was a pioneer of the Vermillion Valley in 1860. A member of the first Legislature in 1862, and a most excellent citizen; he may be asked to divide honors with Lieut. John R. Wood, of Union County, also a pioneer of 1860, and first lieutenant of Company B, Dakota Cavalry, as a brave dependable soldier and officer. He was with General Sully in his famous expedition across the Bad Lands to the Yellowstone in 1864. The name of Greeley had earned national fame when Dakota was made a territory. He was a great journalist and a great political leader. Another most excellent man and citizen was Mr. Greeley, of Deuel County, well known as a live stock grower and popular as an agricultural writer. It was doubtless the Dakotan that the Legislature intended to honor; but paraphrasing Goldsmith, a breath of favor had placed them there, and a later breath of favor to others swept their names from the map. The Territorial Legislature of 1881 re-enacted or re-affirmed this law of Congress; but owing to a change of the names of several of the counties, which had a place on the map of Dakota, but were not organized at the time of the congressional enactment, the territorial law defined the fourth district, as follows, to-wit:

That the counties of Union, Clay, Lincoln, Turner, Minnehaha, McCook, Moody, Lake, Brookings, Kingsbury, Deuel, Hamlin, Clark, Grant, Codrington and Day shall constitute the Fourth Judicial District, created by act of Congress, March 3, 1879.

The Black Hills counties, Lawrence, Pennington and Custer, constituted the First District. The Second District included Yankton, Bon Homme, Charles Mix, Douglas, Hutchinson, Davidson, Hanson, Miner, Aurora, Brule, Buffalo, Hughes, Hyde, Sully, Potter, Walworth, Campbell and Beadle counties. The Third District embraced the counties of north of the 46th parallel, namely: Pembina, Cavalier, Rolette, Grand Forks, Ramsey, DeSmet, Walsh, Traill, Cass, Richland, Ransom, Barnes, Griggs, Stutsman, LaMoure, Foster, Gingras, Kidder, Logan, Burleigh, Emmons, Stevens, Morton, Mercer, Stark and Billings.

The Great Sioux Indian Reservation occupied the country south of the Cannon Ball River, west of the Missouri, and east of the Black Hills, and was attached to the second district.

DAKOTA PENITENTIARY PROPOSED

The penitentiary had been located in 1862, at Bon Homme, but nothing had been done toward its construction by the territory, and Congress had consented to aid it by appropriating the proceeds of the Internal Revenue tax in the territory, after the expense of collecting it had been subtracted, during the years 1867, 1868, and 1869.

The excess of revenue for these years amounted to nothing, and that plan was not revived; though it was deemed quite certain that Congress would, in accordance with its policy shown toward other territories, give substantial aid toward the construction of the prison for the reason that the Government could make economical use of it in confining United States prisoners sentenced from the United States courts in Dakota and Montana also.

The law making an appropriation for the maintenance of an insane hospital, also provided an appropriation of $10,000.00 for the erection of a penitentiary; and also salaries for warden and officers, and furnishing and subsistence; but it did not change the location from Bon Homme County, and made no provision for the government of the prison. These matters had been provided in separate bills. These separate bills, however, while they passed both Houses, did not become laws because of the neglect or refusal of the governor to approve them. They failed to reach him until the final day of the session. The organic law made it the duty of the governor to sign all bills within three days after their presentation to him, or return them within that time to the House in which they originated, accompanied by his objections in writing, unless the Legislature should, by adjournment, prevent their return, in which case they would not become laws. The final adjournment took place within the three days allowed the governor for consideration, the bills were not approved, and the penitentiary remained at Bon Homme, with an appropriation for its erection and maintenance, but no law prescribing or providing for its management or re-location. Councilman Pettigrew, who had been at much pains in preparing and securing the passage of these bills, was grievously disappointed at this unfortunate turn in his affairs; while the members from Bon Homme County were correspondingly elated.

The change in the location of the penitentiary was strenuously opposed by Councilman M. H. Day, and Rep. J. H. Stephens, of Bon Homme County.

There was little evidence of serious disappointment among the members of the Legislature generally, or with the people. The location of the institution at Sioux Falls was looked upon with favor because of its abundant supply of building material; but as conditions had existed in the territory, including immigration up to about this date, the building of a penitentiary did not appeal to the members of the Legislature as the best economy, and this opinion was shared generally among the people. The convicts could be transported and cared for at Detroit or other state prisons at no greater expense than would be incurred by providing and equipping a prison and caring for them at home, and there was good reason to expect that Congress would make an appropriation for prison purposes as it had done for other territories.

The case with the Insane Hospital was entirely different. There was no alternative but to erect and maintain this institution. Had this been neglected, our insane would have been returned to the counties where they belonged prior to becoming a charge upon the territory, and the counties would have confined them in jails or in county asylums at a cost manifold greater than would be required in a territorial institution.

The penitentiary bills had been made companions of the Insane Hospital bills during their progress through the Legislature, and, by this means, at least partially, had gained sufficient support to pass both Houses, though their final passage so late in the session, would seem to have been determined upon by other shrewd law-makers for the purpose of defeating them in the manner stated.

Events, however, were shaping and came to full fruition during the ensuing year, which would have justified the building of the penitentiary in 1879. No one could have foreseen the overwhelming wave of immigration that flowed into the territory during the summer following the extension of two important lines of railroad that crossed our eastern border from Minnesota and Iowa early in the summer of that year, and carried their construction into and across the James River; the immigrants not only followed the railroads, but marched in the van into the unsettled regions, overstepping the surveyed domain and squatting on those the surveyor had not been able to reach. These lines were C. M. & St. Paul and the Northwestern.

The same activity in railroad building was going on in the northern portion of the territory in the Red River Valley and new lines were constructed from the Red River westward opening up the Cheyenne Valley.

RAILROADS

The name of J. J. Hill appears in connection with the extension of railroads through Dakota, particularly in the northern half of the territory. A statement appeared in the Republican at Fargo, virtually contradicting a rumor that the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul was about securing control of the St. Paul & Pacific Railroad, and explained:

The St. Paul & Pacific is a great corporation, with 574 miles of its own lines completed, and the Red River & Manitoba leased (from St. Vincent, opposite Pembina, to Winnipeg), with its Alexandria branch extended through Fergus Falls to Barnesville, giving it two great lines from St. Paul and Minneapolis to the Red River Valley, and the only road north from the states to British America. Mr. James J. Hill, one of the active capitalists connected with this road, has long been in the transportation business, and now has a chance to engineer an extensive line of paying railroad himself, and he won't want to give it up.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, BROOKINGS, DAKOTA TERRITORY, 1885

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD BRIDGE AT BISMARCK, 1883

About August 1, 1879, the St. Paul & Pacific Railroad (Jas. J. Hill's new enterprise), filed its articles of incorporation to build a road from Walpeton to a point on the Northern Pacific near Casselton.

THE NORTHERN PACIFIC

Track laying on the extension of the Northern Pacific Railway west of Bismarck, after a long rest of five and a half years, was resumed in February, 1879, west of the Missouri nearly opposite its terminal at a point called Mandan, though the new City of Mandan, which had taken the place of the pioneer town was located about three and a half miles west of the Missouri, bordering the Little Heart River. It was to this point the railroad was extended early in 1879.

In 1879, the Northern Pacific located its line from the Little Missouri in Billings County, to the Yellowstone River, a distance of sixty-five miles. Work was being pushed eastward at that time on the Pen d'O'Reille division, from the Pacific end.

In 1878, Chief Engineer Rosser surveyed a line for a branch of the Northern Pacific from Fargo, to the international boundary, striking the boundary line about seventeen miles west of Pembina.

The company began building its Casselton branch, twenty miles west of Fargo, in July, 1879. This line was extended to Larimore in Grand Forks County and from that point to the eastern border of Cavalier County. At the same time the St. Paul and Pacific were building their line from Walpeton in Richland County, to Casselton, which later became a link of the Great Northern. This line was expected to tap the Saskatchewan wheat country, a distance from Casselton of 140 miles, and about one hundred miles west of Pembina.

The Worthington and Sioux Falls Railroad Company filed articles of incorporation in the office of the secretary of the territory, in July, 1879; the said articles stating that it was the purpose of the company to construct a railroad from Sioux Falls to the Missouri River, through the counties of Minnehaha, McCook, Hanson, Davison, Cragin (Aurora), and Buffalo. It was then the announced purpose of the company to build through to the Black Hills. The road was constructed to Mitchell in Davison County, and there rested. R. F. Pettigrew, of Sioux Falls, was a director of the company; the other directors were Minnesotans.

The Village of Dell Rapids, Minnehaha County, voted aid to the Southern Minnesota Railway Company, in 1880, amounting to $12,500.00 in village bonds, bearing 7 per cent interest and having twenty years to run. The election appears to have been held without lawful authority, and at the legislative session of 1881, the election and issue of bonds was legalized, and further authority given to the village to issue bonds due in ten years, bearing 7 per cent, amounting to $2,500.00 to defray the expense incurred by said village, in procuring the right-of-way for said railroad.

THE NORTHWESTERN

The Dakota Central Railroad Company, whose articles of incorporation were filed with the secretary of the territory, May 16, 1879, propose to construct a railroad from the east line of Brookings County, west, through Brookings, Kingsbury, Beadle, Hand, Hughes counties, to the Missouri River at the mouth of Medicine Knoll Creek. This was the Chicago and Northwestern extension or branch, starting from Tracy, Minnesota.

IMMIGRATION AND CROPS

Eighteen hundred and seventy-nine was equal in all respects to the best of Dakota's years—particularly in respect to immigration, railroad construction, and farm produce, notwithstanding the drawback of a grasshopper raid which injured the small grain, including corn, in the southeastern portion of the territory, along the lower valleys of the Big Sioux, Vermillion and James rivers. As the federal census would be taken the following year, the unprecedented volume of immigration attracted much attention.

Governor Howard, who did considerable traveling throughout the territory, that year, making notes of improvements generally and immigration, estimated the increase in population at 50,000 and much the larger portion came in the spring and early summer. It was certainly "a banner year," for all Dakota.

The wheat crop in the northern part of Dakota was almost perfection. In a general way it was the most prosperous year the territory had enjoyed.

William VanEps, a Sioux Falls pioneer who had become interested in towns springing up in the James River Valley, and spent much time in that section, informed the Sioux Falls newspaper, the Pantagraph, that in all his experience in new countries, he had never seen anything in the way of rapid settlement like the immigration to the James River Valley in 1879. In one week one solid township of thirty-six sections, except the school lands, comprising 136 claims was all taken up in three days time, and this was but a single point in a scope of country ten times larger that had the appearance of being as rapidly settled.

LAND DISTRICTS

The land districts in the southern half of the territory, the boundaries of which were changed by the Land Department of the United States in April, 1879, embraced the counties as hereinafter named.

Sioux Falls District—Mimnehaha, Moody, Brookings, Wood, Lake, McCook, Hanson, Davison, Bramble, Miner, Kingsbury, Cragin, Wetmore, and Burchard counties, and two townships in width from the eastern sides of Brule, Buffalo and Hyde counties.

Yankton District—Union, Clay, Lincoln, Turner, Yankton, Bon Homme, Hutchinson, Armstrong, Charles Mix and Douglas.

Watertown District—Deuel, Grant, Hamlin, Codington, Clark, Greeley, Stone, Spink, Thompson, Mills and Beadle counties, and two townships wide off the east side of Hand, Faulk, Edmunds, and McPherson counties, and the Sisseton Indian Reservation.

The other land districts at Fargo, Bismarck and Deadwood, remained unchanged. Many of the counties named in these districts were subsequently, by legislative enactment, given new names and their boundaries newly defined. Many of them had no settlers and were not organized. All the central portion of the territory, from the 44th parallel, to within a few miles of the Northern Pacific, was yet unoccupied.

In the fall of 1879, it was officially claimed that the United States Land Office at Fargo, was doing the largest business of any office in the United States.

There were five steamboats and barges at the Grand Forks shipyards during the winter of 1878-79.

HURON LOCATED—OTHER NOTABLE PROGRESS

Huron, a new townsite was located by the Dakota Central Railway Company, on the James River, between townships 110 and 111, in August, 1879. The railway at that time was advancing west through Brookings and Kingsbury counties. Scotland was founded in 1879, and the Running Water branch of the Milwaukee was graded from Marion Junction.

A new and superior quartz mill was put in operation on the Homestake properties, at Lead City, in August. It was provided with 120 stamps, and the power for operating it was provided by a 300-horsepower engine. The capacity of the mill was said to be 525 tons of quartz a day. It was claimed to be the best machine of its kind, and the largest, or of greater capacity, than any quartz mill then in operation in this country.

General Terry, commanding the Department of Dakota, made a brief mention of the military situation in the territory in his annual report, substantially as follows:

The hostile Indians occasioned no serious trouble in 1870. The most quarrelsome element were with Sitting Bull in British Columbia, with headquarters at Wood Mountain. The most important military event in the Department of Dakota had been the movement of Colonel Miles across the Yellowstone from Fort Keogh and on to the British boundaries, for the purpose of watching the movements of Sitting Bull (see chapters regarding Custer and Sitting Bull), and receiving the surrender of any bands of the turbulent element that desired to be restored to the hospitality of the Great Father. A large number of these came in and sued for peace about that time.

Work was vigorously prosecuted on the Missouri Division of the Northern Pacific Railroad. This division began at the Missouri River, opposite Bismarek, and extended 100 miles towards the Little Missouri River. Eighty miles of roadbed had been completely graded, and track laid for fifty miles. Four companies of infantry, for the protection of working parties, were employed along the line under construction.

Fort Meade, at the base of the Black Hills, was under construction in 1870, and the necessary garrison buildings were completed.

General Terry recommended an appropriation of $200,000 for two additional posts between Fort Buford and Fort Assinaboine. This would complete the chain of posts from the Red River to the Rocky Mountains, beginning with Fort Pembina on the Red, thence to Totten, Buford, the two new posts recommended thence to Assinaboine. There was an interval of 250 miles between Buford and Assinaboine, and between these two was the great route of communication pursued by the hostile Indians coming from the camps in Canada to the Missouri and Yellowstone.

GREAT FIRE IN DEADWOOD

The most destructive fire that had ever occurred in the Territory of Dakota, or possibly in any portion of the country west of the territory, destroyed the greater and all the most valuable part of the new City of Deadwood, the commercial capital of the Black Hills mining region, on the morning of September 26, 1870. The fire started at twenty minutes past 2 o'clock in the morning, in the Star Bakery on Sherman Street, one of the principal business thoroughfares. The building was situated in the midst of a block of combustible buildings, constructed of highly inflammable material. The same place had on several occasions been the cause of great alarm from the fact that a fire had broken out on three previous occasions during the year in the same back room. This time the blaze was started by a baker upsetting a coal oil lamp. All efforts to extinguish the flames were unavailing. They pierced every portion of the structure, and soon ignited the buildings on each side. The flames spread, with wonderful rapidity. This starting point was just south of the confluence of the Deadwood and White-wood creeks, with the wind blowing strongly from the south. When the fire reached the hardware store of Jensen & Bliss, three doors from its starting point, which it did in an incredible short space of time, eight kegs of blasting powder exploded with terrific force, that seemed to shake the mountains. This blast threw sparks for a great distance on every side, starting the burning of a number of other buildings. The fire departments were promptly on the spot, but the flames had attacked the structure in which their apparatus was kept and soon destroyed their hook and ladder material and their hose and hose carriage. This situation left the city helpless to fight the destroyer, fanned as it was by a strong breeze. Scores of people, including families, who were tenants in the upper stories of the business houses, barely escaped with their lives in their night clothes. In a brief time the fire had crossed Lee Street, which runs east and west, and was well on its way to Main Street, where many of the leading business houses and public buildings stood. The people were apparently half crazed, and hundreds, perhaps thousands, went up the hills on the north of the gulch carrying with them all the personal effects they had been able to snatch from the flames, women half-clad and with children in their arms clinging to them, and men fairly staggering under the burden of bedding and such articles as they were able to get, perched upon their shoulders. The fire passed down Main Street to Gold and Wall streets, and back on the hills three squares, leveling everything. In the other direction it extended up Sherman Street two blocks, where it was checked by blowing up a number of small buildings, saving some residences of excellent design and finish in Ingleside and Cleveland.

The area covered by the terrible scourge was about twenty-five acres, consuming a total of about one hundred and fifty business houses and seventy-five residences, and entailing a loss at first estimated at $3,000,000. The insurance carried upon this property was also placed at $100,000 by the early compiler. The granaries in the city were filled with thousands of bushels of wheat and oats, the harvest having been unusually abundant surrounding the hills and the merchants had received a good share of their fall and winter stocks, which were much more heavy than would have been the case with merchants located in the ordinary market towns east. A number of the merchants had built fireproof structures in connection with their business houses in which they had stored large quantities of their wares. None of these buildings were destroyed, and to this prudential forethought the people were enabled to procure, directly after the disaster, nearly everything needed to establish them in a comfortable way to begin again the accumulating of the fortunes the holocaust had taken from them in an early morning that would never be forgotten.

All the newspaper offices, hotels, Masonic, Odd Fellows, and Knights of Pythias halls were destroyed. After the fire broke out the telegraph office was placed in a store belonging to B. D. Kelly, outside the fire limits, and escaped without injury. The Government Signal Office and the United States Military Telegraph Station lost nearly all their meteorological instruments. The daily newspapers, the Pioneer and also the Times, lost practically everything and were obliged to purchase new plants.

The burned business buildings had been nearly all of light frames, and the fire had left little in the way of debris to clear away, which afforded the enterprising dealers and traders to rake away the ashes in scores of places where the buildings had stood, and before another evening the principal streets were lined with tents and rough board structures in which merchants were selling goods, restaurants were feeding the hungry, and Deadwood had, like the fabled Phoenix, risen from its ashes.

Because of the immense amount of valuable property that had been hastily piled up in various exposed places, and to protect it from vandalism, a message was sent to General Sturgis, the commandant at Fort Meade, requesting the loan of a company of troops to guard the place. This request was complied with under an emergency order from the gallant commander, who sent the afflicted city in addition to an efficient guard, ten wagons and two ambulances to transport the destitute people to Fort Meade, where they were furnished with camps and rations.

The light insurance carried was due to the heavy charge of the companies for fire indemnity which was justified by the combustible character of the buildings, and the lack of fire protection. The new waterworks built for the city had just been completed and were tested for the first time the day before the fire. The destruction of the hook and ladder apparatus and the hose by the fire before they could be reached, prevented any test of the new water system in fighting a conflagration, but in this case the ordinary fire protection system of a community of 10,000 people would have been at a disadvantage. It would have required the facilities of a large city to have successfully resisted the rapid march and fierce heat of that pandemonium of flame.

Offers of assistance poured in from eastern merchants with whom the Black Hills dealers had traded, and many incidents of this character greatly encouraged the unfortunate people. They were testimonials to their probity, and the sound and substantial reputation they enjoyed in business circles.

The Deadwood Times managed to issue a number of its papers on the 28th of September, three days after the fire, and gave a nearly complete list of the names of the losers by the fire, and the amounts lost by each, prefacing the list with the following excellent and inspiring comments on the situation, all of which is here produced, as showing the undaunted enterprise and confidence of the founders of our Black Hills industries, and their substantial worthiness as citizens of a commonwealth, which at that time was attracting attention throughout the country.

The old saying that "it is an ill wind that blows nobody good" can with reason be applied with much force in our case. Probably in the history of the country there has been no such destruction of property, comprising so many business houses and the dwellings of so many families, throwing so many people out of business and employment and families out of a habitation, where there is so little destitution and suffering as there has been or will be to our people from this fire. Of course many have lost their all, their last dollar, and with nothing but the clothing they had on their persons saw the accumulations of years wiped out and vanish in smoke, and they found themselves, on Friday morning, without a mouthful to eat, nor shelter to protect them from the elements. Their character and credit that they had made in the past is all that is left, and the only remaining capital upon which to commence anew. And this is so well established that employment and business is abundant for everyone who desired to commence anew, with hope, confidence, and energy.

Our merchants did not have first to apply to their eastern correspondents for new stocks, but without asking and before they had time to clear away the debris and learn if they had anything left in the smoldering ruins, proffers of goods to any amount came from the wholesale houses in St. Paul, Milwaukee, Chicago, St. Louis, Boston, and New York, and in some instances large invoices of goods were shipped without waiting for orders.

The demand for labor at large wages is assured to every mechanic and laborer who is willing to work, and no man need lay idle a single day from now until spring. The erection of new buildings commenced on the morning of the fire, and before it was known that the flames had been checked and were under control. Since that time, and as fast as men could be put to work, arrangements have been consummated to erect new buildings, until now more than half the vacant lots have partially constructed frames of new houses upon them.

The voluntary response of the country in generous offers of substantial assistance to our wants and needs is a circumstance connected with our misfortune that will always be gratefully remembered by the people of Deadwood. The first message was from the Hon. G. G. Bennett, our congressional delegate, at Yankton, to General Dawson, inquiring what we needed, and assuring us of his readiness to aid in any way desired. Then came similar offers from Helena, Mont., and the mayor of Yankton expressing the sympathy of the people of those cities, and tendering substantial aid and assistance. The messages of generosity were acknowledged, and as there was no apparent necessity for contributions from abroad, they were so notified.

There is no advance in the price of provisions or staple articles of groceries, and with what are in store and known to be en route, there is no likelihood of any scarcity of any class of goods to make an advance in their price possible, even if there was a disposition upon the part of any one of our dealers to take advantage of the situation to raise their prices, which we are happy to say there is not.

Another very commendable practice among the merchants in this day of tribulation and destitution for many, was the credit system which was freely extended to every worthy and needy person.

GOVERNOR HOWARD AT DEADWOOD

Governor Howard, who was at the capital of the territory, was among the first to journey to Deadwood, and offer his services to the stricken community, and give them such substantial aid as he could offer. An extra session of the Legislature was proposed in order that some measures might be enacted to enlarge the power of the city and county in such an emergency, but there was no authority for calling an extra session, and Congress was not in session where the authority resided. The governor reached Deadwood October 5th, about ten days after the fire, and on the 7th a public meeting was held at the Congregational Church, to listen to an address from his excellency. We produce that portion of his remarks regarding the great disaster that had befallen those who composed his large audience, as showing his practical opinion of what the people most needed in their present condition. He first said:

I would like to speak about Dakota. Our territory is four times as large as Ohio. In the course of time it will become one or more great states. It is a wonderful fact that since the United States became a nation, down to the present time, the increase in population has become in ratio 12 per cent greater than last year. Today our republic's population is 40,000,000. In another 100 years we will have at least 80,000,000 people enjoying the wealth and produce of this great country, and I don't know but that about 1000 we will have a complete 100,000,000 people. That is, if the same ratio of increase continues. Friends, if this number of people inhabit the United States of America, what will be the condition of Dakota? I leave you to judge. It is as wonderful a thing as has ever characterized a nation.

In a few years we shall have a railroad, or more than one, perhaps, coursing through this beautiful Black Hills country. With it will come other evidences of your prosperity, and you deserve it. My admiration for this country is greater than ever, since the recent catastrophe which has overtaken you, and has made many of you poor. But let me tell you right here, that what I admire most is your indomitable pluck in helping one another and refusing all aid from outsiders. I am and will be only too happy to offer you assistance—and on the spot. It is only a mite, but you are welcome to it. This is genuine pluck, and may your refusals of all aid only be a means of rebuilding your town to more beautiful proportions than ever before, is the wish of your fond admirer before you. You are all good citizens, and whether white or black, I shall be proud to shake any man's hand who will step forward and do me that honor.

Immense applause followed this earnest and emphatic declaration of the governor, which was followed by a season of introduction and handshaking, that partook largely of a reunion of old friends who had come out for a joyful occasion. The governor had struck a responsive chord in the hearts of those who had listened to his remarks. There was no flavor of flattery in his words, simply earnestness and honest emphasis.

The governor returned from his trip to the hills by the Bismarck route, and the Northern Pacific. He spent a day or two at Fargo and was taken around the town and out into its rural environs, in order that he might have more good things to say about Dakota, for Fargo at the time was growing rapidly and substantially, but the governor told them the country was growing more rapidly than the city, and they had much to do before they could catch up with their rural customers. The year had been one of great prosperity throughout the territory, and the northern portion had received its full share.

The rebuilding of Deadwood was not accomplished as rapidly as was its destruction, but it is a question whether any city in the United States, following such a ruinous and complete conflagration, was restored fully, in a modern and most substantial manner, in less time than had been occupied in building the new Deadwood—the Phoenix Deadwood. The fire occurred September 26th, and on the 20th of December, less than two months later, we have an authentic report that Every vacant lot, made so by the great fire, is now covered by good substantial buildings, and despite the intense cold weather, we have now a city even more prosperous than before the fire. A city with banks, representing millions of capital, hotels capable of accommodating hundreds of guests, filled to overflowing, great storehouses stocked with everything which the world supplies for the comfort of mankind, manufacturing industries of various kinds, churches, school houses, a courthouse, theaters, and a jail of the fire-proof and burglar proof, and prisoner proof pattern. The city has now a population of more than six thousand. The city schools are crowded to their fullest capacity with pupils, and the churches have more numerous congregations than ever. For the last week the thermometer has been ranging in the neighborhood of 20° below zero, and this, together with the high altitude here, would indicate cold weather. It is cold, and extraordinary even for this mountainous region, but we do not realize or feel even this unusual frigid atmosphere any more sensibly than we did the temperature of zero when we wintered for ten winters in the Missouri Valley. Weak persons, those not robust, suffer if exposed during such cold spells, but the robust of both sexes pay little heed to it, except to increase their gait when walking in the air, with their mouth covered with one mittened hand, to obstruct the passage of the cold air to the lungs. By compelling yourself to breathe through your nostrils, the natural avenue, the air has time and opportunity to get warmed up before it reaches the breathing mechanism. But Deadwood is a larger city and has improved almost beyond description, by being rehabilitated.

DEATH OF CAPTAIN MINER

Capt. Nelson Miner, a citizen of Vermillion, where he settled in 1860, before the organization of the Territory of Dakota, died at his home in that city, on the 24th of October, 1870, after a short illness. He had been one of the useful men during the pioneer period, and was generally esteemed for his many excellent qualities. His title of captain was one he had richly earned, he had adequately given of his services to the Government and to the people, during the Civil war, four years of active duty in the field, defending the frontiers of Dakota from hostile Indians, who were not only numerous, but bent on war and the extermination of the white race from the territory. He was commissioned captain by Gov. William Jayne, in 1861, under an order from the Department of War, authorizing the raising of two companies of cavalry in the territory. This was during the first year of the great Civil war, when in every state the work of recruiting the vast armies that were later engaged in that struggle, was in progress. Captain Miner did the work of recruiting his company to a great extent; it was mustered into the service of the United States the following March, as Company A, First Regiment, Dakota Cavalry; entered the field without delay, and knew little rest for nearly four years. Captain Miner, had he been with a regiment from the states would have reached a much higher rank before the close of his service, for he was an able commander, perfectly fearless, sought for when hazardous undertaking was contemplated, and he never failed to win the highest encomiums of his superiors, but as there were but two companies in his fragment of a regiment, he could only look for promotion by consenting to separate from his company. The glitter of epaulettes which such a change promised, was no compensation for the abandonment of his boys, all of whom held him in the highest respect, and trusted implicitly in his skill and courage as a commander to lead them prudently and skillfully through the dangers they were forced to brave in the hazardous employment of soldiers in time of active war. The captain felt all the solicitude and affection of a parent for his troopers. The high regard and confidence was truly mutual.

The captain and his company served during the Civil war with substantial credit, receiving from General Sully, at the close of the war, a letter of commendation for faithful service. The captain's company was known to the general as the "Coyotes," because of their fleetness when in pursuit of the enemy. The company never found an occasion that compelled it to retreat. Mr. Nelson Miner came to Dakota in 1860, from Adel, Dallas County, Ia., and opened a hotel at Vermillion, but he soon gave it up for a career in the service of his country. His company protected the scattered and feeble settlements of Dakota, unaided by other military force, for nearly a year after it was mustered in. It was split into a half dozen small detachments, and guarded the country from Choteau Creek to the Big Sioux, including the outlying cluster of white people, at Sioux Falls, and the hostile red men learned during this time that he was ready to meet them at all times if he could catch them, for he was never known to retreat. Indians have a wholesome respect for such a command and give him a name typical of his fighting qualities. The Indian stories and sketches in this work will enable the reader to get a correct measure of Miner in the field on different occasions. He returned to Vermillion at the close of the war in 1865, and resumed his hotel-keeping where he had left off four years before. There was not a particle of style or boast about the gentleman, but like John Burns, at Gettysburg, he shouldered his gun when the battle was over, and quietly went back to his cows and his bees. But his country remembered him slightly by making him register of the land office at Vermillion. The Republic felt grateful to its veteran defenders, but it must always be remembered that while there were nearly a million of the brave boys who deserved reward in a substantial manner, there was an office for only a small per cent. The general feeling among the people was staunchly in favor of giving the offices to the returned soldiers. In addition to the land office position, Captain Miner was honored by his constituents at home with an election to the Legislature, Upper House, for three terms. It was an honorable office and one of responsibility, and the captain filled it with credit. The captain was a fairly good manager, and had accumulated sufficient to free his mind from worry about the future on that account. A newspaper, giving a brief and truthful obituary, concluded thus:

There has been a great deal to admire in the quiet, unostentatious life of Captain Miner, and much that could be patterned after with earthly and eternal profit to those who will follow the teachings of his honest career. He died in the faith of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

He left a family consisting of a widow and three children, two sons and a daughter, all of whom remained in the territory.

PRAIRIE FIRE, BIG SIOUX VALLEY

In the spring of 1879, beginning the last of March, and continuing for possibly a week, the Big Sioux Valley, from the southern portion of Union County to Brookings County, was the theater of the most disastrous prairie fire that had scourged the farming settlements of the territory. The farmers were the keenest sufferers always from the burning of the prairies. The dry grass of the previous fall was abundant, and the flaming grass, once under way, was impossible to control. Hundreds of farmers, who had accumulated a fair beginning for a prosperous farm life, were ruined financially, losing their barns, grain, implements, much live stock, and here and there even their dwellings were swept away, though by giving their entire exertions to the saving of the family residence, many of these were saved, or most of them, but men, women and children were fatally burned, and a greater number so seriously, that they were permanently injured. Lincoln County people, apparently, suffered the heaviest losses in property, owing to the greater number of farms exposed. The fire threatened the lower Town of Canton, and only by the most strenuous exertions, was the place protected. Sioux Falls, then a village, did not entirely escape. Buildings within the village were burned.

Everywhere along the valley, the conflagration raged, fanned by a strong wind, and everywhere men and women were working in the dense smoke to stay the progress of the destroyer. The ordinary fire-break proved of little value, the high wind carrying torches of burning grass through the air for hundreds of feet, igniting the grass and frequently trapping the fire fighters between two fire walls. It was in Northern Union and Southern Lincoln counties, that the blazing valley was described as a mass of fire six miles wide and twenty miles long, consuming residences, rural schoolhouses, country churches, while domestic animals could be seen fleeing through the smoke and flame, and occasionally a human life was preserved by flight, and rapid flight.

The valley above Sioux Falls for a distance of thirty miles was completely burned over.

A calamity so widespread and destructive of personal fortunes, reduced a large number of deserving people to penury, and measures of relief were immediately resorted to from the neighboring communities of the territory.

The burned district was over one hundred miles in length, up and down the valley, and varied in width from two to three to twenty miles, and this did not take into account the burned area on the Iowa side below Sioux Falls. It proved the most destructive, and covered a larger occupied domain than any prairie burning that had occurred since the territory was settled by white people. It entailed the loss of a life time of industry and savings upon a more numerous class of worthy people, than any similar calamity, and cost more human lives than any former flood or flame in Dakota.

W. C. T. U. ORGANIZED

An order of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union for the Territory of Dakota, was instituted at Yankton, at the close of a territorial temperance meeting held at Yankton, November 14, 1879. The association was organized by the election of the following officers: President, Mrs. (Governor) Wm. A. Howard; secretary, Mrs. Stewart Sheldon, Vermillion; treasurer, Mrs. Wm. H. McVay, Yankton; vice presidents: Mrs. G. W. Kingsbury, Yankton; Mrs. K. B. Finley, Vermillion; Mrs. M. B. Fauss, Elk Point; Mrs. Lucius Kingsbury, Canton; Mrs. Melvin Grigsby, Sioux Falls; Mrs. M. B. Hughes, Firesteel; Mrs. George Mead, Springfield; Miss Lida Bowen, Pierre; Mrs. George I. Foster, Fargo; Mrs. A. D. Thomas, Deadwood.

The order resolved to become an auxiliary of the National Christian Temperance Union; and the vice presidents were authorized and urged to organize local societies in the several counties under their respective jurisdictions.

INDIANS

A census of the Santee Indians who had located at Flandreau, in Moody County, in 1869, was taken in August, 1879, ten years later, by Rev. John Eastman, a native Santee missionary. He found 321 Indians in Moody County; 57 could read English, and 137 could read the Dakota language. They had 620 acres under cultivation; owned 99 horses, 62 oxen, 48 cows, and 38 other cattle.

The Yankton Indians were divided into eight bands in 1879, under the following chiefs: One, Pa-do-ne-pa-pi, Strike-the-Rec. Two, Psi-ka-Wa-kin-yan, Jumping Thunder. Three, P-te-Wa-kan-Na-jin, Medicine Cow. Four, Ma-gaska, White Swan. Five, Tun-kan-Was-te-na, Pretty Rock, Felix Bonnot. Six, Wy-a-ka-Sin, Feather-in-the Ear. Seven, Wan-mi-di-Sa-pa, Black Eagle, John Ree. Eighth, Te-pe-Sa-pa-Black Tepe, Philip J. Deloria.

Senator McCrary, of Kentucky, submitted a report from the Joint Committee, appointed to inquire into the expediency of transferring the Indian Bureau from the Interior to the War Department, which was signed by four members of the committee, in favor of the transfer. This report was submitted February 1, 1879, and contained the following paragraph:

We believe the interests of the Government and the good of the Indians will be best promoted by transferring the management of Indian affairs to the war department, leaving it discretionary with the secretary of war to appoint civil agents to those agencies at which, in his judgment, the interests of all concerned will be best secured by such agent, and officers of the army where the interests of the service require it.

No action was taken by the House on the report, but it undoubtedly reflected the sentiment of a large minority of the members who had been made familiar with the eccentricities of Indian management during the Hayes administration under Schurz and Hayt. Their experimental reform work had been a succession of serious mistakes; but the Indian Rights Association and other powerful influences could not be made to believe that a change to the War Department would be advantageous to the Indians.

Sixty-one families of German Russians, numbering 315 persons, came into Dakota, by way of Yankton, July 25, 1879, and were given a reception by their countrymen. They brought with them nearly one million dollars of money largely in gold. They came direct from the old country, and belonged largely to the Mennonite sect, and were from the government of Tauria, Russia. This party did not design to take up Government land, and purchased from settlers in Hutchinson, Armstrong and Hanson counties.

Specie payments which had been suspended since the breaking out of the Civil war in 1861, were resumed eighteen years later, January 1, 1879.

Fort Union above Fort Buford which was built for a trading post in 1830, by the American Fur Company, was in ruins in 1879, but these disclosed that it had enclosed a number of log buildings and a stone fort with bastions.

The Government telegraph line was completed to Standing Rock Agency in 1879.

THE GREAT RIVAL RAILROADS

The rivalry between the Milwaukee and Northwestern Railroad companies, in the southern portion of the territory was spirited, each seeking to gain control of the territory south of the line running west from the northern boundary of Minnehaha County. The Northwestern interests had been in entire control at Sioux City for over ten years. It was first in the Southern Dakota field including Sioux Falls, having at an early day gained virtual control of the Dakota Southern, and of the Sioux City and Pembina, both centering at Sioux City. The Dakota Southern was early planned to extend from Yankton up the James River Valley for an indefinite distance, probably to a connection with the Northern Pacific at Jamestown, and as indubitable evidence of this the articles of incorporation filed by the officers of the Northwestern with the secretary of the territory, elsewhere given in the railroad reports of 1871, will be found interesting. That project called the Dakota Central, was a Northwestern enterprise and headed by the president of that company.

The Milwaukee Company constructed its main line across to Mitchell, in 1879, and its branch from Marion Junction to Running Water; and also gained control of the Southern Minnesota and built from Flandreau south to Sioux Falls. It also surveyed a line from Rock Rapids, Iowa, to Yankton, crossing the Big Sioux near Eden, and graded a large portion of this line. This last move of the Milwaukee appears to have satisfied the Northwestern people that it was not a match for its energetic and enterprising antagonist, for it was soon followed by a sale of the Dakota Southern and Sioux City and Pembina, largely owned by Mr. Blair, to the Milwaukee Company. This gave the latter company the entire field, and rendered the Yankton and Rock Rapids line unnecessary—a great loss, however, to Yankton.

The articles of incorporation of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company filed in the office of the secretary of the territory as required by law, May 21, 1879, designated their route through the Territory of Dakota, as follows:

From the Big Sioux River on the eastern boundary of the territory, in a westerly direction to the Missouri River, a distance of about two hundred miles, passing through or into the counties of Lincoln, Turner, McCook, Hutchinson, Hanson, Davison, Aurora, Brule, Buffalo, Hand, Hyde, Hughes, and Sully, with a branch from some point in Lincoln County, through Turner, Clay, and Yankton counties, to Yankton, on the Missouri River, a distance of sixty miles.

A later resolution of the Milwaukee Company, filed with the secretary, stated that they would build from a point on their line at or near Maxwell City, Hutchinson County, to Yankton; this line was said to be intended to head off the extension of the Dakota Southern from Yankton up the James River. Another line described in their resolution, was a branch from Finlay, Turner County, through Turner, Hutchinson and Bon Homme counties to the Missouri River. This was the proposed Running Water branch. Still another branch was from a point on their main line in Lincoln County, in a northerly direction to Sioux Falls and Flandreau. The Milwaukee designed to control the transportation business of Southern Dakota Territory.

The railways were the pioneers in 1870, and as a rule located the stations along their lines to suit their own convenience. In the case of the Chicago and Northwestern from Tracy west; the first station in Brookings County, after crossing into the territory from Minnesota, was named Verdi, in range 46; next Aurora, range, 49; Brookings, range, 50; Volga, range, 51; Nordland, range, 53; DeSmet, range, 56; Iroquois, range, 58; Cavour, range, 60; Huron, ranges, 61 and 62. There were a number of settlers in the country bordering the railroad at the time, and the organization of the County of Kingsbury had been delayed waiting the coming of the iron horse and the location of the towns. The first petition for organization was followed by a remonstrance asking for delay until the stations along the line were located.

CHAPTER LXXXII

DEATH OF GOVERNOR HOWARD—N. G. ORDWAY APPOINTED

1880

GOVERNOR HOWARD'S ILLNESS AND DEATH—SECRETARY HAND URGED AS HIS SUCCESSOR—MEMORIAL SERVICES IN HONOR OF THE DEAD EXECUTIVE—PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION YEAR—TERRITORIAL CONVENTION AT FARGO—THE CENSUS OF 1880—POPULATION, 134,770—NEHEMIAH G. ORDWAY OF NEW HAMPSHIRE APPOINTED GOVERNOR—A REMARKABLE MAN—HIS JOURNEY THROUGH DAKOTA, INCLUDING THE BLACK HILLS—DAKOTA AND THE TARIFF.

GOVERNOR HOWARD'S LAST ILLNESS

A few weeks after reaching Yankton from his Black Hills trip, Governor Howard was taken ill and was confined to his bed for a number of weeks with neuralgia, but gradually recovered, and early in February, 1880, in company with his wife and a local physician, Doctor McGlumphy, went to his former home at Detroit, Mich. He stood the trip well, and aside from the weakness induced by his prolonged illness, was in fair health. The governor had not been in vigorous health for years, and though not an invalid, he was subject to spells of physical depression, and was obliged to exercise care in his daily routine at all times. About the 10th of March he wrote to Rev. Joseph Ward, of Yankton, that he had nearly recovered his accustomed health and strength; expressed his gratification for the sympathy and well wishes of the people of the territory, and hoped soon to be with them again. A day or two later, in company with Mrs. Howard, he went to Washington. About the 25th of March, word was received by a friend in Yankton, that after reaching Washington, he was prostrated by a second attack of the malady which kept him in bed so many weeks during the winter before he left Dakota. This was followed about a fortnight later, by a dispatch which became public, that the governor was at the National Hotel, Washington, dangerously ill. The dispatch stated that as he was nearly sixty years old, he was said to be gradually breaking down, and "having many old friends and acquaintances here, I hear much sympathy expressed for him."

The governor died on the morning of April 10, at 8 o'clock. A letter from Hon. Granville G. Bennett, Dakota's congressional delegate, gives the incidents of the governor's death:

Washington, D. C., April 10, 1880.

Governor Howard passed away peacefully at 8 o'clock this forenoon. Funeral services will be held this evening at 6 o'clock, at the National Hotel, and his family will leave with his body tomorrow morning for his old home in Michigan.

The news of his death, though not altogether unexpected, will be received with profound sorrow in every part of our territory. The people had learned to love and honor him, in a way that falls to the lot of but few men to win popular affection in so short a time. He came among us an entire stranger personally, although we knew something of his past life and record. He brought to the administration of our territorial affairs the ripe judgment and experience of age, the wisdom born of experience, and the most unselfish devotion to our highest and best interests. His ambition in his decline of life was to help lay the foundation of our young state, and leave his impress on our institutions and laws, as a sort of crowning work to a life that had been full of usefulness and honors. But he has been cut down in the midst of a labor into which he had entered with all his heart; but may we not hope that the influence of his life of nobleness and Christian virtue, exemplified even for so brief a period among us, may be felt for long years to come.

His last thoughts expressed to me were for Dakota. At a late hour last evening he called me to his bedside, and intimated his conviction that the end was near, and said he had a longing desire to get well and return to Dakota to assist in carrying out some plans and measures which he had helped inaugurate. "But," he added, "if the Lord wills otherwise, it is all for the best. His judgments are true and righteous altogether." He also said he had felt much solicitude as to his successor. He has suffered a great deal, not acute pain, but that distress that comes of weakness and a constant struggle for breath. His malady was neuralgia. And as there was no longer any possible hope of recovery, it is a relief to know that he has found rest.

Heretofore, when I have left him in the evening, he would say, "call again," but last evening he took my hand and said in a very slow, solemn tone, "goodbye." His death has touched me as no event has done for years, and I feel that I have lost a friend whose friendship was priceless.

Mrs. Alpheus G. Fuller, of Yankton, received a letter from the wife of Congressman Conger, giving further particulars, as follows:

William A. Howard, governor of Dakota, only came here to die. He was able to walk about the house for a week or two after his arrival, but the month of March was trying to a delicate person, the weather being colder and stormier than we had had all winter. He never went out of the house until carried out by the pallbearers, after his last attack of neuralgia. He took a little cold in some way, and perhaps ate food not suitable for his delicate and feeble condition. At all events, he came down, down continually, until death released him at 9 o'clock yesterday morning. He had the best of medical attendance, kindest care, and attention by different ones at the hotel and out of it. Judge and Mrs. Bennett (your delegate) were ready and willing to do all they could for him, and they did—watching, etc., until the end came. Mrs. Birchard, sister-in-law, cooked everything he ate, and brought it here, and she knew just what he liked; and vied with one another to make him as comfortable as possible. But he was a brave, good man, not afraid to die, had no preparation to make, and fell asleep peacefully and without a struggle or a moan. He has gone to his rest regretted by all. It seems when a good man dies that we should never see his like again. Are you not glad that such a man was governor and lived among you? That you knew him just as he was? How much interest he felt in the prosperity of Dakota. He spoke of it with heartfelt pride and affection, saying, "no better people lived than were there." His funeral here was large, considering no notice was given. The President, Mrs. Hayes, members of the cabinet, members of Congress and their wives and citizens attended. The large parlors were filled with his friends. Doctor Sunderland and Doctor Chester officiated. Mrs. Hayes sent one of the most beautiful wreaths for his casket, and vases of flowers, here and there, sent by others, manifested their love for him in every way they could. The Michigan delegation were his bearers, together with Mr. Bennett, and attended him to the depot last evening at 7 o'clock. The family—Mrs. Howard, two daughters and two sons—left at 8 o'clock this morning. Mr. Conger and I were with them to the depot, and she took with her the colored man who nursed him so carefully. He will be a help to them all, for they are all tired out with grief, watching and journeying. The daughters did not get here until an hour after their father died.

Mrs. Howard wished me to write to you and tell you all about it, as she should not be able to, and give you her love, and I also wished to write so that you and their friends in Dakota might know some particulars of his last illness. Mr. Conger requests me to ask you to show this to ex-Governor Edmunds, who was a Michigan man and an old friend of Governor Howard. Remember me to your husband, and accept my best wishes for all your family, and believe me lovingly your friend,

STELLA B. CONGER.

Gov. William A. Howard was born in the State of Vermont, in the year, 1812, and was sixty-eight years of age when death overtook him. His life had been one of busy experiences. He was a graduate of Middlebury College, in the class of which John G. Saxe was a member, and was an intimate friend of that gentleman. After leaving college Governor Howard began studying with the design of entering the ministry in the Presbyterian faith, but subsequently abandoned this intention and took up the study of law, which he completed and became a prominent representative of his profession.

About 1840 he removed to Detroit, Mich., which was his place of residence up to the time of his appointment as governor of Dakota. In 1856 he was chosen a representative in Congress from the Detroit District, and was the first republican elected to that body from Michigan. He served with distinguished ability through three terms, retiring in 1862 with the highest honors a grateful constituency could bestow. During the period of his congressional service he was placed in positions of the first importance. An uncompromising abolitionist from the beginning, his work lay in the direction of the freedom of an enslaved race, and he entered heartily and courageously upon it, and turned not aside from the plain path of duty. He was a prominent element in the Kansas troubles, and by his wisdom and sagacity did much to help the territory and the new state. The outbreak of the Civil war found the governor among the leading men in Congress, and he devoted himself assiduously to the task of combatting the rebellion. In this capacity his course became a part of the history of our country.

At the close of his third congressional term he retired from Congress, and was made postmaster of Detroit, a position which he held for several years. He was a delegate from Michigan to the republican convention of 1876, and led the movement which gave the state to Rutherford B. Hayes. On the 15th of March, 1878, Mr. Howard was commissioned governor of Dakota, and on the 12th of the following April, he took the oath of office and entered upon his duties, and took up his residence at Yankton the capital. During the winter of 1879 he was prostrated with a violent attack of neuralgia of the chest, and for a couple of weeks was in a serious condition. Recovering, he sought in the East and South the climatic influences which he hoped would restore him to complete health. At the national capital he was again prostrated by the old ailment, and a complication of lung troubles ensued, which ended his useful and honorable life.

When the intelligence of the death of the governor was received at Yankton, the capital, flags on all the public buildings were hoisted to half mast, and the executive offices were draped with crepe. The following proceedings took place in the District Court, which was then in session, on the afternoon of the 10th:

And now, April 10, 1880, the following announcement and motion were presented to the court by Judge West, to-wit:

May it please the Court: It has become my painful duty to announce the death, at the National Hotel, in Washington City, at 8 o'clock this morning, of his excellency, William A. Howard, the governor of this territory.

In view of the high character and eminent public services of the deceased, which have become a part of the history of our country, I would move that this court, out of respect for his memory, do now adjourn.

And the said motion being supported by Messrs. Shannon, Davis, and French, members of the bar, the Court, after a few remarks laudatory of the high character of the deceased, ordered an adjournment.

A public meeting of the citizens of the capital city and county was held the same evening at the courthouse, to take action regarding the representation of Dakota at the funeral. Ex-Governor Edmunds presided and Dr. S. S. Turner was made secretary.

Upon taking the chair, Governor Edmunds briefly alluded to the loss which the sad event had brought upon Dakota, and to the anguish he felt at the death of one who for thirty-five years had been one of his best and dearest friends.

Judge West explained more fully the object of the gathering, after which Secretary and Acting Governor Hand moved that the delegate in Congress, Hon. G. G. Bennett, be requested to attend the funeral of Governor Howard, as the representative of the territory, and that the chair appoint a committee of five citizens to co-operate with him in that capacity. On motion of Doctor Turner, Governor Edmunds was made a member of said committee. After appropriate remarks by ex-Governor Pennington, General Hendershott, J. R. Gamble, G. W. Kingsbury, and H. E. Dewey, the original motion was modified so as to appoint Rev. Joseph Ward, J. R. Sanborn, George W. Kingsbury and W. H. McVay, additional members of the committee, and the chair be empowered to fill any vacancies in the committee should any of those appointed be unable to attend.

and that he also have power to enlarge the committee if deemed advisable. On motion of Governor Pennington a committee of five was authorized to be appointed by the chair, said committee to draft resolutions expressive of the feelings of the community at the death of Governor Howard, and to report at a future meeting of our citizens, on which occasion all could have the opportunity of presenting such remarks or eulogies as might be desired. The chair asked and was granted permission to announce the names of the Committee on Resolutions later, after which the meeting adjourned.

Memorial services were held at the Congregational Church on Sunday afternoon (the following day.) About the pulpit were numerous floral decorations, behind which were the pastors of the city churches. Governor Howard's pew, in the body of the edifice, was draped, and was the only vacant seat in the house. Pews had been reserved for the federal, civil and military, and territorial officials, and at the opening of the formal services the official party marched in and down the aisles and took their allotted places. The service was opened with appropriate music, followed by Rev. J. W. Trimble, of Christ Church, who read the fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians. Rev. Stewart Sheldon followed with prayer.

Rev. Joseph Ward, pastor of the Congregational Church, delivered an address eulogistic of the deceased. He was the intimate personal friend of Governor Howard, and spoke both as pastor and friend. His address was replete with incidents showing the benign and lofty Christian character of the governor. At times the speaker was overcome by his feelings and was compelled to stop and recover his composure. At the conclusion of his address Mr. Ward resumed his seat, bowed his head, and wept as only one could weep who felt the poignancy of the grief he had alluded to in his sermon.

Rev. Mr. Brownson, of the Baptist Church, followed with prayer, and the solemn benediction was pronounced by the Rev. Mr. Trimble.

The committee selected by the chairman of the meeting to attend the funeral at Detroit was composed of Delegate G. G. Bennett, Rev. Joseph Ward, Gen. Henry Espersen, H. E. Dewey, and L. M. Purdy, territorial auditor. This committee was to have started Monday for Detroit, but a telegraphic advice came stating that the funeral would be held at half past 2 o'clock Tuesday afternoon, which would not give the committee time to reach there, and Judge Bennett was notified and requested to represent the territory.

The grand jury for the Second District of the Federal Court, was in session at this time, and joined in a testimonial of grief and regard, by passing appropriate resolutions, as follows:

Whereas, We, the grand jurors, have just learned with deep sorrow of the death of the Hon. William A. Howard, governor of Dakota Territory, therefore,

Resolved, That in him we recognized a man of high Christian character, great wisdom and true statesmanship.

Resolved, That we deeply deplore his loss as a citizen of our country but more especially as the chief executive of our territory, to which office he brought the ripe experience of a life fruitful in noble work to aid us in laying the true foundations of a great commonwealth.

Resolved, That we hereby tender our sympathy to the widow and family of the deceased; that a copy of these resolutions be presented to the court and asked to be spread upon the records; that a copy of the same be furnished the widow and family by the secretary of the grand jury, and that a copy be furnished the press for publication.

EDWARD P. WILCOX, Foreman.

ROBERT COX, Secretary.

April 10, 1880.

The mayor of the capital city issued a proclamation as follows:

The funeral of William A. Howard, late governor of Dakota Territory, will take place at Detroit, Mich., at 2 o'clock tomorrow, and as a fitting mark of respect for our late executive, it is hereby recommended that all places of business in the City of Yankton be closed between the hours of 2 o'clock and 4 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Yankton, April 12, 1880

F. M. ZIEBACH, Mayor.

The Yankton Turnverein, a society of Germans, held a memorial meeting and adopted resolutions, which are herewith reproduced:

Whereas, We, the members of the Turnverein, have learned with profound sorrow of the sudden and unexpected demise of our much esteemed governor, Hon. William A. Howard; and

Whereas, We, the members of the Yankton Turnverein, regard in particular this sudden departure of our executive officer from his exalted sphere of usefulness which he extended to any creed, guided only by his admired philanthropic principles and his high Christian character, admitted alike among all and any religious denomination, as well as among his political adherents and adversaries; and

Whereas, We, the members of the Yankton Turnverein, are now assembled in a body at the solemn hour in which the remains of our common benefactor are taken to their last resting place; therefore

Resolved, That through his death the citizens of Yankton in particular and Dakota have lost a wise counsellor, a true friend and a common benefactor, and the country in general has been bereft of one of Nature's nobility, of one of its patriots and of one of its most noble champions of liberty and truth.

Resolved, That we hereby tender our most heartfelt sympathy to the sorrowful widow and family of the deceased; that a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the records of our society; that a copy of the same be forwarded to the bereaved widow and family by the secretary of our Turnverein, and likewise a copy to the daily press and Dakotian of this city for publication.

CHR. HAMEISTER, Secretary.

CONRAD LANGE, President.
Yankton, D. T., April 13, 1880.

The committee appointed by Governor Edmunds, chairman of the citizens' meeting, prepared and gave out the following resolutions:

Whereas, It has pleased the all-wise Ruler of the Universe, in whose hands are the issues of life and death, to remove from the walks of men the Hon. William A. Howard, governor of this territory, who died in the City of Washington, on Saturday, the 10th instant; and

Whereas, During the short two years that Governor Howard resided amongst us and administered the affairs and discharged the duties of the chief executive of this territory, by his fervent patriotism, his sterling integrity, eminent ability, devotion to principle, and above all, by his exalted moral virtues and exemplary Christian walk and conversation, he had endeared himself to all classes and conditions of people of the territory without regard to party, sect, creed or condition; this sad intelligence, though not entirely unexpected, knowing as we did how long and patiently he had resisted the ravages of disease, comes upon us with peculiar force and crushing weight; therefore,

Resolved, That while we bow submissively to the Omnipotent will, we, in common with the citizens of Dakota, deplore the death of Governor Howard as a public calamity, for we can scarcely hope for a successor who will prove so eminently fitted for the responsible public duties the office involves, or for one who will be so universally acceptable to our people. In his death we feel that we have lost a wise ruler and a good citizen.

Resolved, That for ourselves and in the name of the citizens of Dakota, we tender to the patient, loving Christian wife, and to the bereaved children and other relatives and friends, our heartfelt sympathy and condolence in this their hour of great affliction, and knowing that words are as but ashes to hearts stricken as theirs are, we commend them to that God in whom the loving husband and kind father trusted for that consolation which human sympathy is powerless to give.

Resolved, That the secretary of the meeting be requested to prepare and forward copies of these resolutions, together with the proceedings of the meeting, to his excellency, the President of the United States, to the honorable secretary of the interior, and to the family of the deceased, and that Acting Governor Hand be requested to have the same spread upon the executive record in his office, and that the press of the territory be requested to publish the same.

John L. Pennington, A. J. Faulk, S. L. Spink, George H. Hand, Bartlett Tripp, Committee.

CONTEST FOR THE VACANT OFFICE

Hon. George H. Hand, who had been for a number of years secretary and acting governor of the territory, was the choice of a large majority of the people of the territory, for the succession. He was thoroughly familiar with the duties, having acted in the capacity of the executive during weeks and months at a time, and there had never been unfriendly criticism, of any moment, regarding his official action, while his ability to discharge the important functions of the position, was not questioned. But even while the sad rites of the funeral of the late governor were in progress, the scramble for his mantle began at Washington, and a telegram dated the 12th of April informed the people that:

There is quite a contest over the appointment of governor for the Territory of Dakota, the office made vacant by the death of William A. Howard. Senator Cameron, of Wisconsin, went to the President this morning and recommended the appointment of ex-Congressman Rusk. Senator Baldwin and others of the Michigan delegation recommended Henry M. Lord, of Detroit, and New Hampshire people asked the appointment of ex-Sergeant-at-Arms Ordway. The President stated to everybody that the people of the territory had asked delay until they could be heard from.

HOWARD'S WILL

The will of Mr. Howard was filed for probate at Grand Rapids early in May, following his death. It was a lengthy document, but the bequests alone did not take up the entire document. To his surviving wife he gave the family residence, grounds and furniture, in Grand Rapids, and 100 shares in Second National Bank stock, Detroit. To his daughter, Delia O'Brien, $12,000 cash, and a $4,000 lot in Grand Rapids, in addition to $9,000 already given her to buy a homestead. To his son, James B. Howard, a $4,000 farm in Farmington, Oakland County, a $4,000 mortgage on a lot corner of State and Rowland streets, Detroit, 100 shares of the American National Bank stock, Detroit, with surplus and accumulations, amounting to $14,000, and also $32,000 in cash. To his son William, a certain $2,000 promissory note, a $2,000 mortgage, and $2,500 worth of stock in the Detroit Fire and Marine Insurance Company, together with $6,500 worth of stock in the First National Bank of Grand Rapids, already given. To various national Presbyterian boards of home and foreign missions, church erection, publication, education, disabled ministers, etc., the interest on various sums amounting to $23,000; also $7,000 each to the American Tract and American Bible Societies, also $15,000 in Grand Rapids City bonds and Detroit mortgages, and cash amounting to $10,000, to William S. Howard and Charles A. Kent, as trustee for his daughter, Kate H. Riddle, her heirs, etc., and all the residue of the estate, of every description, to the widow. Messrs. Howard and Kent were appointed executors.

Governor Howard's death was a great loss to Dakota. He was well qualified for public station; honest and capable. His ambition was no higher than to do his duty well and opportunely; he was an exceptionally able man; practical in his views and recommendations and efforts, in all public matters. He was happily suited with the position of governor of Dakota. He enjoyed the genuine prosperity of the territory which prevailed in every quarter during his administration. He only desired to aid it to the best of his ability. He was identified with the entire territory, and every part of it equally; and was not allied with any faction, or interest, or section—and had no unfriendliness for any human being. He was a Christian statesman, and being a statesman, he looked forward to the rapid development of Dakota and studied how best to promote its interest and the welfare of its people. His mind was on this and kindred problems. He had worldly wealth enough to satisfy him, and was not seeking an opportunity to make more money. He had an enviable national reputation; was one of the foremost men in the national republican party and had been from the founding of that organization. His influence at the national capital for any project that he would be willing to recommend for the advancement of Dakota, would have gone far in securing it. He was personally esteemed and trusted by the President and the members of his cabinet, and by the most influential members of Congress.

GEORGE H. HAND PROPOSED FOR GOVERNOR

The public sentiment in favor of Hon. George H. Hand, the secretary of Dakota, for the vacant position of governor, caused by the death of Governor

Howard, was quite pronounced throughout the territory. He was probably the best known and more generally acquainted with the people of all sections than any other citizen of the territory, having been secretary for a number of years, which brought him into personal and official contact with a great majority of the people. He was also an early settler and had been prominently connected with all the meritorious enterprises of the people, and felt withal that there was no land superior to Dakota land—enthusiastic regarding the future of the territory. He was in addition a veteran of the Civil war, and Dakota had not yet been given a governor from the ranks of the nation's defenders when its existence as a united country was imperiled. The President had also encouraged the belief that he had in mind the selection of Howard's successor from the citizens of the territory, having delayed action in the matter until the territory could be heard from. Regarding the sentiment in the territory, it was fairly expressed by almost the unanimous voice of the press, north and south and east and west, and the liberty is taken here to give a couple of excerpts from papers in different sections of the territory.

From the Pembina Pioneer, on the northern boundary:

President Hayes has at last struck the keynote as to the proper plan for the appointment of territorial officers. Scarcely had the sad news been announced of the death of Governor Howard than the President was besieged with applicants for the position. Mr. Hayes, however, very considerably and justly waved them off and refused to entertain their applications until the people of our territory could be heard from. This reflects much credit upon President Hayes, and is the true and only just rule to be adopted. With this view of the case we believe that the Hon. George H. Hand, our very efficient secretary of the territory and at present acting governor, will be unanimously recommended by the people for the vacant position. He is an old resident of the territory, and well acquainted with the wants and requirements of the people, and will do honor to the position. A rousing petition from Pembina has been forwarded to Mr. Hayes asking the appointment of Mr. Hand.

Lead City Enterprise:

There will, in all probability, be quite a pull made by favored senators to have an outsider sent out to Dakota to rule us as governor. It is patent to all our people that it is wrong to be constantly represented by men who are not of us, and consequently have other interests to look after different from our own. The Times wisely says, "We have within our borders plenty of timber for as good an executive as was ever imported." We are democratic, but would ask why would not the present acting governor be a good executive? Hon. George H. Hand is a man whose interests are identified with Dakota, and he knows and appreciates our wants and needs better, by far, than any of the imported ex-senators or private secretaries, cast out of service in their own state.

REPUBLICAN TERRITORIAL CONVENTION AT FARGO

A Republican Territorial Convention was held at Fargo on the 19th of May, 1880, for the purpose of electing two delegates and two alternates to represent the territory at the Republican National Convention which was held at Chicago on the 2d of the following June.

The territorial convention was to be composed of 138 delegates under the call, and there were 136 represented either in person or by proxy. Ninety-five were present in person.

The temporary organization was effected by electing Hon. Alex. McHench, of Fargo, chairman, and H. F. Miller, of Fargo, and Frank M. Allen, of Deadwood, as secretaries. After the preliminary business was disposed of, a permanent organization was made, Hon. George H. Walsh being elected permanent chairman, and W. H. McVay, of Yankton, and Frank M. Allen, of Deadwood, secretaries.

Early in the proceedings the Grand Forks delegation moved an adjournment before any vote was had for the election of the delegates, and when the motion was defeated, the delegation from that county, save the chairman, withdrew, but returned later. They had been disappointed because the convention refused to endorse a Bismarck man for member of the national committee. Newton Edmunds, of Yankton, was recommended for national committeeman.

A committee of five, consisting of Messrs. Carter, Warner, S. G. Roberts, George P. Flannery and Woodruff, was appointed on credentials. After a recess of half an hour the committee submitted the following report:

Mr. Chairman—Your Committee on Credentials find the following named delegates entitled to seats in this convention: Armstrong County, 1, A. W. Howard, proxy; Barnes County, 2, S. B. Coe, A. H. Gray; Brookings County, 2, G. W. Hopp, T. H. Maguire; Clay County, 6, J. W. Carter, with proxies; Custer County, 1, Porter Warner, by proxy for D. S. Burke; Codington County, 2, W. S. Glass, L. D. F. Poore; Deuel County, 2, F. J. Bowman, with proxy; Grant County, 2, J. J. Skuse, with proxy; Hanson County, 1, J. L. Turner, by proxy; Kingsbury County, 1, R. F. Pettigrew, by proxy; Lake County, 3; Minnehaha County, 9, R. F. Pettigrew, A. M. Flagg, J. R. Jackson, E. G. Kimberley, with instructions to cast the full vote; Moody County, 5, H. M. Williamson, L. Gray, A. J. Hopkins, F. W. Pettigrew, F. M. Spear; Pembina County, 3, Judson LaMoure, C. J. Brown, W. H. Moorhead; Richland County, 2, Judge Hazlehurst, with proxy; Turner County, 4, A. M. Flagg, with proxies; Union County, 8, L. P. McClarren, Alex Hughes, O. Gunderson, W. H. H. Fate, L. Emery, M. Y. Lehn, I. Ellis, J. J. Merrill; Burleigh County, 3, G. P. Flannery, L. N. Griffin, Harry Robinson; Bon Homme County, 5, J. L. Turner, with proxies; Brule County, 1, J. L. Turner, proxy; Cass County, 7, H. F. Miller, J. S. Campbell, I. W. Fisher, A. M. Green, N. Pinkham, S. G. Roberts, by proxy, S. S. Tyler; Charles Mix County, 1, J. L. Turner, by proxy; Davidson County, 1, J. L. Turner, by proxy; Grand Forks County, 5, W. J. Anderson, W. G. Woodruff, D. T. Tallant, D. McDonald, G. H. Walsh; Hutchinson County, 3, not represented; Hamlin County, 1, not represented; Lincoln County, 7, T. J. Thornstad, R. Z. Bennett, J. W. Carter, E. S. Ingalls, W. H. Ball, A. H. Kinsley, Allebone; Lawrence County, 25, L. W. Valentine, H. O'Connor, J. Bartholomew, W. H. Wood, W. P. Tyler, Seth Bullock, F. M. Allen, E. P. Fowler, C. T. Marshall, J. M. Lowthan, D. W. Greene, Hugh McKenna, J. A. Schiller, C. D. Porter, M. C. Thum, H. H. Mund, L. R. Graves, J. Lawrence, J. Wolzmut, H. C. Ash, R. E. Grimshaw, John Johnson, P. O. Grady, W. C. Barton, A. R. Z. Dawson; McCook County, 2, F. F. Emerson, by proxy; R. F. Pettigrew, by proxy; Morton County, 2, C. A. Lounsberry, by proxy, S. W. Raymond, by proxy; Pennington County, 4, Porter Warner, by four proxies; Stutsman County, 1, Major Lyons; Traill County, 5, J. R. Hague, J. W. Warley, Ingwerson Larson, Iver Larson, Knud Nomland; Yankton County, 11, W. H. H. Beadle, Wm. McVay, A. L. VanOsdel, J. R. Gamble, G. A. Wetter, H. B. Wynn, M. A. Baker, E. G. Smith, G. W. Kingsbury, E. T. White, A. W. Howard. The report was adopted. Total number of delegates present, 131.

The Committee on Permanent Organization reported recommending G. H. Walsh, for president, and W. H. McVay and F. M. Allen, as secretaries. The report was adopted.

Mr. Jackson moved that the delegates be instructed to urge the name of J. W. Raymond, of Bismarck, as member of the national committee.

Mr. Beadle, of Yankton, moved to substitute the name of Governor Edmunds for that of Mr. Raymond, and the roll being called, resulted for Edmunds, 64, and for Raymond, 57. This was a sort of test vote between the north and the south. At this point the Grand Forks delegates except the president, Mr. Walsh, withdrew, said to have been offended because Raymond was not recommended.

U. S. Grant and Jas. G. Blaine were the two candidates for the presidential nomination and it was understood that Dakota favored Grant, but the Blaine faction disputed this. However, in electing delegates, the convention selected Chas. T. McCoy, of Bon Homme County, and Porter Warner, of Lawrence County. For alternates, Frank M. Veitz, of Grand Forks, and Alexander Hughes, of Union, were selected. McCoy was an out-and-out Grant man; Warner was not so pronounced, but was counted for Grant. Hughes was friendly to Blaine. The convention did not instruct the delegation. The sentiment of the convention favored the renomination of Delegate Bennett for Congress. The convention was the largest representative body that had assembled in the territory for any purpose up to that date.

James A. Garfield, of Ohio, and Chester A. Arthur, of New York, were the republican candidates for President and vice president of the United States in 1880.

The democratic candidates for the same offices were Gen. Winfield Scott Hancock, of New York, and William H. English, of Indiana.

THE DECENNIAL CENSUS

The decennial census of the United States and territories was taken in 1880. A presidential election occurred the same year, and also the general election in Dakota. Railroad building was active in the territory, the Milwaukee and Northwestern both building to points on the Missouri River. Thousands of new people came in and made settlements throughout both the northern and southern sections of the territory. The census of 1870 had revealed a population of less than fifteen thousand. The census of 1880 gave the territory a white population of 134,770, a gain substantially of one hundred and twenty thousand. Since 1870 the Black Hills had been added to the area of lawful settlement, and returned a population of 16,417. The table herewith will be of interest, as it gives the population by counties, and shows that north of the forty-sixth parallel of latitude there were 36,780 people; and south of that proposed boundary there were 83,573. The following table gives the official returns:

The United States census taken in May, 1880, gave to the several counties and principal cities and towns of the territory population stated in the following table:

N. G. ORDWAY, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE, APPOINTED GOVERNOR

A most remarkable man was finally sent to Dakota as governor in 1880, to succeed Governor Howard. This was the most important office connected with the territorial government, and with the material interests of the territory generally, and 1880 was the most critical time in the career of the territory—a time when integrity was demanded of everyone in authority and in none more than that of the governor.

No dereliction of the officials could at that time halt the great wave of immigration that was flowing Dakotaward from the East and crossing its 400 miles of eastern boundary at scores of places; nor could it have stayed the resistless march of railway builders who were linking the territory together from north to south—and from south to north and from east to west. There was no precedent for this unremitting activity in the settlement of other portions of the United States.

Nehemiah G. Ordway, of New Hampshire, was appointed by President Hayes as governor of Dakota to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Governor Howard, in May, 1880. He was a native of Warner, Merrimack County, N. H., and was fifty-one years old.

Mr. Ordway had led a very active business and political life, engaging when quite young in mercantile pursuits, and had since been connected with business enterprises, serving for a number of years as president of the Kearsage National and Kearsage Savings banks in his native town. In 1855 he was elected sergeant-at-arms of the New Hampshire Legislature, and afterwards served as clerk. In 1857 he was appointed high sheriff of Merrimack County for five years, which position he resigned in 1861 to take the appointment of general mail superintendent for the New England States. In 1862 he was commissioned as colonel by the governor of New Hampshire, and in 1863 was elected sergeant-at-arms of the House of Representatives for the Thirty-eighth Congress, which office he filled for the succeeding twelve years. It does not appear that he was given any command or active service while holding his commission as colonel. He was not re-elected at the convening of the Forty-fourth Congress and returned to New Hampshire, and was elected from Merrimack County to the lower house of the State Legislature in 1875, and re-elected in 1876 and 1877, and also later served in the constitutional convention in the state and aided materially in improving the tax laws of the commonwealth. In 1878 he was elected to the State Senate for two years and was a member of that body when appointed governor of Dakota. From his extensive acquaintance at Washington and his experience, it was expected he would be able to render valuable assistance in promoting the political affairs of Dakota Territory, which at that time was taking the preliminary steps to enter the Union as two states.

When Governor Ordway was appointed, the people of Dakota were much gratified to read these lines concerning him which appeared in a New Hampshire paper, the Concord Daily Monitor, while the confirmation was pending in the Senate:

The Senate committee has reported favorably on the confirmation of Col. N. G. Ordway, to be governor of the Territory of Dakota. This is equivalent to his confirmation, which will be formally effected next Tuesday (June 1). Geographically, Dakota is larger than New York, Pennsylvania and New England combined, containing over one hundred and fifty-two square miles. Next to Texas it is the largest domain in the Union. Its present population is about one hundred and fifty thousand, but is rapidly filling up with settlers, being a fine wheat-growing region. Nearly four million bushels of wheat were grown there last year. That Colonel Ordway will make an efficient and popular governor is the opinion of all who know him here. He is sagacious, courageous and enterprising, genial and kind-hearted, but firm as his native granite hills in the maintenance of his convictions of duty, both private and public. Emphatically a self-made man, he has overcome obstacles such as few men are called upon to encounter, and in every position he has been called upon to fill has proved his fitness even to the satisfaction of his political opponents. Fertile of resource, energetic almost to a fault and untiring in his devotion to the right, "as God gives him to see the right," we predict for him a successful career in Dakota, and wish him a hearty godspeed.

The ceremony of inducting Nehemiah G. Ordway into the executive office of the territory took place at Yankton, the capital, on the 23d of June, 1880; and was similar to the formalities observed at the installation of Governor Howard in 1878. Secretary Geo. H. Hand, who had been acting governor for a number of months, opened the proceedings by reading the commission of Mr. Ordway, signed by President Hayes and attested by Carl Schurz, secretary of the interior, and dated May 26, 1880, followed by the secretary with a brief address, saying:

Governor Ordway: In behalf of the people of Dakota Territory, I extend to you a cordial welcome. In their behalf I express the hope that all mutual relations may be pleasant and profitable; that as you become acquainted with them you will discover within them an earnest desire to build for a prosperous future, and that, as a culmination of your territorial administration, you may hand over to your successor two full-fledged states.

Hon. Peter C. Shannon, chief justice of the territory, then advanced to the center of the assembled citizens and officials, and requesting the newly appointed governor to hold up his right hand, the following so-called iron-clad oath of office was then administered with due solemnity:

I, Nehemiah G. Ordway, do solemnly swear that I have never borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought, nor accepted, nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever, under any authority or pretended authority, in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power or constitution within the United States hostile or inimical thereto. And I do further swear that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies foreign and domestic; and that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

Governor Ordway then spoke as follows:

Secretary Hand and Citizens of Dakota: I thank you for your kind words on this occasion. Especially do I thank you who have so long acted as secretary of the territory, and to you I am under deep obligations. I come to Dakota in pursuance of a policy long held to be good—a policy which sends men from the different sections of the Union to the unorganized portions of the West. Sometimes this policy is not acceptable to the people; but in this instance I assure you it is my purpose and aim to labor for the best interests of all within the boundaries of this great territory. This position was tendered me by the unanimous agreement of the President and his cabinet, reported favorably by the unanimous vote of the Senate committee, and unanimously confirmed by the Senate itself. I feel that I owe obligations to all the people, and those obligations I shall endeavor to fulfill. I shall endeavor to be a good student of your ways and your needs, and to draw information from every source, which it will be my pleasure to use to advance the interests of this commonwealth.

Having learned these things, I shall employ my best efforts in cooperation with all good citizens in carrying out the interests of the Territory of Dakota.

In conversing with the assembled party, the new governor said that he deemed it the highest privilege to be given a place where he could help build a state; that he desired to work in perfect harmony with the people. The emoluments of the office were nothing compared with the good results which might come out of faithful service. At present he said he was like a blank sheet of paper, waiting to be filled, but was ready to learn and profit by the knowledge he would obtain. He was satisfied that Dakota had a great future, and the responsibility for its fulfillment rests with the people. It was his desire to cultivate the best side of our people, and he hoped they would cultivate his best side. There were always opportunities for disagreements and the better way to avoid dissension was to go around these opportunities.

During the summer the governor made visits to every section of the territory. Accompanied by his family he visited the Black Hills; the northern portion of the territory; the Big Sioux Valley, making addresses to the people, and becoming acquainted with them earlier in his administration than had any of his predecessors save the earliest. He also visited all the points along the Missouri River, taking passage on some of the numerous steamboats, which permitted him to stop a day or two at the most important points. His most interesting stop was at the settlement at Fort Pierre, which was at that time the liveliest town in the Northwest, being the outfitting point and the starting point for hundreds of Black Hills trains. Every citizen carried a six-shooter, moved thereto by the force of habit, and to give notice that he was ready for any emergency. The governor stated that when the steamboat upon which himself and family had taken passage to Fort Sully, reached West Pierre, "a crowd of roughs rushed on board and undertook to get possession of the supper tables in the ladies' cabin, while the passengers were at tea, and it was with considerable difficulty that this crowd was gotten off the boat. Late on the same evening, some of the freighters and peaceable citizens came on board the boat and begged me to secure them some protection, saying they were wholly without law or order. One person stated that his place had been fired into twice that night. Another stated that several horses had been stolen, but when the parties were arrested or captured no one molested them. Other serious complaints were made. At all hours of the night, while the steamer was unloading on the west side, shots could be heard all over the place."

In commenting upon this situation the governor had characterized such conduct as "disreputable," which coming to the ears of the editor of the West Spirit Signal, criticized the governor for using such a term, apprehending that coming from such an eminent official source it was calculated to injure the reputation of the place.

At this time the Northwestern Railroad Company was preparing to lay out a townsite on the east bank of the river, to be called Central City (afterwards Pierre). The County of Hughes would then be organized and the railroad company and the Black Hills freight line interests intended to join with the county officials and make it a law-abiding city.

Governor Ordway fully appreciated the value of Dakota Territory as an agricultural region. He was agreeably disappointed in this respect. He was a very energetic man, and before the end of harvest in the territory, in 1880, having traversed the settlements quite thoroughly, wherever he could make them by rail, and in those good old days every governor had a pass for himself and his family over every railroad in his realm, he had concluded that the people of the eastern states had a very imperfect not to say prejudiced opinion of Dakota, for he had about come to the conclusion that it was better adapted to diversified farming than any section of the United States that he had knowledge of; and he conceived a plan of giving the eastern people an object lesson of the soil products of his new territorial abode. He also must have known that his plan would sow the seeds of that variety of popularity which he deemed valuable for future operations. He accordingly procured a baggage car from the North Pacific Railroad people, who were glad of an opportunity to furnish it gratis for it would be used to advertise their country, and filled it with the products of the North Dakota soil contiguous to the railroad, and also a quantity from the agricultural districts of Montana—wheat, oats, barley, rye, corn, hops, potatoes, squash, and numberless minor products. These were as tastefully arranged in the car as an exhibit for a state fair and sent to Chicago, where the governor took personal charge of them. They were then taken to various parts of New England and to his native Town of Warner, where both he and the exhibit were sure to be welcomed and looked upon with surprise and admiration. The Massachusetts State Fair was being held in Boston at the time, and the car with its trophies from northwestern soil found its way there and proved a valuable attraction. The Boston Journal spoke of it as a new and striking display of the resources of the great Northwest. There was nothing in New England to compare with it. One day of the fair was given to addresses from the various governors present, and all the New England executives were there, and some Canadian notables; it was a presidential election year. Governor Ordway represented the great Northwest and made a fine address, which was referred to by the papers. Among the reports was that of the Journal, of Boston, which said:

Governor Ordway of Dakota, who is making a brief tour of New England with a car containing rich specimens of the agricultural and mineral wealth of the great Northwest, made a very interesting address upon the capabilities of the immense Territory of Dakota. He expressed his congratulations in behalf of 150,000 people inhabiting 150,000 square miles of territory, many of whom are natives of New England. The resources of this new country, he said, were little understood. In size it exceeds the combined area of New York, Pennsylvania and New England, and in fertility its soil is unsurpassed. Between seven and ten million bushels of wheat have been harvested of this year's crop from the meager settlements of the territory, and the last year's yield of the mines aggregated over seven million dollars. But the speaker would not urge emigration on the part of any who are well-suited and contented with New England life. And any who do desire a change could not do better than to settle in the new country of the Northwest. He was glad to note the continued thrift of New England, for in it he saw an aid to the growth of the West.

Governor Ordway, with his family, made a trip to the Black Hills in July, 1880, going in on the Pierre route. He reached Deadwood safely on the 21st, accompanied by a military escort from Fort Meade. A committee of Deadwood's principal men, including the mayor, accompanied with a brass band, met his excellency just outside the limits of the city, and marched in procession through the town, which was gaily and patriotically decorated with the national colors and an occasional banner swung across the avenues, bearing the legend: "How, Gov. N. G. Ordway, How," and another, "Deadwood's Welcome to Dakota's Governor." The governor's wife and son George were with him. During the evening about one thousand citizens assembled in the vicinity of the Wentworth House, where the gubernatorial party were stopping, and the governor made an address to them, predicting that they would have railway facilities within a year. He also said the Black Hills reminded him of his own rugged and mountainous New Hampshire and made him feel at home, for such regions always produced loyal, law-abiding men and women, and but for his visit he might have become homesick. He remained in the hills a few days, and visited some of the mining camps, including the Homestake, and was well taken care of. The governor made the trip by the Pierre route, camping along quite comfortably, and his family and himself enjoyed it.

During his stay in the hills he was accorded every courtesy; taken into and through the Homestake, and given opportunity to inform himself of the resources and the improvements that had been made. He was greatly interested, and in an address delivered to a large body of citizens at Central, on the 31st of July, he spoke in part, as follows:

NEHEMIAH G. ORDWAY

Seventh governor of Dakota Territory, 1880-84

My Friends: I have visited your mines and examined many of your mills. I have visited spacious chambers glistening with gold. I have watched the sturdy miner as with his candle to light his way he wielded the pick or shovel, unloosening tons and tons of ore which, falling into a car, was carried to and passed through the mill. I want to say right here that in all my experience I have not heard one word of dispute or dissatisfaction between the men and their employers, and I attribute this harmony to a belief upon the part of the employers that the laborer is worthy of his hire. (Applause.)

I have trod the marble halls of the nation's capital for twelve long years, and let me say right here that if I can believe all that is told me in connection with what I have seen, that there is more wealth in one of your many mines than has been expended in that noble building to which I have referred, and which in part belongs to every citizen. (Applause.)

The wealth of these mines is untold. Mining in this region is only in its infancy. From my examination I am satisfied that capital is as safe when invested in mills and machinery for the reduction of your so-called low grade ores, four to ten dollar ore, as it is when invested in cotton goods and staples, and I shall so assure the people in the East when I return or write them. (Applause.) The mines in the Black Hills do not rest on a fictitious basis. They have not been floated on the New York or any other market. The people throughout the country see and feel that the best management of your properties is in their interest—that the mines do not rest on a volcano that may burst at any moment.

The territory, so soon to become a state, was alluded to by the governor, but not with any definite expression of having formed an opinion on the subject. He declared that he was not in the hills in the interest of any party or clique, or for any purpose except to study the interests of the people. And he assured his hearers that he would so conduct the affairs of the territory, "that no man, however humble, can ever say that he pleaded with me for justice and was refused." (Applause.)

The governor remained in the Black Hills, making Deadwood headquarters, for a fortnight, and in the meantime held a sort of gubernatorial court, where the people called upon him to pay their respects and enjoy a brief acquaintance with the head of the territorial government, and in some cases they laid complaints before him, and stories of misconduct on the part of county and city officers, and he also received a number of petitions asking for the pardon of persons who had been sent to the penitentiary from the Black Hills for various offenses. He took his departure from the hills in the forepart of August, going out in a special stage coach at extra speed to Bismarek, where he tarried briefly and met the people in a social way, making most encouraging comment on the wealth and grandeur of Dakota, and from thence he went across to Fargo, where he made quite a sojourn, and was given a notable reception, at which he took occasion to make a brief address in which he highly eulogized Dakota, spoke enthusiastically of the fertility of its soil, especially that of Northern Dakota. During his stay he visited the famous Dalrymple farm during the wheat harvest, and was finely entertained by the proprietor, who took him over the great farm where he could see over a half hundred harvesting machines in operation. This was one of the most interesting incidents of his long journey. At this time the governor had with him, besides his wife and his son, George L., another young man who had come up from Denver and joined the party at Deadwood; his name was W. B. Tebbetts, a New Hampshire gentleman, who was in business with his son in Denver, and who together with the son became identified with Dakota during the next two years.

The governor's party left Fargo after the Dalrymple visit, and returned to Yankton by way of St. Paul, having had one of the most interesting and adventurous trips they had ever undertaken, and had been royally entertained by Dakotans throughout their entire journey. The governor had arranged for his railroad agricultural exhibit in a North Pacific car, and about the first of September left for the East with his family and Mr. Tebbetts. At Chicago he found his car of Dakota products, which were in fine condition and attractively displayed, and took charge of it. His son George and Mr. Tebbetts, who were partners in business in Denver, separated from the governor at Chicago and returned home. The governor and family, with his car of cereal and vegetable treasures, made his way to New England.

Governor Ordway was an energetic man, and apparently would have been willing to have done something for the territory if at the same time he could feel satisfied that he was promoting his own interests. He came to the territory rather late for a person of his temperament, and evidently discovered that all the positions of leadership in politics had been appropriated by men who had the ability to hold them, and in whom the people reposed confidence. In his quest for something that offered the dual advantages he had in mind, he selected the removal of the capital from Yankton to a more central point in the territory, as the one that promised to be the most fruitful.

The capital was then at Yankton on the extreme southern boundary, and this was in fact about the only disadvantage that could be alleged against it. As the population and settlements were then distributed, it accommodated the people of the territory fully as well, if not better than any other railroad point. There was a sentiment prevalent that a new location would have to be made, but it was held that such location should be deferred until the important question of dividing the territory on the 46th parallel of latitude should be settled, and the new communities then forming in every section of the territory had become fixed and established.

Governor Ordway was not a divisionist, though for prudential reasons probably he held this opinion in reserve until the progress of events disclosed it. His original plan, as stated by himself to the surveyor general of the territory, and substantially repeated to the Legislature in his message, was the selection of a site on the public lands in the central portion of the territory, and enter it, with the consent of Congress, if necessary, for capital purposes, and then dispose of the lots and squares, and with the proceeds erect a capitol building and make other improvements.

DAKOTA AND THE TARIFF

The governor never manifested the slightest interest favorable to division. The sentiment of New England which apparently influenced him to some extent was not favorable to two states from the one territory, and this sentiment was quite prevalent among the leading men and journals of the extreme East. The New England and eastern sentiment was apparently hostile to two states from Dakota because of the increase of voting strength it would give the West in the Senate. The West had been exhibiting symptoms of hostility to the high protective policy of New England and the eastern states where the people were largely identified with manufacturing interests, and found a high protective policy beneficial and profitable, while the agricultural West was inclined to favor a modification of the tariff in the interest of the great and growing producing classes who were peopling the agricultural West, though acting in consonance with New England in its fealty to republican principles. The sentiment of the West favored a lowering of the scale of duties on the manufactured articles it was compelled to purchase from the East, and additional protection on agricultural products that came in competition with imports from foreign countries. In other words the West was strongly inclined in favor of such a modification of the tariff as would result in equalizing its benefits.

Ordway, though governor of Dakota, never ceased to be a New Englander, and it cannot fairly be claimed that he ever became an actual resident of Dakota. He may have contemplated becoming one when the capital had been definitely located. At that time the great Sioux Reservation spread over a large area of Western Dakota, and promised to remain in that condition indefinitely. The Northwestern Railway Company was building its branch north from Huron to a point in Brown County, on Elm River, where a town had been located and named Ordway. It was not far from the James River. It was quite central, as the settlements of the territory were forming north and south, and it was spoken of as the future capital. Had the plan of securing the favor of Congress for a land endowment for capital purposes succeeded, then would have come a demand for the admission of Dakota as one state.

INDIANS VISIT WASHINGTON AND CARLISLE

Late in May, 1880, a large number of Sioux Indian chiefs, representing all the tribes of that nation, except possibly the Sissetons, paid a visit to Washington and also to the Carlisle Indian School in Pennsylvania. In Washington they expected to make an agreement to grant the right of way across their reservation to the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, and also to the Chicago & Northwestern Railway companies, for a line from the terminus of these roads on the Missouri River to the Black Hills, and at Carlisle they would visit the Sioux Indian children there at school. There were thirty-eight Sioux chiefs in the party, nearly all of them, as follows: From Fort Berthold, Son-of-the-Star, Poor Wolf, Peter Beauchamp, and John Smith. From Standing Rock, Two Bears, Big Head, John Grass, Thunder Hawk and Louis Primeau. From Cheyenne Agency, Bull Eagle and Charger. From Crow Creek, Brother-to-All and James Bowed-Head. From Rosebud Agency, Spotted Tail, Two-Strike, Iron Wing, White Thunder, Black Crow, John Bridgman. From Pine Ridge, Red Cloud, Red Dog, Little Wound, Red Shirt, American Horse, and Louis Robideau. Lower Brule Agency, Medicine Bull and Mad Bear. From Yankton Agency, Strike-the-Rec, Jumping Thunder, Philip J. Doloria, David Talijapo.

The Indians came to Yankton by steamboat from the Rosebud rendezvous near the mouth of White River, and at that point took the cars for their destination. Strike-the-Rec was the oldest man in the party, over eighty years of age, and appeared quite feeble. He had made many trips to see the Great Father, but it was evident that he was not expecting to make many more, possibly he realized that this was his final visit. He was greatly esteemed in Washington among the Government officials for his life-long friendship for the white race.

The entire party visited the Carlisle School, at which 176 young Sioux Indians, of both sexes, were being educated with a view to their civilization. The visitors were generally satisfied with the management of the school, and expressed their gratification and surprise, amounting almost to astonishment, at the progress being made by their children, and nearly all the families of the chiefs were represented among the pupils. After the visitors had witnessed the exercises in the several schoolrooms they were conducted to the chapel connected with the institution, where Spotted Tail made a speech in his native tongue, which appeared to be unanimously approved by his brothers in the royal line of chieftainship. He lauded the National Government for the good it had done the Indian people, and said that the trust and confidence reposed in the young people would bear good fruit. He said they all wanted to be civilized, and in order that their children might learn useful arts and become industrious citizens, their parents had consented that they should go to the Carlisle School. As the dignified chief approached the close of his speech, he counseled reform in one of the regulations adopted at the school providing for imprisonment in the guard house of refractory pupils. Allowance should be made for their tender years. He had learned that a number of boys had been subjected to this humiliating treatment. The Indian children had not been given up to be treated as ill-behaved soldiers, and they were not slaves, either. He thought a school ought to be established at the old Ponca Agency, where the children would be near their homes, and could be more frequently visited by their parents, and asked the two Episcopal clergymen present to assist in the accomplishment of the project.

Captain Pratt, in charge of the institution, explained that pupils had been committed to the guard house, but not until a Committee of Inquiry, consisting of Indians, had decided the punishment necessary. Among those placed in the guard house recently was one of Spotted Tail's sons, who had been fighting, which somewhat incensed the father. During their stay the chiefs visited the blacksmithing, the saddlery, shoemaking, tinsmithing, and carpentering departments, in which a large number of the pupils were employed at certain hours, all of whom were making encouraging progress. In the evening the interesting ceremony of confirmation was celebrated at the church, when twelve of the young Sioux were admitted to the Protestant Episcopal Church as members. Among them was Stay-at-Home and Talks-to-the-Bear, both sons of Spotted Tail, and Cut Ear, and the Bear-that-Don't-Run, sons of American Horse.

The party remained at Carlisle several days and then were to visit Hampton, Va., where another training school was in progress.

The first school for the education and training of Indian children away from their Indian homes or agencies, was founded at Hampton, about 1875, by the same Captain Pratt who was in charge of Carlisle. It had been a project that had enlisted his attention and energies for a number of years. His first pupils at Hampton were from Florida, seventeen in number, which he gathered together and took from St. Augustine to Hampton himself. Additions were made to the number quite rapidly, the pupils coming from all the tribes, including the Sioux. The institution at Hampton reached a very flourishing condition, and its increasing attendance and prosperity induced the establishment of the Carlisle School. At the time this party of Sioux were there the institution had among its scholars representatives from nearly all the Indian nations, including the Sioux, Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Kiowas, Comanches, Poncas, Pawnees, Nez Perces, Wichitas, Seminoles, Menominees, Iowas, and Sacs and Foxes. The facilities provided at Carlisle would comfortably care for and educate 300 pupils, and the expense of maintaining and instructing that number would not exceed sixty thousand dollars a year. The Sioux at Carlisle were among the latest pupils received, but had been received in such numbers that they already greatly outnumbered the pupils from all the other tribes.

RICHARD F. PETTIGREW

Came to Sioux Falls in 1869. Territorial legislator, delegate to Congress in 1881 and first United States senator from South Dakota.

All the young craftsmen, those who were learning trades in the mechanical department took great interest in their work, and evinced considerable skill, indicating that the Indian will be able to contribute somewhat to industries other than those purely pastoral or agricultural. Captain Pratt felt confident that his tin-smiths would be able to supply the Indian Bureau with all the tinware it needed, and the saddlery department was also looked to as one of the branches that would contribute largely to the support of the institution. One of the little shoemakers sent home to his Sioux father, a pair of new boots that the boy made expressly for his parent, and had made a good job of it. Pratt did not support Spotted Tail's idea of a school at the Old Ponca Agency. He based his opposition on the tendency of the Indian children to run to their homes on the slightest symptom of homesickness, and the corresponding inclination of parents to throng the school with frequent visits, greatly retarding and demoralizing its efficiency. The Sioux chiefs who could communicate by telegraph with their people at home, were given the privilege of sending dispatches from Carlisle. Red Cloud telegraphed: "Talked with school children. All happy." Spotted Tail sent, "Talked good words to children. All happy."

BROTHER-TO-ALL SPEAKS

"Brother-to-All," who is mentioned in the list of these Sioux chiefs, may not have been a chief, but he was a very enlightened Indian, solicitous for the future of his race, and did whatever he could to encourage them as well as promote his own progress along the lines of securing the advantages of Christian civilization. After his return from Carlisle he held a meeting at Crow Creek and recounted the incidents of his trip to his brethren. He had seen little of civilized life in the civilized portion of his country, and his story will prove quite pleasing to the reader, hence it is here given:

Friends: I have asked you to meet me here today to hear from me what I had seen and done while I was in the land of the palefaces. The Great Father had called me to come to him and see for you what the white man's teaching was doing for our children. I went to the river and stepped on the steamboat which was to carry us to Yankton. This boat is one of the things of the white man. It has a monster within its bowels which turns a wheel and pushes the boat along on the water much faster and longer than our ponies can carry us. The smartness of the white man has enabled him to catch these monsters and use them for his own purposes, just as we train our ponies. The monster is angry that he should be held down, and he groans and snorts in angry defiance, while he sends out from his nostrils fire and smoke. So we came to Yankton and rested, and then were placed in wagons that ran on iron rods, ever so much faster than the boat in water. Houses, trees and animals all seemed to be joined together, and it was hard for us to learn to tell them apart. In some places the houses were strung along, each by itself, but at times we came to places where there was nothing but houses. I could not have believed without seeing that there were people enough in the world to put up so many houses. All the way to the house where the great chief lives it was full of houses and people, and in the roads made in the great towns there were so many people that we held on to one another, for we feared we should be lost to each other if once separated. I do not know where so many people can come from, and I did not know how they could get enough to eat. But I soon saw that all these people worked in big houses or in the fields. Some of them gather up rags, dirty and torn, and carry them to a big house and put them in water, and there are wheels that go round and round, and by-and-by there comes out paper made from these rags. [Here the speaker exhibited rags in one hand and a sheet of white paper in the other.] In another big house they send men to the mountains, and these men bring back dirt, which is thrown into a big pipe and set on fire, and a red stream flows out, which is all one mass of fire. It falls into holes made of sand. [This stuff they make into knives, axes and all sorts of things. [Here he showed a piece of iron ore.] We went to other houses where they made plows, tubs, buckets, nails and more things than I ever saw before in my life. We went to the great schools where they send Indian children. They have large houses to put them in, and enough houses to hold all our band. The houses are built of bricks, which are mud-baked in the fire and then laid on the top of one another with some soft mud to make them hold together. Some houses in the towns are high up to the sky. I should be afraid to live in them. They seem to want to fall down. The children at the schools have teachers, and wear good clothes like the white men's children. They have plenty to eat and nice beds to sleep on. They read from books and are smart. Sometime they will be as smart as white men. The white people treat them well and are glad to do them good.

Friends, I tell you we must live like white people or we shall live no longer. The time will come when we shall be crowded, white men grow so fast in numbers. They must go out where there is more land. Then we will have no game to hunt. You can remember when we had plenty of buffalo; now we can see none. They are too far off. The antelopes are scarce, and we must depend on the Great Father for clothes to warm us in winter. No deer or wolves hardly where they were as plenty as grass. So we can see how soon we shall be in a bad way unless we help ourselves. A few years ago none of us worked; now our men farm a little, but not many. We must break our land, and plant more seed, and have enough to feed us. We need call on the Great Father but a little while longer. We have a good man to take care of us; we have plenty to eat, and he builds houses for us. He gives us plows, and wagons, and reapers, and mowers. But soon the white men may not give him these things. They will get tired of giving us oxen, if we do not learn to take care of ourselves. We must not hide away because the sun is hot in summer, and because in winter the snow comes. The white people work all the time. Some of our old men cannot do these things, but our young men may, and if they do not they must starve. I have talked a great deal to our agent about these matters. He feels for us and I know that what he says is for our good.

I could talk all day about what I have seen, and not tell you nearly all. I could see more things in an hour than I could tell of in a day. Why, the white man has paper he sends off on the iron road that tells everything that happens. They just put a piece of white paper between two iron rollers and by-and-by this paper comes out with all the things in it that happened in the world the day before. What country I saw is not the whole world. Our fathers used to think there was no country but theirs. So I thought I had seen the whole world while I was away, but some of our young men at the schools told me it was not so, and that many miles away over big waters there were other worlds as big as what I saw, and more people. They told me that to go from one end of this country to the other end would keep an Indian on his pony all the time for 600 days. They took me to a place where there was a hole in a box and put a string with a knob at the end into my hand, and then told me to whisper in the hole and put the knob to my ear. I did so, and heard songs sung and people calling. They told me the noise came on the string a great many miles. I did not believe it, but one of our young men at the school said it was true. Then they had a box a man would talk to, and by-and-by this talk would all come back again out of the box. I know this was so, because I talked my language into it, and it all came back again out of the box. The white people told me if we would be patient and have our children taught up like theirs that our people would be able to do like them. I think we had better think about these things and go to work. The Great Father will help us if we show we want to work. It is too late for us old men to hope for much, but the rest can do much and will be better off. The white man comes to our country and takes away much money. I do not see why we cannot do it, too. I want you to think about what I tell you and not forget it. I want the chiefs and old men to tell their young people the time for dancing and singing and painting is over, and they must go to work. There is plenty of land, plenty of plows, plenty of oxen. It is better to work than to run around with a blanket over your head, and a war club in your hand, or a gun. You cannot scare people any longer. The white people have too many soldier men, and they make too much powder and shot. If we want plenty we must work for it. If not, then we must go hungry and die. How?

The Indians seemed much impressed at this speaker's words. The earnestness of the speaker seemed to arouse them from their customary or habitual torpor, and his words were frequently punctuated by grunts of approval. It was evident from the change which came over a number of the Indians that the wise advice of "Brother-of-All" had found a lodgment in the minds of many of his people.

On their return the chiefs were accompanied by the following named Indian children from the school at Carlisle, Pa., who came home on a visit: Isaac Mandan, Agnes Place Together, Sarah Washta, Rosa Lay-out-of-Doors, Herbert Yellow-Sack, Thomas He Bear, Arnold Runs-after-the-Moon, Frederick Cloud Bull, Bennett Singer, Walter Bull Man, Ida Shoes, Emma Plenty Aunt, Agnes White Cow, Theron Passes-Through-Enemy. Spotted Tail brought his five children back having taken them out of the school because he was displeased with the management.

INDIANS CELEBRATE THE FOURTH

There was a formal celebration of the 4th of July, 1880, at the Crow Creek Agency, gotten up and participated in by the native Indian largely, which was claimed to have been the first occasion in the case of the Sioux Nation that our independence anniversary received from them any recognition, and the first occasion when any number of the Indians appeared to understand the significance of the day, and why whites observed it with firing of guns and hoisting of flags, and other demonstrations of pleasure and rejoicing. At Crow Creek the Indians seemed to have sufficient comprehension of the meaning of the occasion that after decorously attending the formal ceremonies, and listening apparently to the "cheap talk" that was a part thereof, they gave themselves up to revelry, with fire-crackers, pistols loaded with a small load of powder, running races afoot and on pony back, sometimes a foot racer outrunning his pony-mounted competitor. The oration was a very happy conception, short and to the point, and was all interpreted to the five hundred or more Indians gathered at the agency, which was known by the postoffice authorities as Fort Thompson. It was delivered by Mr. J. C. Beveridge, the assistant agent, the agent, Captain Dougherty, having gone to Mitchell to hear Governor Ordway's oration. Mr. Beveridge said:

Chiefs, Braves and Friends: We are gathered here today to celebrate the anniversary of American independence. On this day, 104 years ago, our forefathers rebelled against a tyranny rendered odious to them by the British government by declaring their entire independence of any nation or people by themselves. After long and bloody battles they were acknowledged as a free people. Your connection with the occasion arises from the fact that at a period far remote the same oppressive despotism had striven to fasten claims upon you, and it was not until the establishment of the republic of the United States of America that you received treatment as men and equals. The system devised by our forefathers has culminated in the grand scheme which virtually recognizes you as citizens, and clothes and feeds you. No more the cry of hunger leaps from your empty wigwams; no more the fierce blasts of the windy winter assails your naked limbs. The bounty of a thoughtful people has filled your houses with supplies, and your stomachs with the choicest viands of the season. It behoves you, then, to enter with heartiness and joy into the celebration of the epoch of American freedom which has lit the torch of liberty throughout the civilized world. Hereafter your children and your children's children, as their grandfathers before them, will rejoice in the annual remembrance of the greatest achievement upon the records of the world. Peace and prosperity are upon us. The great nation against which our fathers raised the sword is now our greatest friend. You now rest in your homes like white men, and forget your own efforts to hurt the hand which has sought to feed and to Christianize you. Let us have peace always.

Many of the Indians responded when the orator had concluded, and the remarks of some of the speakers clearly indicated that they understood there had been a great war between the pale faces across the great water, and those in this country, but it was a long time ago, and their fathers had told them that their fathers had heard about it and some of the old men had fought in the war. This was getting hold of an Indian tradition that our histories of 1776 fully confirm. A grand dinner followed the intellectual exercises in which every Indian was made to understand that he was the guest of the Great Father who won independence and plenty for the red and white races. And the Indians and their wives and daughters and little ones ate, some with knives and forks, and some with anything they could get hold of with their hands, and shouted "How," every now and then, and when the "How" was started it circled around for several minutes.

Few Indians have any conception of humor, hence there was no appropriate after-dinner speeches. The truth was that every Indian was "too full for utterance," literally, and they betook themselves to the shadows of the trees around and rested for an hour or two, when they gathered again and announced to their pale-faced brethren that it was now their turn to entertain, and everybody was invited. This occasion was gotten up in fine style, the Indians dressed and decorated in holiday attire, women and men, and consisted in some exhibitions of mimic warfare, violent gestures, defiant menaces, yells and more yells accompanied by the yelping of numberless dogs all barking in the same key, and a dance or numerous dances but all alike, to the rhythm of the tom-toms, which were being furiously assaulted by eight sturdy braves, and the never ceasing hi, yi, ki. These festivities lasted until long after dark, when the lamps were lit or the Chinese lanterns rather, and the grand celebration terminated with a genuine fat dog feast, to which the pale faces were cordially invited, but these explained that they had eaten to surfeiting in the afternoon, and could not eat, but if they could eat, a dog feast would meet every requirement. Thus the affair was ended.

SECRETARY SCHURZ'S ANNUAL REPORT

In his annual report to the President regarding affairs in his Department of the Interior for 1880, Secretary Schurz gave the condition of the Dakota Indians, as follows:

During the present administration the agricultural labor of the Indians has been more than doubled in quality and value. Figures show that the civilized and uncivilized together cultivated this year 482,738 acres of land, or about one and three-quarters acres of land to each man, woman and child, upon an estimate that the total population is twenty-five thousand. He felt that the agricultural industry would be greatly stimulated among the Indians if they could be assured that they would be secure in the ownership and possession of their lands.

He recommended that Congress provide for the division of farm tracts among the Indians in severalty on their respective reservations, and the issuance of patents to them individually. He also urges the favorable consideration of Congress to his former recommendation that the jurisdiction of the courts of the states and territories in which reservations are located be extended over them, giving to the Indians legal standing in the courts and securing to them the full benefit of the laws.

Last year's experiment of employing Indians as freighters with their own horses has proved to be one of the most beneficent innovations ever made in Indian management. Nearly two hundred freight wagons have been in use by the Indians this year, with the result of saving considerable money to the Government compared with amounts formerly paid for the same transportation of supplies, etc., to the agencies, besides furnishing a civilizing and welcome employment to a large number of otherwise restless Indians.

The number of Indian youth learning trades at the workshops at the agencies has increased from 185 last autumn to 358 this year. The policy of employing Indians as workmen, and even as foremen and mechanics, at the agencies has been continued and extended with great success. Brickmaking has been begun, and houses for the Indians are now almost exclusively built by the Indians themselves. The aptitude shown by the Indians for mechanical work has in many cases been surprising and is considered as deserving of every possible encouragement.

The expressions of anxious desire on the part of Indians belonging to the so-called wild tribes, to have their children instructed in the ways of civilized life, have, it is stated, grown so numerous and urgent that the inadequacy of the means at the disposal of the department for this purpose has become particularly painful. The desire and purpose of the department is to largely increase the present small number of industrial boarding schools for the Indian youth, as day schools at the agencies do not withdraw the pupils from the influences of home surroundings sufficiently to facilitate the change in their habits of daily life.

The organization of a police force, consisting of Indians, at the agencies has a remarkable civilizing tendency. This has been put in operation at forty agencies. The force now consists of 162 officers and 653 privates. Its benefits, both as a means of maintaining good order and as a moral influence upon the Indian tribes among whom it has been established, are set forth as worthy of special notice.

The secretary remarked that experience had strengthened his conviction, which, as this was his last report, he now felt at greater liberty to express that the management of Indian Affairs should continue to be entrusted to the civil and not to the military branch of the public service. He quoted with emphasis the report of the peace commission of 1878, signed by Generals Sherman, Harvey, Terry and Auger, in which those distinguished officers of the army said:

If we intend to have war with them, the Indians of the United States, the Indian bureau should go to the secretary of war. If we intend to have peace, it should be in the civil department.

Regarding the building of railroads across the Great Sioux Reservation, the secretary stated that the Dakota Central and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul companies were both making preliminary surveys, with the consent of the Indians and under an escort of Indian police, with the intention of connecting the mining districts of the Black Hills with the Missouri River and the railroads east. Negotiations with the Indians for the right-of-way were then pending, and if a satisfactory arrangement of compensation could be made it was expected an agreement would be reached in the near future.

Secretary Schurz, during a swing around the circle which enclosed all the northern Indian reservations as far out as the Pacific, in the summer of 1880, returned by way of the Yellowstone and Missouri rivers as far as Bismarck, stopping at Fort Keogh, Fort Buford, and at the Berthold Agency where he met the Mandans, Gros Ventres and Arickarees, Indians who had not been other than peaceful for over a half century, and had made some progress in the arts of civilization.

REPUBLICAN TERRITORIAL CONVENTION

The Republican Territorial Convention of 1880 was called to meet at Vermillion on Wednesday, September 20th. The campaign opened with Hon. G. G. Bennett, a candidate for delegate to Congress to succeed himself. He had made a very satisfactory official, though the House during his term was controlled by the political party to which he was opposed. He had by his genial manners and efficiency advanced the good name of Dakota, and reflected credit on the commonwealth. Hon. Richard F. Pettigrew, of Sioux Falls, Minnehaha County, was also a candidate on the republican side; as was also John B. Raymond, the United States marshal.

Mr. Pettigrew conducted quite a spirited canvass; but the general impression during the earlier weeks of the campaign was that Bennett would be able to "pull through," though it was known that the sentiment of Vermillion, where the convention was called, was hostile to Bennett because of the prejudice which existed owing to Judge Kidder's defeat two years before and which gave that county to the democrats in 1878.

John B. Raymond was appointed United States marshal for the Territory of Dakota in 1877. He hailed from Jacksonville, Miss., at the time of his appointment by President Hayes, where he was engaged in publishing a republican newspaper. Mr. Raymond was one of the youngest veterans of the Civil war, and at the close of that conflict he settled in Mississippi. He was a native of Illinois, and at the age of sixteen he enlisted in the Thirty-first Illinois Infantry, Col. John A. Logan's Regiment. In 1863 he was commissioned captain in that regiment. He was then eighteen years old and the youngest captain in the western army. He was soon after detached and assigned to duty on the staff of Major General Force, of Ohio; and within a month was transferred to the staff of Major General Leggett, also an Ohioan, where he remained to the end of the war, when he took up his abode in Mississippi and participated in the turbulent events which accompanied the reconstruction of that commonwealth. Both commanders above named were among his ardent supporters for the marshalship, and the President also favored it as in line with his policy to select southern republicans for responsible civil positions, as witness the appointment of Hugh J. Campbell of Louisiana or Arkansas to the United States attorneyship for Dakota a little earlier.

Pettigrew's Shibboleth was "Dakota for Dakotans," and there was magnetism in it. It made an issue wherein he had all the advantage, while it appealed strongly to the farmer class—to those who prided themselves on coming to Dakota to make a home, and not to hold a fat office. Both of his competitors had come to the territory with federal commissions. Pettigrew had advantage also in having two competitors, both strong men before the people, and the partisans of both not personally unfriendly to himself; but aggressively fighting for their favorite. In this situation was the element of Pettigrew's strength that probably gave him the victory. Bennett and Raymond had both come into the territory with federal commissions; Bennett as judge in 1875, and Raymond as marshal in 1877. Pettigrew went before the people with two questions, namely:

1. Whether they were not able to govern themselves without the aid of a knot of politicians at the capital—Yankton.

[Yankton was for Bennett.]

2. Whether the territory had not better, for a while at least, try the experiment of selecting their officers and representatives from those of the citizens who had, beyond question, come here to make Dakota their home.

The campaign preliminary to the holding of the convention was vigorously contested, and enlisted much more interest than the campaign following the nominations. The candidates were all well known, and each evidently possessed about an equal share of public confidence. Delegate Bennett, who was then the incumbent of the seat in Congress, appeared to have the lead before the people when this preliminary tussle began. There was not a weak spot in his armor except the old grudge born of the doubtful nomination two years before. He had been an industrious and efficient delegate and stood well at Washington. Mr. John B. Raymond was also popular, but he was also tainted with having come to Dakota later than Bennett, as a federal official and was then holding the position of United States marshal. Mr. Pettigrew was a pioneer of modern Sioux Falls, a successful business man, of untiring energy and good ability. Raymond's candidacy was not well advised—it was premature; but if he had kept out of the contest Pettigrew would probably have lost, for Raymond weakened Bennett in the Black Hills and in North Dakota much more than he did Pettigrew.

Pettigrew came in 1870 as an emigrant from Wisconsin with the laudable purpose of becoming a citizen of the territory and to aid in its development. The others came to hold an office, draw a good salary, and when their terms expired might do as other federal officials had done, though not all, return to their eastern domicile. This sort of a "battle cry" was popular, and won the good will, if not the entire support of thousands of homesteaders and working people. It enabled Mr. Pettigrew to start his campaign on a substantial basis—to vindicate the prior claims of the actual citizen—the Dakotan who was one for the purposes of making a home and developing the resources of the country, in preference to the one who would not have been here had he not been allured by the advantage of a federal office. Bennett and Raymond divided the majority. Raymond had Northern Dakota for sectional reasons; and Bennett had a substantial following among the people generally on his merits, and he also had the Black Hills, where he resided, but not aggressively, though two years before the Black Hills secured his nomination. Raymond with his marshal's patronage, had made a host of friends among the miners and citizens there, who were actively supporting him; still Bennett was generally conceded the support of the hills.

There was unusual activity in 1880 in every part of the territory where there was anybody to enact activity. Immigration was not out of sight for a day, streaming into every section; the Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company was building across the territory to Central City (Pierre), on the Missouri, and from Huron north into the wilderness. The C. M. & St. Paul was building to Chamberlain; and from Mitchell north; also from Ortonville, Minn., through Dakota to the James River and beyond. The Southern Minnesota was building to Sioux Falls down the Sioux from Flandreau, and extending its line west toward Woonsocket. The North Pacific was building from Casselton north; and James J. Hill was extending his Manitoba system from Wahpeton to Casselton. The North Pacific was also building north from Fargo to Grand Forks and beyond. The same continental road was extending from Bismarck west to the Pacific, and the iron horse was snorting and piping west of the Missouri in the northern portion of the territory. The Black Hills were yielding abundantly from their mines of precious metals; the grain fields in the north and in the "cow counties," were arrayed in the garb of plenty; while Pettigrew was making his first effort to get to Congress, and he was not only busy himself, but he managed to keep the two other candidates busy. These were the larger objects that gave interest to the passing time—any one of which would have been notable in a preceding ordinary year. A President of the United States was also to be chosen, and though Dakotans had no voice or vote in the election, her people carried torches and banners in parades, and shouted enthusiastically for their favorite candidate.

Mr. Pettigrew had not won the prize when the nominating convention assembled. Bennett was the strongest candidate, but Pettigrew was best prepared for the emergency which followed. He had had the most strenuous opposition of any of the candidates, and a natural result of this was that his supporters were not willing to accept any compromise that did not give them the candidate.

PROCEEDINGS

The Territorial Republican Convention was called to meet at the City of Vermillion on Wednesday, September 1, 1880, to nominate a candidate for delegate to Congress. The convention composed of delegates, assembled at the time and place appointed, and met in the Clay County Bank Building. It was called to order by the chairman of the Territorial Committee, Hon. Alexander Hughes, of Union County. John S. Stoyell, of Burleigh County, was made temporary chairman, and Charles Moody, of Lawrence, and C. F. Mallahan, of Union, secretaries.

On motion, Chairman Stoyell then appointed the following committees:

On Credentials—J. D. Patton, Lawrence County; Judson LaMoure, Pembina; C. T. McCoy, Bon Homme; Robert MacNider, Burleigh; W. M. Cuppett, Lincoln.

On Rules—H. F. Miller, Cass County; George Walsh, Grand Forks; D. C. Thomas, Deuel; Dr. J. A. Harding, Lawrence; J. W. Carter, Lincoln.

On Permanent Organization—C. H. Winsor, Minnehaha County; S. P. Coe, Barnes County; Newton Porter, Traill County; V. P. Thielman, Turner County; James Carney, Lawrence County.

On Resolutions—E. W. Caldwell, Minnehaha County; F. N. Burdick, of Clay County; Porter Warner, of Lawrence County; Alex. Hughes, of Union; and E. P. Wells, of Stutsman County.

After recess, the Committee on Credentials made the following report and named the following persons entitled to seats in the convention from the counties named: Armstrong County, M. T. Woolley, 1; Barnes, S. B. Coe, J. Weiser, 2; Brookings, W. H. Skinner, H. H. Sedgwick, 2; Burleigh, A. MacNider, M. J. Edgerly, John S. Stoyell, 3; Bon Homme, C. T. McCoy, W. C. Grant, B. R. Wagner, E. Shupe, W. Borsche, 5; Brule, E. M. Bond, 1; Brown, John Haire, 1; Beadle, Daniel Bell, 1; Clay, F. N. Burdick, Wm. Elliott, J. P. Waustland, Al. Newton, Lewis Gamberg, R. Maston, 6; Custer, Patrick McLughes, 1; Codington, Wm. McIntyre, R. B. Spicer, 2; Cass, J. E. Haggart, W. H. Corey, Ole Horgen, H. F. Miller, A. T. Tuttle, O. J. Olsen, J. J. Brooks, 7; Charles Mix, F. M. Baker, 1; Deuel, H. H. Herrick, W. H. Donaldson, 2; Davison, Geo. A. Johnson, 1; Grant, David Faribault, S. W. Simmons, 2; Grand Forks, Geo. H. Walsh, John Fadden, J. R. Church, Newton Porter, W. G. Woodruff, 5; Hanson, James Baynes, 1; Hutchinson, John E. Maxwell, J. C. Boyles, J. H. Swanson, 3; Hamlin, Walter Abbott, 1; Kingsbury, V. V. Barnes, 1; Lake, W. F. Smith, P. Zimmerman, G. F. Tuttle, 3; Lincoln, J. W. Carter, T. J. Thornstad, W. M. Cuppett, A. B. Wheelock, F. A. York, Thomas Wright, G. W. Moody, 7; Lawrence, Edwin P. VanCise, Porter Warner, Chas. H. Enos, C. V. Gardner, R. D. Jennings, William Thompson, Henry O'Connor, Jr., P. O'Grady, Iver Miller, J. C. Wilcox, F. C. Silkinson, John Johnson, S. E. Forsha, Nathan Colman, Sol. Star, Wm. H. Parker, R. D. Kennedy, E. E. Cunningham, R. E. Grimshaw, F. M. Allen, J. A. Harding, J. E. Patton, J. F. McKenna, James Carney, Chas. C. Moody, 25; Minnehaha, E. W. Caldwell, C. B. Vincent, T. R. Kershaw, A. M. Flagg, A. Thorne, C. H. Winsor, J. R. Jackson, A. F. Sloan, John Langness, 9; Moody, D. S. White, Levi Gray, B. W. Brayton, O. S. Huseboe, 5; McCook, H. H. Pierce,

J. F. Horton, 2; Morton, M. C. Jacobs, John S. Warren, 2; Pembina, Judson La-Moure, P. A. Gatchell, John Olton, 3; Pennington, Frank P. Moulton, G. W. Grant, N. P. Cook, W. W. Smithson, Folsom Dow, J. C. Pyatt, 6; Spink, C. H. Meyers, 1; Stutsman, E. P. Wells, 1; Turner, V. P. Thielmann, G. W. Marshall, H. Snyder, T. B. Martins; Traill, Peter Herbrandson, J. R. Age, John Amb, George Wilson, J. W. Morley, 5; Union, Alex. Hughes, John Dahl, Ira Ellis, J. G. Merrill, D. Ross, Arne Johnson, Frank Patterson, Lewis Johnson, 8; Yankton, Myron Blodgett, Haldo Sater, A. W. Howard, D. F. Etter, B. S. Williams, O. P. Hage, A. W. Lavender, Fred Schnauber, W. B. Valentine, J. R. Gamble, Adolph Mauxsch, 11.

Agreeable to the report of the Committee on Permanent Organization, Wm. M. Cuppett, of Lincoln County, was elected permanent chairman of the convention, and E. W. Caldwell, of Minnehaha, secretary. Caldwell declined and Chas. C. Moody, of Lawrence, was substituted, and C. T. Mallahan, of Union County, assistant secretary.

The Rules Committee reported the rules of the national convention, which were adopted. The unit rule included.

The Committee on Resolutions reported as follows:

Resolved, That we join in the general rejoicing of republicans throughout the country over the excellent nominations made at Chicago, and believing the success of Garfield and Arthur to be assured, not alone by democratic division, but by republican union and strength, we urge republicans of Dakota to enter the campaign with zeal and courage that they may share in the national victory.

Resolved, That the principles stated in the platform of the republican national convention be indorsed by this convention.

Resolved, That it is the judgment of this convention that the interests of the people of Dakota would be furthered by a division of the territory upon the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude.

Resolved, That our delegate in Congress be requested to promote the organization of a state comprising that portion of Dakota lying south of said parallel.

Resolved, That we request of Congress such action, either by legislation or treaty, as shall secure the right of way through the Indian reservations to all railroads desiring to build within this territory.

Resolved, That our delegate in Congress be asked to use his influence there to reduce the price of all Government lands within the territory to $1.25 per acre to actual settlers.

Resolved, That this convention extends to Hon. Granville G. Bennett, our delegate in Congress, its thanks for his faithful and important services to the people of Dakota.

Resolved, That each and every member of this convention will give to the nominee of this convention, whoever he may be, his earnest and hearty support.

The convention then proceeded to nominate a candidate for delegate to Congress, and the first ballot, an informal one, resulted as follows:

For Bennett—Barnes County, 1; Burleigh County, 1; Custer, 1; Hutchinson, 3; Kingsbury, 1; Lawrence, 25; Richland, 2; Spink, 1; Stutsman, 1; Union, 8; Yankton, 11. Total, 55.

For Raymond—Barnes, 1; Burleigh, 2; Armstrong, 1; Cass, 7; Davison, 1; Grand Forks, 5; Morton, 2; Pembina, 3; Pennington, 4; Traill, 5. Total, 31.

For Pettigrew—Brookings, 2; Bon Homme, 5; Brule, 1; Brown, 1; Beadle, 1; Clay, 6; Codrington, 2; Charles Mix, 1; Deuel, 2; Grant, 2; Hanson, 1; Hamlin, 1; Lake, 3; Lincoln, 7; Minnehaha, 9; Moody, 5; McCook, 2; Turner, 4. Total, 55.

The formal ballots were then entered upon, and the first one showed no change from the informal test vote.

On the second formal ballot ten of the Lawrence County delegation, one from Burleigh County, and one from Spink County changed from Bennett to Pettigrew; while Raymond gained one from Kingsbury and one from Barnes. The result of the ballot was Bennett, 41; Raymond, 33; Pettigrew, 67. Necessary to a choice, 71.

Then followed a number of ballots up to the sixth without material change, when a motion to adjourn was made but was defeated by Mr. Pettigrew's friends; another motion for the same purpose carried a little later, by 75 to 66, which latter was the total of Mr. Pettigrew's vote on the last ballot.

The adjournment was for one hour, when the convention again came to order, and the seventh ballot was entered upon. Burleigh County, heretofore for Raymond, changed to Pettigrew on this ballot, which was the signal for a general break all along the line, and when the ballot was concluded Pettigrew had received all the votes except Custer, Hutchinson and Union, which stood for Bennett; while Armstrong and Barnes held out for Raymond. A motion to make the nomination unanimous was then made and carried.

M. J. Edgerly, C. T. McCoy, A. B. Wheelock, J. A. Harlan, and W. G. Woodruff were appointed to report a Territorial Central Committee. Mr. Pettigrew was escorted into the convention hall and made a brief speech accepting the nomination, and pledging his best efforts to serve the territory faithfully should he be the choice of the people at the election in November. The convention then adjourned.

The nomination of Mr. Pettigrew came as a surprise to the people generally, who looked for Judge Bennett's renomination. Mr. Pettigrew himself, however, and his Sioux Valley supporters, had expressed the utmost confidence in the success of the gentlemen from the "pickerel" district, as the Sioux Falls section was known in the political vernacular of that day. And from and after this convention it will be observed that the "pickerel" statesman and his friends had a dominant influence in territorial politics and in the territorial conventions for many years extending beyond the territorial era and well into the State Government. Geo. H. Walsh, of Grand Forks, was made chairman of the republican Territorial Committee.

DEMOCRATIC TERRITORIAL CONVENTION

The Democratic Territorial Convention for the year 1880 was held at Sioux Falls, on Wednesday, September 15, at Van Eps' Hall; it was called to order by Frank M. Zeibach, of the Democratic Central Committee, and J. F. Watson, of Lawrence County, was chosen temporary chairman, and Chas. F. Hackett, of Turner County, secretary. The chair appointed the following committees:

On Credentials—S. L. Spink, Yankton; Aleck McKenzie, Burleigh; D. M. Inman, Clay; Abe Boynton, Lincoln; M. H. Day, Bon Homme; Robert Francis, Lawrence; H. A. Piper, Pennington.

On Organization—S. S. Turner, Yankton; James Rosebrann, Lawrence; Charles K. Howard, Minnehaha; Aleck McKenzie, Burleigh; S. Simpson, Bon Homme.

On Resolutions—E. N. Falk, Traill County; Bartlett Tripp, Yankton County; John Quinlan, Burleigh County; W. L. Wilder, Grand Forks; T. J. Webster, Lawrence.

After recess the Credentials Committee made the following report of delegates entitled to seats in the convention: Armstrong County, E. G. Armstrong; Barnes County, J. P. Rogers; Burleigh County, John Quinlan, Aleck McKenzie, Dennis Hennafin, P. Crawford, 6; Brookings County not represented; Bon Homme County, S. Simpson, H. A. Reeves, M. H. Day, 5; Beadle and Brown counties not represented; Clay County, William Lowrie, Jonathan Kimble, D. M. Inman, 6; Custer County, proxy, J. F. Watson, 2; Cass County, a contest from this county was reported and the committee recommended admitting two delegates from each delegation; Charles Mix, M. H. Day, proxy; Codington, Maris Taylor, proxy; Deuel, not represented; Davison County, James S. Foster; Douglas County, W. H. Brown; Grand Forks County, W. L. Wilder, M. L. McCormack, 4; Grant County, not represented; Hutchinson County, H. A. Reeves, proxy, 2; Hanson County, Maris Taylor, proxy; Hamlin and Kingsbury counties, not represented; Lincoln County, Abe Boynton, O. D. Hinckley, J. B. Bertrand; Lake County, W. H. Corson, proxy, 2; Lawrence County, Robert Francis, J. F. Watson, James Rosebrough, T. J. Webster, 28; Minnehaha County, C. K. Howard, J. G. Botsford, M. Howie, Thomas F. Kelley, W. VanEps, F. Glidden, D. S. Glidden, 6; Morton County, Aleck McKenzie, proxy; McCook, Moody, Pembina counties, not represented; Pennington, H. A. Piper, 4; Richland County, O. H. Wiley, J. A. McCluskey, proxies; Ransom County, Arthur Linn; Stutsman County, John Quinlan; Traill County, E. N. Falk; Turner County, J. W. Turner, R. C. Tousley, Chas. F. Hackett, 3; Union County, M. W. Sheafe, Jr., E. W. Miller, Thos. Rowan, Wm. Gilbert, 7; Yankton County, S. L. Spink, Dr. J. B. VanVelsor, Bartlett Tripp, C. J. B. Harris, L. M. Kee, John McCabe, S. S. Turner, James Taylor.

The Committee on Permanent Organization had not been able to agree and the convention proceeded and elected S. S. Turner, of Yankton, permanent chairman, and Chas. F. Hackett, of Turner County, permanent secretary.

The Committee on Resolutions reported a series of resolutions, which, before being read, were on motion of J. W. Turner, laid on the table until the candidate was nominated.

On motion of S. L. Spink the convention then proceeded with an informal ballot for a candidate for delegate to Congress; Aleck McKenzie and E. W. Miller being appointed tellers. The vote was taken by counties, as follows:

The candidates voted for were H. S. Back, of Cass County; M. L. McCormack, Grand Forks; D. M. Inman, Clay; J. M. Murphy, Black Hills; Bartlett Tripp, Yankton; John Manning, Lawrence; J. F. Watson, Lawrence.

Back received Barnes County, 1; Clay, 3; Cass, 2; Richland, 2; Yankton, 3. Total, 11.

Inman received Armstrong County, 1; Brule, 1; Bon Homme, 5; Charles Mix, Codington, Hughes, 1 each; Turner, 3; Union, 7; Yankton, 1. Total, 21.

Murphy received Custer, 2; Lawrence, 28; Pennington, 14. Total, 34.

McCormack received Burleigh, 6; Clay, 3; Cass, 2; Davison, 2; Grand Forks, 4; Hutchinson, 2; Lake, 2; Minnehaha, 6; Morton, 1; Stutsman, 1; Traill, 2; Yankton, 2. Total, 33.

Tripp, Lincoln County, 3.

Manning, received Hanson County, 1.

Watson received, Yankton, 1.

A recess of ten minutes followed for consultation, at the conclusion of which the proceedings were resumed; and a motion carried to proceed with the election of a chairman of the Territorial Committee, concerning which there was much interest owing to the influence the chairman of the committee would have at Washington in case the democrats elected their candidate for president; and with this position out of the way the nomination of a candidate for delegate would be less difficult. Two candidates were placed in the field—D. M. Inman, of Clay County, and James Rosebrough, of Lawrence County. A ballot was taken, and Mr. Inman received fifty-eight votes, and Mr. Rosebrough, forty-seven. Inman was declared elected.

The convention then proceeded to take a formal ballot for the nomination of a candidate for delegate to Congress. M. L. McCormack, of Grand Forks, and H. S. Back, of Cass County, were placed in nomination. The vote, by ballot, resulted as follows:

For McCormack—Burleigh County, 6; Bon Homme, 1; Cass, 2; Custer, 2; Douglas, 1; Davison, 2; Grand Forks, 4; Hutchinson, 2; Lincoln, 3; Lake, 2; Lawrence, 28; Minnehaha, 6; Morton, 1; Pennington, 4; Stutsman, 1; Turner, 3; Traill, 2; Yankton, 2. Total, 72.

Back received Armstrong, Barnes, Brule, 1 each; Bon Homme, 4; Clay, 6; Cass, 2; Charles Mix, Codington and Hanson, 1 each; Richland, 2; Ransom, 1; Union, 7; Yankton, 6. Total, 34.

McCormack's nomination was made unanimous. Addresses were made by the candidate, who was escorted to the hall; also by Hon. S. L. Spink and Hon.

Bartlett Tripp, and Mr. Back, the defeated candidate, who promised the ticket his hearty support with his voice and purse. The convention then adjourned.

Hon. M. L. McCormack, the nominee, was a young merchant of Grand Forks, a very worthy and highly respected citizen, interested in steamboating on the Red River, and possessed of considerable wealth. He had, however, practically no experience in public affairs. He was equipped with excellent business qualifications, and would be apt to fill the office acceptably if he could get it. It was evident that he had been selected by the democratic leaders because of his location in the northern part of the territory. The republicans, in their convention had defeated Raymond, of Fargo, and this was supposed to leave a sting in the breast of the true northern man, who would take pleasure in resenting the outrage at the election. But the plan failed; it seemed to stimulate the republicans to greater energy, and added not a little of interest to the campaign.

McCormack was a business man of good ability, high character, and a democratic leader. He was almost entirely unknown in the southern part of the territory, and there was little expectation that he would prove to be a strong candidate. He had counted on an uncompromising disaffection among the republicans which did not prove of such a serious character as to affect the vote. Politicians were slow to learn that factional differences are seldom serious enough to survive after a candidate is named by a convention, and bolting a nomination frequently taints the political reputation of the bolter, sometimes for life.

The election took place in November and resulted in a victory for Pettigrew by a large majority as shown in the following official table:

Pettigrew lost 1,124 votes owing to a mistake of the voter in using the wrong initials. In Pembina County there were 483 votes for Frank R. Pettigrew; in Stutsman County, same mistake, 266; in Lincoln County, 1, and in Richland County, 374. McCormack lost 13 votes cast for O. M. L. McCormack. These imperfect votes were all thrown out of the official canvass. The vote indicated a total population of 150,000.

There was never a time in the career of Dakota Territory when the democrats were strong enough, even-handed to carry the territory. The leaders of the party realized this, and there was, therefore, a disinclination among them to accept the nomination for delegate. It was not known, as a rule, who would be put forward as their candidates, until the assembling of their conventions. Judge Bartlett Tripp came nearest, in 1878, when within less than one thousand votes changed from Bennett to himself would have given him the majority. Armstrong was twice elected, receiving but a small plurality, and on each occasion he had two opponents to divide the vote opposed to him. Some fortuitous circumstances, like the doubtful regularity of Bennett's nomination over Kidder; or the later presumed disappointment of the Northern Dakota republicans to secure Mr. Raymond's nomination, gave to the democrats sufficient encouragement to prosecute a vigorous campaign. They saw a reason for great disaffection in the ranks of their political enemy, but the result would show that party fealty was stronger than disaffection. This the democrats might have learned in the smaller sub-division of the territory, in the counties which they controlled, and which they seldom lost through the disaffection of their people.

BLACK HILLS SALT SPRINGS

The fact that the western Black Hills section contained deposits of salt was first ascertained by a party made up of Bart Henderson, G. D. Silliman, Charles Calderbaugh, and J. A. D. Grave, on the eighth day of July, 1877. They were prospecting through the west foothills, and found a small tributary of Beaver Creek which put into the main stream about half a mile below Jenny's stockade, which was quite salt to the taste. Following this stream up, they found a narrow point between the two ravines, about a half acre of which was partially covered with salt springs. These springs proved to be about seventy in number, producing from one to twenty-five inches of water, which by analysis subsequently made, produced about three-fourths of a pound of pure salt to the gallon. The party soon after made a rough experiment by boiling some of the water in a camp kettle, and the result was so encouraging that they moved their camp to the Salt Springs in September following. Mr. Henderson was something of a veteran in the mountains and had with others discovered salt deposits in Idaho, in 1861, knew that they were valuable, and under his counsel and by his direction, the party during the following year had two furnaces built for the evaporation of the water. These furnaces were supplied with two pans each, 10x4 feet, and had a capacity of 1,000 pounds of salt in twenty-four hours. It required 1¼ cords of wood to produce the 1,000 pounds. These salt works were quite crude, and were put up cheaply and simply for the purpose of prospecting the discovery, and also for the purpose of ascertaining whether a salt industry could be made to pay in the hills country. The product of the first large test was therefore taken to Deadwood and introduced in that market and among the people, that its quality might be tested by consumers. The excellent quality of the home-made article was found above criticism when it was tried in the homes and hotels of Deadwood, and the owners of the springs had no difficulty whatever in arranging to supply the Deadwood market; in fact, they were called upon to furnish a much larger field, and in order to do this successfully their facilities were enlarged, the production much increased and a ready market found for all that was produced. A coarser quality was also produced which found a ready sale among the live stock men.

A DALRYMPLE WHEAT ITEM

A large number of reputable people and many of the newspapers were inclined to shake their heads in doubt of the truth of many of the statements made regarding the mammoth wheat crops produced, especially on the large farms in the northern portion of the territory, notably that of Mr. Dalrymple, but when an investigation was made and the facts revealed it often developed that the reports understated instead of overstated the facts. An instance of this kind came out when a reporter for a St. Paul newspaper succeeded in securing a few words from Mr. Dalrymple, after the wheat harvest of 1880. The reporter desired to know whether the famous wheat king had lost any grain by bad stacking or inclement weather.

"Not a bushel," Mr. D. replied. "The only trouble I fear we'll have will be that we may be compelled to store about a fourth of my crop for want of transportation. I can't get cars enough on the road to carry off my wheat as fast as I can thresh it and get it ready for shipment."

Then the reporter said: "I have seen it stated that it would take thirty-five cars a day for thirty days to carry off your crop."

To which Mr. Dalrymple replied: "Take your pencil and calculate what a tract of land will produce containing thirty-nine sections, or thirty-nine miles long and one mile wide, producing twenty-three bushels an acre. And then calculate 350 bushels to the car load, and you will find that you will require thirty-two cars a day for sixty days to carry away the product, which would amount to 1,250,000 bushels."

There were other "bonanza farms," which included the Stark farm near Bismarck, operated by McLean & McNider, and the Clark farm, seventeen miles east of Bismarck; 44,480 acres owned by Charles Clark, Pittsburgh, Pa., and managed by John Steen. The Steele farm, in Steele County, thirty miles east of Bismarck, embraced 6,400 acres, owned and managed by W. F. Steele. The Troy farm, in Kidder County, owned by Van Deusen & Co., of Troy, N. Y., and managed by John Van Deusen. It embraced 9,600 acres. The Spiritwood farm in Stutsman County, owned by capitalists in England and managed by S. S. Russell, Cuyler Adams and Charles O. Francis, lessees. It embraced 10,000 acres. The same owners had title to about eighty thousand acres of Northern Pacific land.

The yield of wheat from Dakota farms in 1880 was fully up to the average, particularly in the north, where the farming industry was largely confined to the production of that cereal. The farms along the Red River Valley, and those also bordering in the neighborhood of the Northern Pacific Railway, which had been opened for two, three or four years, yielded an average of twenty-five bushels to the acre, and in the country of the James River Valley, and west, it was claimed that the yield was higher than this. In the southern portion of the territory the yield had been to some extent injured by excessive heat in July, but the general average was quite satisfactory, the farmers had made substantial gains from the year's harvest and new settlers kept all the trails to the unoccupied lands warm during the summer and fall. An addition of over fifty thousand had been made to the population of the territory during the year, and by far the greater portion after the federal census was taken in May.

BRAMBLE, MINER & COMPANY, BLACK HILLS FREIGHTERS

A notable example of an industry that was augmented to great proportions by the opening of the Black Hills and their occupation by an industrial community of producers was that of the mercantile enterprise of Bramble, Miner & Company, which had the distinction of being the first, or having grown up from the first store established in the Territory of Dakota. The firm, or rather the establishment, dated its small beginning in the fall of 1850, when Downer T. Bramble, its senior member, located at Yankton and opened a store for trade with the early settlers in the first frame building built in the territory from native lumber and by Dakota mechanics, its plastering being a mortar made of the native chalk rock, without any preparation except pulverizing. It was located near the river bank at the intersection of Walnut Street with the levee, and the building itself subsequently, and during the early years of the territorial government, had an important part in the history of its day, being the official and for some the lodging quarters of a number of the territorial officers, including the governor, secretary and the surveyor-general. In 1860 William Miner purchased an interest with Mr. Bramble, and the new firm of Bramble & Miner grew to be the principal mercantile house in the territory during the next ten years. In 1872 the firm, in company with William Borden, built the Excelsior Flour Mill and Elevator, which at the time was one of the largest mills and of greater capacity than any similar institution in Dakota, and has continued in business, much improved and enlarged, to the present day. In 1876, Mr. Borden having died, Mr. Frank L. Van Tassel purchased an equal interest in the store and mill, and the firm became Bramble, Miner & Company. Mr. Van Tassel had been with the firm since 1868 as bookkeeper and clerk, and was well qualified for business.

The opening of the Black Hills was practically accomplished in 1876, though the agreement of the Government with the Indians was not ratified until February, 1877. This event opened a new channel for the mercantile trade, including flour, which the firm of Bramble, Miner & Company took advantage of. A practicable highway leading into the hills was established by the Government from Fort Pierre, and the steamboats furnished a convenient and economical mode of transporting merchandise to that point.

The heaviest shipper at that time connected with the Black Hills trade was the firm of Bramble, Miner & Company, of Yankton, composed of D. T. Bramble, William Miner and Frank L. Van Tassel. This firm had been active in the Black Hills trade since the hills were opened in 1876, and in 1880 their business had grown to large proportions. In 1877 Mr. Bramble went to Deadwood to arrange for the handling of their business at that end of the line, and finding the field so much more inviting than he had expected, found it necessary to make Deadwood his abiding place. The firm owned and operated the Excelsior Flour Mills at Yankton and an immense wholesale grocery establishment. These were operated in connection with their Black Hills freight line, which during the boating season sent its cargoes from Yankton to the Black Hills, transferring from the steamboats to the freight wagons at West Pierre. In 1880 the freight line from West Pierre employed 300 men and 2,000 head of oxen. The capacity of their trains was 700 tons per trip, and it required about a month to make the trip from the Missouri River to Deadwood and return. Over five thousand tons were transported by this line in 1880. The firm loaded twenty-one steamboats at Yankton with Black Hills freight.

In Yankton twenty-three men were employed. The wholesale grocery department was in charge of Mr. Van Tassel, the mills were under Mr. Miner's supervision and the carrying trade was looked after by Mr. Bramble. In connection with their business the firm had taken the tradership at the Yankton Indian Agency, regarded as a franchise of considerable value. The business of this firm for the year 1880 amounted to about a million and a half dollars, and it did not reach its maximum during that year. Its success had been the result of honorable methods and unflagging industry.

One of the most careful, energetic and hustling freighters employed by the Merchants Transportation Company, or Bramble, Miner & Company, in their operations of transportation was Mr. J. T. Daugherty, or as he was familiarly known and called, John Daugherty. Mr. Daugherty was thorough in his equipment, which consisted of some one hundred or perhaps one hundred and forty oxen, and about ten large Schuttler wagons, each with a trailer, and both having a capacity of six to eight tons of freight each, so that it was not uncommon for his outfit to transport five or six ordinary cars of freight at each trip, the trip occupying some twenty-five to thirty days in going and returning, and he had the reputation of always delivering the goods and delivering them in good order, both qualifications being conducive to steady employment and financial gain.

COUNTY ORGANIZATION—THE LAW—HUGHES COUNTY

The territorial law on the subject of county organization was explicit and left nothing to conjecture. The delays in securing county organization were first complained of late in 1880, and Hughes County was the first to utter a protest. A delegate election was impending, the liquor law was being openly violated in the Town of Pierre, there was petty lawlessness prevalent and over one hundred and fifty legal voters in the county. The territorial law on the subject is here given:

Whenever the voters of any unorganized county in this territory shall be equal to fifty or upwards, and they shall desire to have said county organized, they may petition the governor, setting forth that they have the requisite number of voters to form a county organization, and request him to appoint the officers specified in the next section of this act.

Whenever the voters of any unorganized county in this territory shall petition the governor, as provided in the preceding section, and the said governor shall be satisfied that such county has fifty legal voters, it shall be the duty of the governor, and he is hereby authorized, to appoint three persons, residents thereof, county commissioners for such county, who shall hold their office until the first general election thereafter, and until their successors shall be elected and qualified.

The county commissioners of Yankton County waited upon Acting Governor Hland on the 28th of September and presented a formal request that he organize Hughes County. Under the law as it then stood all unorganized counties were under the jurisdiction of Yankton County, being the seat of the Second Judicial District, and Yankton County was put to considerable expense for arresting and trying their criminal cases. Considerable of this character had grown up in the disorganized situation in Hughes County, hence the commissioners desired its immediate organization. The acting governor informed the honorable commissioners that he could not organize Hughes County for the reason that when Governor Ordway left for Washington and for New England with his exhibit he made a special request that the county be not organized until he returned. While the acting governor was clothed with full authority to perform all the duties of governor, out of deference to Governor Ordway's request he declined to interfere. That reason would probably not have justified him in refusing had the matter been taken before a court or referred to the department at Washington.

The County of Hughes was organized in November, 1880, Governor Ordway appointing the Board of County Commissioners, consisting of William P. Ledwich, George L. Ordway and Joseph Reed.

The board held its first meeting about December 1st, and appointed H. E. Dewey, register of deeds; P. W. Comfort, sheriff; F. M. Allen, county treasurer; Ben C. Ash, assessor; Rev. William B. Williams, superintendent of schools; P. Frank McClure, surveyor; Isaac H. West, coroner; W. T. Bullard, justice of the peace; John Caldwell, constable.

TODD COUNTY TO NEBRASKA

The following is the full text of the bill introduced in the Senate by Senator Saunders, of Nebraska, for the annexation of a portion of Dakota Territory to the State of Nebraska. It was presented in January, 1880. It marked the beginning of the legislation which ended a few years later in the loss to Dakota of its old pioneer County of Todd, embracing an area of about six hundred square miles:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That when the Indian title to all that portion of the Territory of Dakota lying south of the forty-third parallel of north latitude and east of the Keya Paha River, and west of the Missouri River, shall be extinguished, the jurisdiction over such lands shall be, and hereby is, ceded to the State of Nebraska, and the northern boundary of the state shall be extended to the said forty-third parallel, reserving to the United States the original right of soil in said lands, and of disposing of the same; provided, that this act shall not take effect until the President shall declare, by proclamation, that the Indian title to such lands has been extinguished; nor shall it take effect until the State of Nebraska shall have assented to the provisions of this act.

The legal voters of the State of Nebraska, at a special election held for the purpose, voted affirmatively on this proposition, which we should have stated was passed by Congress, and Todd County, Dakota, became a portion of Leau qui Court County, Nebraska.

GRANTING THE INSANE HOSPITAL LAND

At the session of Congress in June, 1880, an act was passed granting to the Territory of Dakota the section of school land upon which the insane hospital had been built, and also reimbursing the schools by donating another section to take its place. Following is the law, and authorizes the only grant of land made to the territory, or rather comprised all the landed possessions the Territory of Dakota ever owned:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 36, in township number 56 north, of range 94 west, in the County of Yankton, Territory of Dakota, be, and the same is, hereby granted to the said territory for the purposes of an asylum for the insane; and that there be, and is hereby, granted to said territory one section of land, in lieu of said thirty-sixth section, for school purposes; said section to be selected by the governor of said territory from any of the public lands subject to private sale or entry. Such selection, when so made, shall be certified by the said governor to the surveyor general of said territory and to the officers of the local land office of the district in which such land may be situated; and from the filing of such certificate said land shall be withdrawn from private sale or entry, and shall be held as a portion of the lands granted to said territory for school purposes.

The removal of the capital of the territory from Yankton was agitated after the election in 1880, and there seemed to be a general expectation that the Legislature, which would meet in January, 1881, would attempt to take some action in the matter. The agitation was not more formidable than the opposition, which came from the press and people in the Black Hills and in the "cow counties." It was evident, however, that the prevailing sentiment held that Yankton was too near the southern border for the capital, and that its removal would be demanded just as early as another point more central could be agreed upon.

One hundred families of Hollanders, direct from the old country, settled in Douglas and Charles Mix counties in May, 1882. They were largely farmers, prepared to buy land, and a superior class of people.

DEAF AND DUMB INSTITUTION

The private school for the education and care of deaf and dumb people was established at Sioux Falls in 1880 as a private enterprise and with a view of securing recognition by the territory. At that time Dakota's deaf and dumb were taken care of by the Iowa institution for that purpose, with whom the territory had made a contract under the law of February 28, 1879, which provided for the care and instruction of deaf, dumb and blind.

The school was started by Reverend Mr. Berry and Miss Wright as principals and instructors, and was supervised by a board of directors selected from citizens of Sioux Falls, Mr. E. A. Sherman being president. In December, 1880, the directors with the active managers of the school held a meeting for the purpose of promoting the interest of the new educational institution, at which Mr. Sherman was chairman and Mr. Berry secretary. Mr. Berry had devoted much time to the teaching and caring of deaf mutes, and at the opening of this meeting made a brief statement of its purpose, which he declared to be the organization of an institution for the education of the deaf-mute children of the Territory of Dakota, in hopes that it might be taken up by the territory as a charge, and thus become one of the sixty-two public institutions of the kind in the country. Twelve pupils had already applied for admission. The territory was then paying to Iowa $5 per week for each pupil kept in that institution from the territory, and it was proposed to induce the Legislature, which would meet in a few weeks, to recognize an institution located at home. The immediate emergency Sioux Falls people were asked to provide for was the maintenance of the school at that place until such time as the Legislature could pass a law on the subject. The meeting took such action as was required to provide for the temporary support of the school by the selection of a committee made up of Sherman, Wright and Shaw to visit the business men of the city, and secure the pledges sufficient to provide the necessary funds. The mission of this committee was abundantly successful.

The officers of the Sioux Falls institution had been chosen with a view of enlisting the co-operation of the various sections of Dakota, as will be seen from its roster, as follows: President, E. A. Sherman, of Sioux Falls; vice president, Newton Edmunds, Yankton; secretary, E. G. Wright, Sioux Falls. The board of trustees, including the above names, were: C. A. Lounsberry, Bismarck; O. S. Gifford, Canton; Rev. G. C. Pennell, Deadwood; John O'B. Scobey, Brookings; Vale P. Thielman, Parker; Charles K. Howard and Amos F. Shaw, Sioux Falls.

At the legislative session of 1881 an act was passed declaring "That the deaf and dumb school now in successful operation at Sioux Falls be and the same is hereby declared the Territorial School for the Education of the Deaf Mutes of the Territory." The law provided for the payment, by the territory, of $5 a week for each pupil in actual attendance; and it also made the law of 1879 a part of the act of 1881, thus providing a code of procedure for obtaining admission to the institution as a pupil.

RAILROAD BUILDING IN 1880

The aggressive disposition of the Dakota railway kings was manifested early in 1880. At this time Mr. James J. Hill, manager of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Lines, came quite prominently into the Dakota field in the northern part, while the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul appeared the most enterprising in the southern half. The Milwaukee company, then under Manager Merrill, in the spring, withdrew a portion of its forces from its other work in the territory and began the extension of its line west from Ortonville, Minn., into Dakota. Its rather abrupt action was interpreted as an emergency movement called for by the activities displayed by the Manitoba's lines along the Valley of the Lower Red River. To secure a strategic position in the Valley of the James River, now growing quite rapidly into fame, would seem to have been the object in view by both corporations, and both were aware of the value of having the first choice. The Milwaukee line was known as the Hastings & Dakota, and was projected to the James River, but at what point had not been named. Work on the line was energetically undertaken without delay, and it was rumored that it would also build in a northwest direction into the territory claimed by the Manitoba, reaching to the Northern Pacific.

On the other side the Manitoba had provided for extending its lines west of the Red River, and had purchased 240 miles of steel rails for that purpose. Regarding the reported extensions of the Milwaukee company, Mr. Hill was reported as stating that he had no reason to suppose that the Milwaukee company had any intention of invading the Manitoba territory.

"If they should develop such a purpose," he said, "we feel abundantly able to take care of ourselves. There is plenty of room in Dakota for the Hastings & Dakota to extend its lines, and it would not pay them to encroach on the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba territory, which our company has made every preparation to occupy. We have 20,000 tons of steel rails, but where they will be put down will depend somewhat upon circumstances."

The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company were doing a large amount of work in Dakota Territory, more than any other one corporation, though a number were pushing their highways through the territory. The Milwaukee company had about twelve hundred men employed on about three hundred miles of road. Owing to emergent conditions, believed to have been connected with the aggressive movements of Manager James J. Hill, of the Manitoba system, the Milwaukee's greatest activity was displayed on its Hastings & Dakota Branch west from Ortonville, Minn., to the James River, and branches therefrom. The Hastings & Dakota was being extended from the eastern boundary of the territory at Big Stone City due west for about one hundred miles to the James River, striking that stream about one hundred miles south of the Northern Pacific Railroad. Twelve miles west of Big Stone a branch line, called the Whetstone Branch, was being built in a northwesterly direction up the Valley of the Whetstone River, and reached a point thirty miles from its starting point and about ten miles due west of Brown's Valley between Big Stone Lake and Lake Traverse at the close of the season. It was supposed this line was headed for the Northern Pacific and would entrench upon Mr. Hill's territory, and be apt to call for reprisals.

The grading on the Flandreau Line, from Flandreau to Sioux Falls, forty miles in length, was finished excepting some heavy cuts, but was not ironed entirely until the following year. The line west of Flandreau, known as the Southern Minnesota Division, was being pushed, and was graded forty-five miles to the Vermillion River. Work on this company's line west of Mitchell was in progress, but not energetically pushed. This line was located to the Missouri, and surveys had been made for a distance of seventy miles west of the Missouri pointing to the Black Hills, where work was stopped owing to objections made by the Indians. Mr. John Lawler and the chief engineer, Kimball, were with this Black Hills party. They proceeded to the Rosebud Agency, where they were able to make peace with Spotted Tail's people and arrange for continuing the survey. But Mr. Lawler was not encouraged to believe the company was doing a wise thing in building the line. He afterwards stated that from a point fifty miles west of the Missouri River to Spotted Tail's agency and beyond he would not build a wheelbarrow track for all the traffic the country could afford, even if the Indian title were extinguished, and stated his belief that his company would be doing a foolish thing to build beyond the Missouri. He said the country was a barren waste, devoid of timber, with water and grass not abundant.

The Milwaukee also built what has been known as the Elk Point Cut-off, in Union County, a short line connecting the Yankton line with the Sioux Falls line at a point on the Big Sioux called Westfield, which was a stroke of economy and shortened the Yankton and Sioux Falls journey a number of miles.

The Southern Minnesota Railway was completed to Madison, Lake County, December 21, 1880. The grain elevators along its line were overloaded and the road was unable to furnish sufficient cars to carry away the grain to market.

The Grand Forks Extension of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railroad had for its objective point Fort Buford, on the Missouri, in 1880.

The Casselton Branch of the Northern Pacific was completed to Blanchard, on the north branch of Elm River, in 1880, thirty miles north of Casselton, and trains were run to that point. The extension from that point to Mayville, on Goose River, eleven miles, was graded and the track laid in the spring of 1881. From Mayville the line had been located for a distance of forty miles to a point on Salt River, forty miles west of Red River.

The Dakota Railroad Company was organized at Bismarek for the construction of a narrow gauge railroad from Mandan to Deadwood. A preliminary survey was made of the proposed route in the winter of 1880-81. The distance between the termini was found to be 230 miles and the highest grade fifty-two feet to the mile.

MANDAN AND BEYOND

The extension of the Northern Pacific Railway west of the Missouri River involved more than the building of a great commercial highway to the Pacific, though that enterprise absorbed all of the public interest. It involved the more particular and definite exploration of a new region of our country concerning which not much was known, and that only in a general way. The resources of a vast empire of the Northwestern domain were to be tested, and the question answered from actual knowledge whether the natural resources of the land were such as to invite their development by a highly civilized and enterprising people. We gather from a sketch of the country, which appeared in the Bismarek Tribune in the spring of 1880, a very satisfactory picture of Mandan and the country west to the Yellowstone, with mention of its fossil treasures and something reliable about the mysterious "Bad Lands," pronounced by the highest scientific authority as the most valuable and interesting geological field in the world. The sketch follows:

Mandan as a community has but a brief historical record, but if in future ages some scholar shall arise who can interpret aright the traditions of a rapidly disappearing aborigine it will be found that this locality for ages has been peopled. The site is thickly strewn with the debris of broken pottery, and several mementoes of the Stone Age in the form of arrow and spear heads, and at least one fine specimen of a stone hammer has been found. Mandan is beautifully located in the fine Valley of the Heart River, one and a half miles from the Missouri River, surrounded by fertile meadows and protected on the south by a heavy growth of cottonwood, and buttressed on the north by a partial environment of high, bold bluffs.

It was in the fall of 1878 that the few settlers who had crossed the Missouri and made a scattered community extending along the great river from Fort Lincoln on the south to Square Butte on the north met and organized the County of Morton. In that organization Messrs. F. T. Girard, Elijah Boley and William Nordstrom were appointed county commissioners and George Harmon sheriff, and the county was launched. The commissioners selected a quarter section of Government land, on the plateau one mile north of the village, for county seat purposes, and gave it the name of Mandan. The following winter the Northern Pacific awakened from its long slumber and commenced extending its line westward towards the Yellowstone. It selected the site of the present village for the location of its depot, roundhouse, warehouses, etc., and it being on a railroad section, a town was laid out and called also Mandan. In February of 1879, General Rosser laid the track from Bismarek across the river on the ice, and erected the railway boarding house near where the depot now stands. This was the first building put up by the railway company on the townsite, though Major Mitchell, F. H. Girard and Milan Harmon each had claim shanties on the south half of section 27, which now constitutes the townsite. Immediately after the construction of the boarding house the demand for city property became active. A number of enterprising Bismarek gentlemen purchased lots from the railway company, while quite a number of others, still more enterprising, occupied the most available business lots without going through the formalities of a purchase. At once the embryo city was the scene of the greatest activity. Buildings sprang into existence with magical frequency, and before the 1st of May, 1879, the new community counted more than one hundred buildings, and the demand was yet unappeased.

The magnificent Heart Valley stretches away to the westward, the stream being fringed with a magnificent growth of ash, oak and cottonwood for more than a hundred miles, or to the Bad Lands. Fort Lincoln is three miles to the south, westward of which lies the magnificent undulating plain locally known as "Custer Flat." This is as fertile a piece of land as can be found in the world, and is broad enough and long enough to furnish desirable homes for 5,000 families. North of Mandan is the beautiful Missouri Valley. Westward, for over one hundred and fifty miles, extends a country as attractive as the sun shines upon. Rolling prairies, drained by streams of pure, wholesome water, springs bubbling to the surface on every hand, groves of timber in all directions, and above all, the entire country, apparently, underlaid with an exhaustless supply of soft coal. In short, the country west from Mandan is all that could be asked for general agricultural and stock purposes.

In February, 1881, the former county organization having been abandoned, the governor appointed Elijah Boley, Lovett Gill and Michael Lary county commissioners, and the new Mandan was made the county seat.

One hundred and fifty miles west from Mandan commence the "Bad Lands," celebrated in story and in scientific reports, which extend from thence to the Yellowstone River along the banks of the Little Missouri. This unique country consists of a succession of immense, barren clay buttes, thrown together indiscriminately. For exclusive agricultural purposes the country is useless, but for the excellent grasses found in the valleys and protection for stock these lands will prove a blessing. Within their confines are found immense beds of coal, some twenty feet thick. Altogether it is fair to predict that there is enough of this fuel to warm all the settlers and their domiciles who are to people the broad prairies of Dakota for a century to come. Already a company had been organized and a coal mine opened thirty-five miles west from Mandan, called the "Baby Mine," with Mr. Thompson of Bismarck as superintendent. This mine, in 1879, took out and sold nearly fifty thousand dollars worth of coal.

LITTLE MISSOURI BAD LANDS

The graders of the Northern Pacific Railway through the western part of Dakota, particularly in that mysterious section called the "Bad Lands," found scores of petrified stumps of trees from six to eight feet in diameter. They were encountered in excavations, and removed with much difficulty by blasting. They were hard as adamant, and the blast broke off but a comparatively small piece. One large tree was found, one end of which had been petrified, while the other end had not been disturbed, but remained as the natural wood. The bark on many of the mammoth stumps resembled the pine tree bark, and the petrification the same, indicating that a magnificent pine forest had stood in the valley and had been destroyed by natural forces. In places impressions of leaves had been found in the clay forty feet below the surface. At another point, not on the line of the railway, found by a party of curiosity hunters, what appeared to be a sunken lake was happened upon that gave up a huge skeleton, having two horns, each twelve inches long on the end of its nose, and its jaw was nearly two feet long. The vertebra was of colossal size. Not enough was learned from an examination of the portion discovered to determine whether the animal had been an aquatic or a land animal. Two petrified turtles were also found by this party, weighing about seventy pounds each, and several turtle eggs, also petrifications, were collected. The Bad Lands were found to be a museum of wonders.

A description of this section of the Bad Lands was given out by one of a party who made an exploration of the world famous district during this time. We quote from one of his interesting letters:

The Bad Lands of the Little Missouri in the North Pacific country are about ninety miles long, twenty miles wide, a hundred or more feet deep, and the most wonderfully beautiful country that I ever beheld. Two-thirds of the surface of the country is covered by clay buttes of all shapes and sizes, and from one hundred to one hundred and fifty feet in height, the tops of the higher ones being on an exact level with the plains. The sides of the buttes present all the colors of the rainbow, besides many soft, neutral shades. Masses of rock, varying in size from a market basket to a good sized church, and assuming shapes so fantastic that many times one is in doubt as to what they are, crop out at irregular intervals. Some of these are a vivid red in color, others of a light blue; in fact, the entire chromatic scale is being executed in endless succession, and in tones that never die away. The tops and sides of these rocks are draped with running cedars—a beautiful evergreen creeper, and where, as is often the case, twenty or thirty of them in a huddle appear upon a distant hillside, resembling in every particular an equal number of Sioux Indians, dressed in all the pomp and panoply of new blankets, thirsting for blood and hair, and only deliberating as to whether the travelers below would be better stewed or fried, there is an interest added to the wonderful panorama that it would otherwise lack. Many of the hills are covered with small pieces of talc, a substance resembling mica in appearance, though it fails to stand the test of fire, that are bright as the diamond, and when the grand illumination takes place in the morning there is a scene presented of such transcendent beauty that the beholder can only gaze and wonder. Words are as inadequate to describe what is there to be seen as to satisfy the cravings of a hungry man.

The theories attempting to account for these remarkable phenomena are numerous, but whether any of them will be sustained by more exhaustive research than has yet been made remains to be seen. The most popular is that what are now the valleys were originally filled with coal, which, at some remote period, became ignited and burned out. There are coal mines now burning and have been since anything was known of this locality, one of which

I saw, and there are many veins of coal exposed along the banks of the Little Missouri. But there are evidences of volcanic action, too, and that of water also, though what share of the work each has performed, and at what time, remains for the geologist to ascertain. It will make little difference to the nonprofessional sightseer, however, whether the present condition of the Bad Lands is accounted for or not. They are there in all their strange wild beauty, and when the railroad is completed to the Little Missouri this strip of country will take rank among America's wonderfuls, second only to the National Park and the Yosemite Valley. The valleys in the Bad Lands are accounted as good grazing lands as there are in the West. The grass is rich and abundant. Water plenty, and the blizzards that rage above at times are only as a tale that is told. Here it is possible to have an ideal farm.

The records of settlement and development of other territories and states furnish no precedent that can be cited that will compare with the active conditions that prevailed throughout Dakota from 1878, increasing with accelerating speed during the seven years following, caused by the incoming of tens of thousands of people each year, and this immigration supplemented by the advent of railways across the Eastern Dakota border and their eagerness in laying their iron highways through to the Missouri River, and by a corresponding aggressiveness to obtain control of contiguous territory by extending their lines north and south along the valleys of the principal tributary streams. This situation was remarkable as covering the entire territory north as well as south.

The year 1880 must ever remain notable because of the progress made in railroad building in the territory, because of the abundant wheat harvest, particularly in the northern counties, and because of the heavy immigration to all sections. New communities were formed by the score and new counties organized. The steamboat traffic on our navigable rivers showed an increase over preceding seasons, and the James River from Columbia, Brown County, to Grand Rapids, LaMoure County, was equipped with craft propelled by steam, carrying passengers and freight to settlements along the 120 miles between these points.

The winter of 1880-81 opened October 15th, 1880, with an unprecedented storm of snow, which assumed the magnitude and fierceness of a blizzard. It lasted about twenty-four hours, its only redeeming feature being that the temperature was not dangerously cold, though the Big Sioux, Vermillion and James rivers were frozen over. Railroad traffic was tied up by the heavy snow, which had drifted into and filled many of the cuts, and the telegraph lines were badly injured, caused by the weight of the damp snow, which clung to the wires in heavy masses and bore them to the ground. Live stock suffered severely, thousands of head being out on the prairies at the time, and the work of threshing was then under way all through the territory. A foot, and in some places more, of heavy snow fell. The storm extended to Crow Creek and to the Upper Sioux and was general in Western Iowa and Minnesota. Work on the unfinished railroads in Dakota was stopped, and the Milwaukee was prevented from reaching Chamberlain with its track during the fall because of the demoralizing effects of this storm and the unfavorable weather which followed for a number of months. The winter proved the longest and by far the most rigorous of any wintry season recorded in the annals of Dakota Territory. There were intelligent Indians then living at the Yankton Agency who had been born in this Upper Missouri Valley seventy-five and eighty years prior to this event who could recall no occurrence of such a wintry visitation during October. Heavy storms and destructive blizzards had been known late in the spring, but the rule for October, and even November, had been pleasant and autumn weather. It was a widespread and an unusually heavy storm even for midwinter, and the snowdrifts in the towns were of such prodigious size and extent as to blockade the streets and walks, and wagons and carts were employed to remove the immense accumulations before team traffic could be resumed and the thoroughfares made passable for pedestrians. Railway trains and telegraph lines were a week or ten days repairing and resuming business in an orderly manner, but they were not permitted to enjoy immunity from the storm king for many days, and storm after-storm of the most damaging and disheartening character was the rule throughout the next five months. The snow that fell on the 15th of October did not melt only in part, but remained and was added to twentyfold before spring came.

There were a dozen steamboats out on their last trips to the forts and Indian agencies. The blast struck them in some instances in midriver, and they sought safety at the bank wherever they happened to be at the time. All these vessels had a trying experience, as none were equipped for any such visitation, but they came out without any broken bones or the loss of a man, though the wind at times was of sufficient force to have blown a man bodily from the deck had one exposed himself.

These were the conditions under which the inhabitants of Dakota and the people west of the Mississippi and north of Southern Iowa were introduced to the winter season of 1880-81, and from that time forward for nearly six months winter reigned, not mildly but boisterously. The snow that fell in October remained to the end of the winter season. Railroad travel and traffic was interrupted by this first storm, snow plows were required to clear away the accumulations in the cuts, and thereafter snowstorms were of such frequent occurrence that there was barely a week for half a year when the roads made their schedule time, but there were many weeks when traffic and travel by rail was entirely suspended, and this was the rule throughout the region west of the Mississippi and north of the forty-second parallel of latitude.

Dakota had been receiving many thousands of new settlers during the year and many thousands the year before who had made but scanty improvements on their claims, but sufficient for an ordinary winter. New lines of railroad had been extended across the territory in 1880, and scores of new towns founded into which thousands of people had settled and were living in cramped and exposed quarters, altogether unsuitable for any sort of comfort in winter. And the railroads had not yet shipped in the winter's supply of coal or other fuel, so that this essential was one of the earliest "necessities of life" that was discovered to be lacking. Train loads of fuel were on the tracks, bound for Dakota, but snowbound and unable to move; and it was later claimed that some trains thus laden lay for months buried in drifts on side tracks, and that human power was inadequate to remove them. The ordinary autumn season would have given good weather for at least a month or six weeks longer, but this early October visitation placed an embargo on railway transportation from the start, which was only temporarily relieved until the warm weather of spring brought relief accompanied by a mighty flood that covered the territory with a deluge of water and ice.

Under the law, or the rules, of the Land Department a person taking up public land was allowed six months from the time of filing to make improvement and settlement. Immigration was very brisk in the spring and summer of 1880, and a large proportion of the newcomers, aware of this privilege, left their families at their abodes East, came out, selected and filed upon their claims, and then returned East to return with their families and household effects in the fall. But the early arrival of winter disconcerted their plans; they found themselves unable to make any adequate preparation for occupying their claims during the winter. The rigors of the season, in the fall of 1880, would have prevented their erecting suitable living places and making other necessary improvements, but added to this was the difficulty of procuring building material, and especially the procuring of fuel, owing to the interruption of railway traffic caused by the untimely snows. Thousands who had begun improvements were obliged to stop work with their buildings only partially completed. In the face of these difficulties resort was had to the Government and an extension of time secured which gave to bona fide settlers ample time in which to provide suitable accommodations on their claims.

The heavy snows that followed the severe storm of October had by the close of the year so demoralized traffic on the railway lines west of the Mississippi River that time tables had become practically ignored, and the railway people in charge of the operating departments of the lines frankly let it be known to the public that shippers and passengers must understand "That time was no longer the essence of any contract they made for the delivering of freight or passengers at their destination." In many cases the railway people advised the abstaining from travel. By the close of December the supply of coal throughout this western country was so nearly exhausted that corn was substituted. Sioux Falls had been practically cut off from the world for weeks when the close of the year came. It was related in one of the local papers, December 20th, that "the train started out from Sioux Falls for Sioux City with Master Mechanic Moulton aboard, and with a supply of corn for fuel, but on reaching the cuts four miles below the town it encountered a snowdrift 400 feet long which it found impossible to 'buck through,' and the effort was given up and the train returned to the falls."

At Yankton, about the same day, the engine was equipped with fifty bushels of corn for fuel and the train ran to Elk Point, where there was a limited supply of coal. Fortunately the road from Yankton to Elk Point was laid almost entirely upon a grade three or four feet higher than the bottom lands through which it was located, and drifts found no abiding place. At this time the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul issued a general order that for the time being, and until further notice, the running of all trains west of Mason City, Ia., was suspended.

This condition existed in Minnesota, Iowa, Dakota, Nebraska, and for that matter throughout the Northwest. It was a winter unprecedented in heavy and frequent snows and cold weather. Tens of thousands of range cattle perished. After the first heavy storms the roads were cleared, but were easily blockaded by another snowfall even of moderate amount. Conditions which, in a milder manner, occur every snowy winter prevailed in an aggravated form in 1881. This was caused by the frequency of the storms, which filled the railway cuts and made the wagon roads almost impassable for animals. In the railway cuts the snow would be shoveled clear of the track on each side, and frequently it occurred that the tracks were no sooner cleared, and often while the work of clearing them was in progress, another snowstorm would break loose that would cover the tracks sufficiently to stop traffic. This frequent clearing of the tracks piled the snow banks higher on each side, and it was not an unusual occurrence, later in the season, when trains began running, for the passenger to find the train plunging into what appeared to be a tunnel, the snow banks having grown to be higher than the car roofs so as to shut out the light.

One of the most severe of the winter storms came on the 7th of February, 1881, and continued thirty-six hours and in some sections forty-eight hours. It embraced the entire territory. All the railways in the territory, including the Northern Pacific, were so covered with drifts in the cuts along the lines as to compel a suspension of traffic.

At Fort Sully, and in a large scope of country in that section, the snowfall reached a depth of four feet; at Pierre and east at least three feet. From thence south the depth of snow fell off, but was fully eighteen inches deep in the extreme southern region. This storm, following such prolonged severe and stormy weather, appeared to completely discourage the railway companies, and nearly all abandoned their efforts to clear their tracks. In many cases ice had formed over the track and snow plows were ineffectual to clear them.

The railroad blockades were so prolonged that in some cases the employes at the stations, having no employment, were temporarily suspended.

These conditions prevailed until March, 1881, when the Missouri River, the Big Sioux, Vermillion and the James broke up and the great flood came. The prairies were then covered with from two to four feet of packed snow, the melting of which rapidly filled the rivers and creeks. The season was early in the Upper Missouri country. The river was open above Fort Buford two weeks earlier than on the southern border of the territory. This early opening of the river had been observable at points all along below Buford for several hundred miles, and wherever a mountain river debouched into the Missouri it came freighted with ice and tumbling along with torrential force.

Information from Fort Buford under date of the 6th of March, 1881, stated that at that point the Missouri River had risen twenty feet, and was still rising. The information from that point added that this freshet from the extreme north-west will force the ice and inundate the country, if the warm weather continues, for the snow is from four to five feet deep and thawing rapidly.

The early floods came before the ice in the Missouri River gave way. They were caused by the partial melting of a portion of the surface snows in the Missouri Valley, including the mountain or Black Hills tributaries. These tributaries poured immense volumes of water on to the icy surface of the Missouri before there were any substantial indications of a break-up. The reports of an early break-up in the upper country grew from these melting snow-floods. There was no ice accompanying these early floods. This phenomenon was observable in all the streams, and the extraordinary thickness and strength of the ice enabled it to resist the weight of water passing over it for a week or more. The surface of the rivers was also the bed of a heavy coating of snow that had accumulated during the winter. The Missouri had been rising several days before the "break-up," and had inundated the adjoining lowlands in several places. It continued to rise, and on the 24th of March had reached the Dakota Southern Railroad tracks along the Missouri bottom lands, and at a few points covered the tracks between the Big Sioux and James rivers.

It will not be necessary to enumerate the several bridges that were swept away by the flood. Nearly every structure of this kind south of the forty-fifth parallel, whether railroad or wagon bridge, was totally destroyed or so badly injured that they afforded no assistance in crossing the streams. And this feature of the destruction will, better than anything else, indicate the widespread nature of the disaster. It tells us that every tributary, as well as every river from our eastern to the western boundary, became a raging torrent when the break-up came in the spring and for a time poured destruction upon everything in its path. Shut off from the outside world by these incidents of the flood, a great portion of the people on the verge of starvation, with little clothing and none whatever except that they were wearing; exposed for weeks to a severe wintry atmosphere, their homes a wreck, and their household goods that had not been swept away a mockery of comfort; without beds or bedding, flour or meat, a kindly Providence bore them through, and they learned a lesson from adversity that they have never ceased to remember.

Fort Thompson and the Crow Creek Agency escaped the ravages of the flood, and Chamberlain was only slightly affected by it.

At White Swan, opposite Fort Randall, the river broke on the 25th, and ran for an hour when it gorged below. The water then came over the banks, and ice then came with it so abundantly that before many of the settlers were able to get out of the valley the water flooded their wagon boxes. They all happily reached the hills alive, but their live stock, buildings and household fixtures were largely destroyed and swept away.

Nearly all the cattle used in freighting from Pierre to Deadwood perished. The Black Hills for a time were entirely isolated. On the Pierre route a stage left the Cheyenne Crossing and became lost for sixty-five hours. Another stage was twenty-nine hours making nineteen miles, and was then obliged to abandon its trip and return to its starting point. These incidents, with scores of others, were due to the heavy and frequent snows, which had obliterated every vestige of a highway, and animals were unable to make any headway and as a rule refused to make the effort.

There was no section of the territory where the flood worked such disaster as on the wide bottom lands bordering the Missouri between Yankton and the Big Sioux River, a distance of nearly sixty miles. There were no bottom lands of equal extent elsewhere in the territory, but all the lowlands—those at Greenwood (Yankton Agency), White Swan and the new Town of Pierre; the lowlands in the Apple Creek Valley and other bottom lands near Bismarck—were all inundated and their improvements as a rule destroyed.

On March 28th an ice gorge formed below Vermillion, and the water rose rapidly and began to flood the city before nightfall. The entire town was flooded in less than an hour. The people fled to the highland, leaving their homes and business places. Great damage was done to household goods and goods in the stores. The water rose to about four feet on the 28th, and remained stationary for some time.

At Yankton the river broke up about 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the 28th. There were a number of steamboats at the levee at Yankton, where they had passed the winter, and their owners anticipating a lively time when the break-up came, had made preparations for the event and taken all the usual precautions. The heavy ice which covered the river was the chief cause of any apprehension felt for the safety of the boats; there was therefore considerable alarm felt when but a few minutes after the ice began moving a heavy cake struck the steamboat Western near her stern and opened a hole in her about twenty feet long through which the water poured into her hold. All the men that could work at the pumps were set to work hoping to keep the water down until the fissure could be closed and the boat moored nearer shore; but this could not be done. The water poured in much faster than the pumps could take care of it, and in the course of an hour the boat settled down, her stern going to the bottom of the river, her bow being partially out. All the movable property on the boat was taken out and removed to the Government warehouse. The machinery could not be reached. The hull would be a total wreck and could not be raised.

At Vermillion the destruction was most complete. The city contained a population of six or seven hundred, and about one hundred and fifty dwellings, hotels, churches, banks and business houses. The town had been built on rather a narrow strip of the Missouri bottom land, just under the highland where the present substantial city is established. The flood with its moving ice attacked the city about midnight of March 27th. A grove of trees west of the city obstructed the ice for a time. The people were awakened by the alarm rung out by the bell of the Baptist Church, and not many minutes later the streets were thronged with many women and children, who had been hurriedly clad, all making their way to the road leading up the hill to the high land, some leading horses or driving cattle, with their arms full of clothing picked up in haste as best they could when leaving their homes. The alarm bell had been the agreed signal of imminent flood danger. Many of these refugees were unable to get ahead of the invading water and ice, and were compelled to wade through three feet of icy water in the darkness of midnight to reach the bluff road. The bluff was a steep one.

Conditions in and surrounding the town remained practically unchanged for the next three or four days, except that the water rose very gradually. The railroad tracks and even the depot platform were submerged. On the 31st the water had reached nearly to the roof of many of the smaller structures, and in the morning they began to float off their foundations. The growing trees on the west had kept the ice, in large part, from entering the town up to this time. During the 31st of March and following night forty structures floated away and dashed against the ice packs lower down the valley. A few people had entrusted their safety to the second story of two brick buildings, but the next day they were taken out of the second-story windows by rescuers and carried ashore in skiffs. For six days following the flood remained intact, raising and lowering alternately as the gorged ice below, extending now from two to ten miles in an icy sea, clogged up and then affording a temporary opening for a brief time, only to be again dammed up by the gorging ice floe. In the meantime the Vermillion people had been untiringly at work removing everything removable from the bottom to the highland, that is, everything they could reach through the flood of waters, but a large amount of property could not be recovered. Besides their only mode of transfer was a limited number of skiffs, which made the work slow and difficult. On the 6th of April the water again rose rapidly, the ice entered the desolate town, which yet contained a hundred or more of its best buildings; the Baptist bell again rang out its ominous and frightful clangor announcing new danger, and just about midday the procession of the buildings started—some steadily and majestically facing their fate, others tottering, partly tipped over, and in the course of a couple of hours fifty-six buildings were floated off or wrecked near their foundations, among these the St. Nicholas Hotel, the railroad depot and the Congregational Church. The Chandler House was moved and badly injured, but lodged near the bluff and successfully resisted the further efforts of the destroyer. Twenty buildings in stately processions, like swan, were observed floating off in one fleet. The scene was an imposing and exciting one, but those whose homes were being wasted and property destroyed did not then appreciate the grandeur of the tragedy that was being enacted before their eyes, nor the stupendous stage upon which it was being enacted. A house from Meckling, ten miles away, belonging to Mr. Paikhow, had come down to Vermillion in the flood in good condition, but was dashed against the gorged ice below and its fragments lost. There was one night during this long peril when a blizzard prevailed, making it impossible to row a boat or remain long exposed to the freezing blast. There was a note of despair in the voices of the suffering people when this dreaded visitor came and remained so long. The weather was uniformly uncomfortably cold all through the weeks of the flood. Extreme cold was not infrequent, and the most serious danger complained of by the rescuing parties was that of losing their lives by freezing. They were liable to get benumbed and fall asleep, which is the method which precedes the fatalities that occur during the blizzards. Captain Lavender, of Yankton, mentions an instance where he was obliged to spend one night with his men on an ice block owing to high winds, and it was with the greatest difficulty that he kept some from going to sleep. He whipped and pounded and threatened, and felt that he was about half frozen himself, while he was stamping about on the icy block and keeping his men moving without intermission.

The apparently miraculous delivery of hundreds of people from the jaws of death formed the topic of the current talk of the time, and volumes of thrilling stories could be made up from these experiences. They cannot be related here, but as an illustration of the imminent deadly danger that beset hundreds and possibly thousands of farmers' families who inhabited the river valley lands the experience of Ole H. Larson, wife and two children, H. J. Hanson and wife, and two children of Judge Bottolfson, of Clay County, will be an index to many others.

These people were at Hans J. Hanson's house, about ten miles above Vermillion, and had procured a skiff in which they were seated, when the house, with ten people in it, was lifted from its foundation and floated away. The occupants of the house were Hans J. Hanson, O. J. Hanson, their wives and children. After the house got started on its voyage the men folks, realizing their peril, made their way to the roof, where they built a large box to serve as a life boat in case of further emergency. The house moved along, but had settled nearly to the eaves when the life boat was finished and the ten passengers found places in it; and then, with much paddling, the passengers made their way to solid ground, contending with difficulties that can better be imagined than described. They finally found refuge in the house of Mr. Thompson, which had escaped the flood. The other party who were left in the skiff, with scant clothing and no food whatever, after hours of rowing about in the ice field, sought refuge on the roof of a partially submerged stable, not far from their starting point. Here they remained six long days and nights, exposed to the weather, their only food an uncooked chicken which they found in the stable, and raw beef taken from a drowned animal. The nights had been freezing cold. It was remarkable that they were found alive. A searching party discovered them the sixth day and carried them to a place of safety. They were all more or less delirious. They had at first expected that their plight would be discovered by some searching party, as they were quite conspicuous on the roof, but as the time passed and no sign of relief appeared they gave up in despair. They might not have survived another twenty-four hours.

Flood conditions remained over a large area of the overflowed country until early summer. There were cases where families, or a small group of settlers, had taken refuge in the more substantial buildings of neighbors, but made no preparation for a long stay, presuming the waters would subside in two or three days. Here, after the lapse of many days and weeks, provisions would give out and starvation stare the imprisoned people in the face. Relief parties were out searching for these isolated people, but it was slow and difficult work through the ice fields of the watery waste. And these places were most apt to be the most difficult to reach owing to the accumulation of ice around every building or other obstruction strong enough to resist the ice pressure.

Gunderson's mill, seven miles west of Vermillion, was a type of an isolated settlement. As late as the 25th of April parties had been unable to make their way to it owing to the heavy ice that obstructed every avenue; cakes of ice that stood up in great sheets ten or fifteen feet in height.

This mill was built on one of the highest points on the Missouri bottom, and was regarded as "floodproof." Near by on the same eminence were two farm houses, those of Thomas Thompson and Mr. Johnson. At the mill during the flood there were forty-two people, thirty-six in Thompson's house and forty-seven at Johnson's—125 in all. This was the number when Capt. Grant Marsh made his way into the settlement. They had been living for some time on flour only, with a very light diet of everything eatable that could be scraped up in the buildings they inhabited. The flood did not reach them, but all around them, for many miles they could witness the destruction of the farmers' homes and improvements, and the struggling herds of cattle, gathered upon every point that projected out of the water, only to be engulfed and swept away by a succeeding rise that covered their place of refuge. Tens of thousands of domestic animals were swallowed up in the icy waters, the farmers, without exception, maintaining some sort of a herd, from ten head to several hundred. The inundation had been so overwhelming and its later stages so abrupt and unexpected that there had been no opportunity to drive the cattle to higher ground, which in nine-tenths of the cases was miles away. Thousands of tons of hay were swept away, and it was a common remark later that there was not a spear of hay left "from the Jim to the Big Sioux." All around this high point of land in the neighborhood of Gunderson's the ice had grounded and piled up in great masses, similar to that which environed Meckling, and over the acres of this piled up ice there was no way of ingress or egress until Marsh made his way through with ropes, and with planks to span the chasms. Marsh finally broke a way through. He outfitted at Vermillion with provisions furnished by the flood sufferers of that place, and taking a steambow yawl, rowed across the overflowed bottom, striking ice banks some distance above the town; his party then dragged the yawl over the ice to open water, then rowed up about three miles to another ice gorge, where they abandoned the yawl and made their way over the ice to the mill, carrying the provisions to the half-starved prisoners. And as the people could not be removed, the captain returned to Vermillion and obtained another cargo of supplies, which he succeeded in safely delivering, and which sufficed to keep the garrison alive until they were able to make their way back to their desolate homes, possibly or probably to find that everything they owned had been swept off or ruined. The subsidence of the flood left the bottom lands strewn with blocks of ice, in all dimensions, frequently four feet thick; the sloughs or low places filled with water and crossable only with boats; haystacks swept away, live stock drowned and floated off with the current, and over one-half the buildings wrecked or altogether destroyed. It was here, within the area of bottom lands, embracing a length of sixty miles, and from three to twelve miles in width, that the greatest ruin and desolation occurred, and it was here also that the flood, when at its height, presented a scene of grandeur at times appalling, that possibly has had no parallel since the Missouri Valley has been inhabited by human beings. Fortunately, there was no loss of life during the flood except the case of Mr. Ineh, near Gayville, the result of an imprudent attempt to relieve his cattle. The exposure of many women and children resulted in many cases in prolonged suffering and impairment of their health.

The big bend in the Missouri River a few miles above Vermillion was cut off by the flood of 1881, and the Missouri shortened just about seventeen miles. The peninsula formed by this bend was the largest on the river excepting the Great Bend, mentioned by Lewis and Clark, near Crow Creek. The land was in the form of an elongated ox-bow, very narrow at the points. Across its neck it was only half a mile, while to make the distance around by river it was eighteen miles against a stiff current. The new channel will save the steamboats eighteen miles, less a half. The cut-off left Vermillion about three miles north of the navigable channel of the river. The farm of Mons Nelson was situated near the line, or on the line of the cut-off, and where the channel cut across it took his barns, sheds and all his out-buildings, and a dwelling house nearly new. Nelson had a large number of cattle, a portion of which gathered on a high point that lay right in the path of least resistance from the flood that was rapidly eating its way across the narrow neck. An observing party had gathered on the Nebraska bluff opposite and was watching the ravenous work of the waters as they devoured the narrow strip in the neck of the bend. The small circle occupied by the cattle was right in its path, surrounded by a sea of water. But a little more than a few feet of land was left for a footing for the cattle when suddenly this disappeared as if undermined, and with a mighty crash dashed into the water, hurling the cattle with it, and they soon disappeared.

Meckling was a railroad station on the Dakota Southern Railroad, about seven miles west of Vermillion, four miles from the bluffs or highland, where a large community of farming people resided, and not more than fourteen miles from Yankton, where there were a number of steamboats and scores of men skilled in handling rowboats and pike-poles, and as someone remarked, "Though the condition of Meckling was known to the ends of the earth, yet all civilization could only stretch its hands in pitying sympathy without being able to reach them."

Many attempts had been made from Yankton with the best of boats, manned by the bravest of hearts under such indomitable commanders as A. W. Lavender, H. H. Smith, C. H. Bates, Charles P. Edmunds, E. C. Dudley, Abe Van Osdel, S. K. Felton and a number of the steamboat people, including Capt. Grant Marsh and a fleet of steamboat yawls, but they were turned back, unable to penetrate the barriers of ice that hemmed in the beleaguered people on every side, though some of these parties were able to learn that there was no actual destitution. Had there been, explosives, though regarded as dangerous under the situation, might have opened a channel and the people brought away. Meckling aptly illustrated the situation throughout the flooded country reaching from the Niobrara to Sioux City. Within a mile and a half of Meckling 1,600 head of cattle were lost. There were six lives lost due to the flood.

The people at Meckling were finally rescued about April 28th through the daring and indefatigable efforts of Capt. Grant Marsh, who had been doing heroic relief work all along the line, in the ice and water, for a month, and who finally resolved that Meckling must be reached and its imprisoned inhabitants relieved. The Meckling people had spent nineteen days in the second story of the elevator and in one or two other small buildings adjoining. There were 125 of them. They were taken off in yawls sent down by the steamboat people at Yankton. They were all comparatively well. This concluded the relief work of the noble army of volunteers, who had labored faithfully for a month, in the midst of peril and serious hardships, to search out the humble abodes of victims of the flood, until they had gone to every cabin or roof on the nearly half a million acres of land embraced in the inundated district.

The ice broke up in the Sioux River at Sioux Falls on the 20th of March, and following the water began rising, and in twenty-four hours gained a height of about sixteen feet above low water mark, the highest ever known. A torrent over five hundred yards wide ran through the town, flooding the basements of buildings on the west side of Phillips Avenue from Ninth Street north, compelling everyone north of the VanEps Block to remove their goods, and covering that section of the town for several blocks with from two to four feet of water. The flood extended to the bluffs or highlands on the east side of the river and washed away over thirty buildings. The Milwaukee Railroad bridge was washed away and the track badly damaged, as was the track and yards of the Worthington line. The Queen Bee Mill suffered $15,000 in damages. The lumber companies all lost heavily, the Oshkosh about twelve thousand dollars, and the Edwin Sharpe & Company, the A. A. Grout and the B. F. Roderick combined loss $21,000. Webber, Shaw & Watson, owners of the lower flour mill, lost their entire plant. It was all swept away. There were other losses, the whole aggregating about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. At Dell Rapids the bridge was washed away, and the mill seriously damaged.

This rise in the river above the falls occurred about March 25th, and swept away about one hundred buildings.

Three of the bridges across the Big Sioux at Sioux Falls went out within fifteen minutes. The upper wagon bridge, a new iron structure, was the first and went whirling down the flood and struck the lower wagon bridge, throwing it in the air, and then the combined wrecks dashed into the Pembina Railroad bridge, tumbling it from its foundation, and the three bridges floated away in company. The big bottom prairie just west of the town was at one time under ten feet of water, and the farmers and all persons living on these bottom lands had been compelled to seek safety from the flood in flight, so suddenly did the overflow come upon them. The farmers lost everything but their land and their lives. Many of them who possessed a small fortune in grain and live stock, buildings and improvements found themselves reduced almost to a beggarly condition. From the highland, buildings could be seen floating in the water, and others were submerged to the apex of their roofs. No human lives were lost but the people, refugees from the farms had sought shelter in the town which was already overcrowded and the people growing desperate over the growing scarcity of food supplies. It was claimed that the supply of staple articles was wholly exhausted. The merchants were out of sugar, coffee, syrup, oils, and candles, no vegetables of any kind, and a very low stock of flour for so many people. Stores had next to nothing that the people wanted to buy, and little attention was paid to storekeeping. A quantity of flour was stored in the Cascade Mill which could not be approached while the torrent of water and ice raged. And there was no relief in sight, for there was no way of getting out of the country nor any method by which relief could be sent in. The railroads were helpless. They were powerless even to help themselves. Their coal was exhausted. Their tracks and bridges destroyed, and two months or more must elapse before they could be ready to resume the running of any kind of a train.

The Sioux City and Pembina, from the former place to Canton was said to be in such a wasted condition that it would have to be rebuilt.

The farmers residing in the Big Sioux Valley had suffered serious losses in live stock during the winter; and when the river finally broke the valley was inundated and nearly all the settlers driven to the high lands. Much suffering and destitution prevailed throughout the valley.

The destruction of property in the Sioux Valley below Sioux Falls, extending through Lincoln County was immense. The flood came abruptly, and farmers were driven from their homes to the highlands suffering great loss of personal effects, including live stock. Nearly all the grist mills along the river were wrecked and every bridge was swept away. Much destruction followed owing to the inability of the people to get out to any market town, the highways having been practically closed by the destruction of the bridges. The only practicable method of traveling to any place for several weeks was either afoot or on horse-back.

Lower Canton was flooded and a number of buildings washed away or wrecked. The same conditions existed at Beloit across the Sioux. The river at Canton was 2½ miles in width for a time; the railroad grade was entirely destroyed and the ties with the rails spiked to them, floated off to the bluffs. The wagon bridges all through the County of Lincoln were destroyed or rendered impassable. Relief work was slow in reaching this section.

The Missouri River section, embracing a much larger field and thousands of needy had been the first to claim the attention of the authorities. Information regarding the desperate conditions in the Sioux Valley was tardy in reaching the outside world.

About the 20th of April the Sioux River broke up at Brookings or Volga, and above and in a brief time had inundated the valley. The railroad extension from near Brookings up the Sioux Valley to Watertown had been partially graded the previous fall. The culverts under the railroad embankment proved too small to accommodate the increasing flood of water from above, and channels were cut through the dirt to increase the culvert capacity. This was accomplished but the continued rise of the water forced its way through these channels washing away so much of the bank as to destroy it, and the result was that several miles of the track was left without support. The water covered the valley as far as the eye could see and formed a lake of remarkably large dimensions. The damage in that region fell upon the railroads largely, though many of the farmers were compelled to abandon their homes and remove to the higher land. East of Brookings similar conditions prevailed and farmers left their homes being compelled thereto by the inundation. There were miles and miles of the railroad embankment that was washed away and the rails and ties left suspended from the occasional points that withstood the flood. The Northwestern was badly crippled.

The Brookings Line was in the heaviest part of the storm of October 15th, and was blocked for several weeks, in fact was hardly free from blockade until the spring following. In the rough country near Lake Benton, cuts twelve feet deep drifted full and on a level with the snow fences in many places. And in a number of the cuts three tiers of platforms had to be built and the snow shoveled from one to the next higher, in order to clear the tracks.

A working party composed of 100 men left Huron for Pierre about March 1st, for the purpose of shoveling out the filled up cuts which had defied the efforts of snow plows, and had blockaded the road for weeks. The party was thoroughly equipped including explosives, to succeed with the task before it. The men dug their way through about one-half the distance to Pierre, and were then overtaken by storms and severe cold weather. There were no towns or relief stations on the line, and no settlers. The party ran out of provisions and the entire gang was reduced to one biscuit a day to each man. A rescuing party was then sent out from Huron and found the men in a perilous situation, but they succeeded in getting them back to Huron alive. Many of them had their feet and hands frozen to such an extent that amputation became necessary. It was then estimated that there was over two feet of snow covering the prairies of Dakota, all packed and solidified by occasional thaws followed by freezing, and the general opinion was that a serious flood would be experienced when the weather warmed up and the ice broke in the rivers and streams. No train was promised to reach Pierre from Huron before the first of April.

On the eastern end of the line a pitiable condition existed. At DeSmet the people were living on flour and potatoes, with nothing but hay for fuel. At Volga hotels and boarding houses were closed. Farther east, between Tracy and Sleepy Eye there was one cut where the snow was sixty-five feet deep, and a number that were covered from twenty to forty feet. There was no way by which these cuts could be cleared unless aided by warm weather and freedom from storms. The railroad company had abandoned the work in these large cuts as useless and were sending mails through on horseback and by teams where practicable, and were making every effort to get coal and provisions to the people imprisoned in the towns along the line. With the exception of the Northwestern, the roads in Iowa were blockaded.

At Huron there was a twenty foot rise in the James River when the break up came, and the bottom lands were flooded. The losses were comparatively light, largely in hay stacks. The melting snows along the Northwestern Railroad had softened the bank in many places. The railroad bridge was undermined on the west end by action of the water, but the damage was repaired by timely and skillful action. Huron, notwithstanding it endured much privation, was enabled to extend a timely helping hand to its neighbors, and was one of the fortunate localities in the deluged district.

The Northwestern was finally opened to Huron May 7th, but there were a number of bad places east of the town where an engine was not permitted to cross; the cars being pushed over, and taken along by a relay locomotive.

There had been much suffering and hardship endured during the winter by families living on their claims who came in the fall previous, and where provision had been made for nothing more than an ordinary winter season; but the acute stage of deprivation came later with warm weather in the spring and the breaking up of the heavy ice in the stream.

In the James River Valley the flood was disastrous. The ice was not a serious enemy, but the high water and its rapid current did the damage. One account will answer to illustrate what occurred in scores if not hundreds of instances. Peter Shearer, an early pioneer, had built a substantial sod and clay house, a story and a half, on Twelve Mile Creek, a tributary of the James in the northern part of Hutchinson County. He had accumulated much live stock, had a fine farm and was living comfortably. An ice gorge formed above his house in Twelve Mile Creek, and turned the channel of the stream, now a fierce torrent of ice and water, so that it flooded Shearer's premises. He managed to swim his live stock across to a high point and his family was taken off in boats to Milltown. The water continued to rise until it reached the top of the first story of Shearer's house, when the structure began to crumble as the walls were softened and weakened by the batterings of the ice pack against them. In a brief time the structure disappeared and became mingled with the flood; and little was left to mark the spot where it stood. All his outbuildings shared the same fate. There were hundreds of these sod and clay structures along the valley, and all that the high water reached shared a fate similar to Shearer's. Many Russian families were living in sod tenements and four-fifths of the large number of new settlers that had come in within a year or two, had used sod and clay more or less in furnishing a temporary domicile.

At Mitchell and the region round about, like conditions of lack of the necessities of life existed. Mitchell had had no trains from the East for weeks when the high water came. The flour mills at Rockport, Wolf Creek and one near Mitchell had been completely swallowed up in the flood, which at times covered the James Valley about Firesteel from bluff to bluff. Maxwell's Mill was badly damaged and could not be relied upon to work for a month. There was hardly a pound of flour in Mitchell; none whatever for sale. The people of Mitchell opened communication with Yankton and freighted away several trains of supplies during the six weeks that was required to put her eastern railway in running order.

At Forestburg, on the James River, at the crossing of the Southern Minnesota Railroad, the water covered the bottoms to the depth of eight feet. Forestburg was then the county seat of Miner County, and the courthouse was swept away, but the county records were saved. Other buildings suffered. The newspaper office, The Progress, was completely wrecked and so suddenly the disaster came that the editor could not escape from the building and sought refuge on the roof, where he constructed some sort of a raft and with its aid was able to make his way to high land. Major Brown who had a farm and substantial improvements seven miles above Forestburg had apprehended a flood because of the deep snows, and had built a boat which was barely completed when the flood came upon him and he hurriedly bestowed his family in the craft and pulled for the shore, which he safely reached. His dwelling, household goods, and barn were swallowed up in the flood. While the bottom lands were overflowed to a depth unprecedented in the memory of white or red man, along the valley south of Forestburg, the damage or destruction was much more moderate than above, though Firesteel lost a few buildings. At Milltown the entire population was driven in haste to the high points so abruptly and unexpectedly did the flood come upon them. No buildings were lost but considerable damage inflicted by the water. The grist mill, one of the best in the valley, was badly wrecked and had to be rebuilt.

The James River at Jamestown broke up about the 10th of April, and an ice gorge formed above the city; this held until a vast amount of water had collected, and when the ice dam broke a deluge poured down upon the valley below inundating the low lands and driving the people who had settled near the river from their homes in haste. Fortunately all such were comfortably cared for. A gorge also formed some distance below the city, and formed a lake of respectable dimensions. The bridges in that vicinity over the James were all damaged to such an extent as to be unsafe but the Northern Pacific bridge within the city was not at all injured. Mr. J. J. Thompson, occupying the McKechnie farm, two miles below the city, had remained at home during the rising of the water expecting that it would subside before reaching their domicile, but they became apprehensive for their safety when they beheld the entire farm overflowed and the water creeping into and upon the floor of their dwelling. Mr. Thompson then hitched up his team and with his wife started for town. A slough not far from the house lay in the path of retreat, but it was necessary to cross it, and Mr. Thompson drove into it to find that it could not be forded, his horses sinking and swimming. The wagon box in which the family was seated floated above the running rig, and serious thoughts occupied the mind of the occupants. But the horses were of good mettle, and kept on sinking and swimming until they finally reached the upper shore, safe and sound. Mr. Thompson lost a large amount of property as the result of the flood and the settlers along the valley for twenty miles were heavy losers.

The newly founded Village of Mandan, starting point of the Northern Pacific Railroad opposite Bismarck, was a victim of the flood's destructive quality. The town had been built on the bottom land or on the first low plateau above it, and received the full force of the flood of water and ice which poured into and through its streets flooding the surrounding country to the high points. Ice accumulations seemed to inflict the greatest damage. This was piled up in her streets rendering it almost impracticable to get about or through the town. The railroad company had piled up large quantities of ties and bridge timbers at this point which were largely carried off by the water.

Forty bridges between Mandan and the Bad Lands or western boundary of the territory on the Northern Pacific, were carried away or badly damaged. The wagon road bridges between Bismarck and Deadwood were swept off. Weeks elapsed before the Northern Pacific could operate trains west of Bismarck to the Yellowstone.

At Fargo, the Red River rose about fifteen feet flooding the lowlands. Here, the water covered the floors of a number of small buildings to a depth of four feet. The inhabitants of the premises escaped with slight loss. The Red River country did not suffer a great deal from the flood, especially that portion south of the boundary line.

Trains ceased running to Yankton on account of the flood, March 25th. From that date until April 23d, no eastern mail whatever was received. The telegraph line had also been out of use for the same time, and the line was not repaired until the last of May.

The mail service had been demoralized for many months, all through the stormy winter, all over the Northwest, before the flood, and when that crowning calamity came it practically isolated the Dakota settlements and towns from the outside world. For thirty days no mail, whatever, reached the settlements in the southern half of the territory. Sioux City was in a like condition. A mail reached Sioux City from Yankton on April 30th, by skiff and the newspaper in announcing the arrival, states that Postmaster Dorsey, of Ponca, Neb., and Mail Contractor VanAllen, of Green Island, and two Baptist divines accompanied the mail, and all came near capsizing on the way down. The Baptist divines, not having the fear of much water before their eyes, persisted in sitting on the side of the boat, and the skiff took in so much water that it was nearly swamped. This wet the big mail aboard, and when it came in about a thousand letters had to be untied and scattered around over the office, a letter in a place, to dry. This mail had seen much tribulation previously. It had been sent up to the Milwaukee road where it was erroneously reported that it was opened, and then went back to Yankton and to Sioux City by skiff. The steamboat, Niobrara that left Sioux City April 29th, took out over two tons of mail for Vermillion and Yankton. Among this mail was 118 sacks which had been brought to Sioux City from Sheldon, Ia., a few days before, a part of which was discovered to be a lot that was made up in the Sioux City office several months before and had been knocked about during the blockade, in unsuccessful efforts to get to Yankton. The steamboat, Niobrara carried the mail as freight for 45 cents per hundred pounds. The postal authorities had directed that steamboats be employed to carry the mail where practicable.

The running of trains was begun on the Hastings and Dakota Division (Ortonville), of the C., M. & St. Paul Line, west of Milbank, on May 15, 1881. This was the first run made over the fifty-seven miles west of Milbank. Construction on the remainder of the line to James River, at the mouth of the Elm, was in progress.

Track laying on the uncompleted lines of railroad was brought to a standstill owing to the lack of iron which the railways had been unable to transport.

Strike-the-Ree, chief of the Yankton Indians, testified at the time that he had lived on the banks of the Missouri since 1801, and he had never witnessed nor had he learned of any similar flood, so it could not have been known to his father or to his father's father, for Indians have a custom of transmitting an account of such calamities through many generations. The ice in the Missouri River had frozen to the depth of three feet and over forty inches in many places, and it averaged in thickness, as was observed during the flood, nearly thirty inches.

Strike-the-Ree sent the following letter to "the paper at Yankton that gives all the news":

Yankton Agency, D. T., April 5, 1881.

It is now some eighty winters that I have seen the snows fall and melt away along this Missouri River, but I never saw a winter of such snows and floods as these. It used to be that our ponies could eat the grass on the prairies all winter; but this year it is time all our wheat was in, and we can hardly see a spot of bare ground as large as your hand. And though the snow is still so thick, great floods come and destroy all that we have.

Long ago—forty years or more—there was a flood that overtook and killed a large number of Teton Sioux, but even then the flood was not as high as this. Here on the Yankton reservation the water seemed to burst up from beneath and covered the whole plain from bluff to bluff. Though the people fled to the hills and saved their lives, many lost all their property. Forty-three houses were taken away by the flood, with their stoves and other household goods; also stables, haystacks, cattle, horses, cut logs, steamboat wood, mowers, plows and other farming implements.

As I looked upon the women and children, struck by this great calamity, my heart was moved, and I prayed thus: "God have mercy and look upon me. Look with mercy on these women and children. Give us a way—good, broad and straight—by which they may live."

Then I looked, and saw a way; two men were standing in it. One was the President, and the other his second. They came stretching out their hands to me. And with them there were cattle, and wagons, and plows, and reapers, and threshers, and rakes, and hoes, and pitchforks, and seed wheat, and garden seeds of many kinds. I said: "If this be true, these children will yet be filled and live. They will go to school and be wise and great."

STRIKE THE REE,

Head Chief of the Yankton Sioux.

Spotted Tail, chief of the Brules, stated that there was nothing in the traditions of the Sioux Nation, or in the recollection of the oldest people of the tribe, going back practically to the beginning of the century, that could recall a winter as severe as that of 1880-81. Among the Indians Dakota had been famed for its moderate winters, and they had never been accustomed to make any provision for feeding their ponies which subsisted the year round on the nutritious buffalo grasses of the plains, that in the fall would cure on the ground and furnish fine pasture for the winter. But the snows and thaws of this winter had been so severe that the ponies could not dig through them and reach the grass.

It is not surprising that the great heart of the country was moved to benevolence as soon as the story of this calamity reached it. All through the long winter, the more fortunate communities of the territory, residing in the towns and small settlements had been more or less engaged in relief work, and in many cases their resources had become seriously impaired when the great flood came in the spring. Thus cut off from all possible intercourse with the source of supply, the situation was for a long time a perilous one.

The Produce Exchange of New York City became active in securing funds for Dakota's flood sufferers. Governor Ordway was not in the territory during the winter, but at Washington. He visited New York City when he learned of Dakota's disaster, and set to work to raise $100,000.

The Chicago Board of Trade took action and appointed a committee to solicit aid for the Dakota flood sufferers.

Railroads, as soon as they were in condition to run trains, gave out that they would transport all relief supplies free of charge. Bishop Clarkson, of the Episcopal Diocese of Nebraska set to work in Omaha and raised $1,000 in cash in less than one hour, and large contributions of provisions and clothing.

About March 1st the acting governor received advices from Watertown that the inhabitants were out of fuel and provisions owing to the long continued snow blockade on their only railroad. The advice came by wire from a relief committee. The executive telegraphed the C. & N. W. R. R. people at Chicago, and suggested that if they could not clear the track, they relieve the people by wagon trains. The railroad people, in reply, suggested a way of partial relief; that the Watertown people had flour and groceries but no meat, and that they could get wood at Yellow Banks and Goddards by going after it. The president of the road, Mr. Hughitt, admitted that the line was so solidly blocked with huge drifts of snow and ice that the opening of it would not be practical until warmer weather.

The United States Government began issuing rations of flour and bacon to the destitute, through military channels, about the first of April. The central point of issue from the southern part of the territory and Northern Nebraska, was at Yankton, where Capt. D. Wheeler, commissary and quartermaster, superintended the issue. Fifty-seven men, forty-six women, and thirty-five children at Green Island, Neb., opposite Yankton drew rations. Twenty-five thousand Government rations had been distributed up to April 27th, and this exhausted the Government's donation; but the Chicago Board of Trade had given General Terry, who was in command of this military district, $1,500 to continue this feature of the relief work, which trust he faithfully discharged. Clothing continued to be issued by the Government, each needy person receiving two shirts, two pairs of drawers, a pair of pants, shoes, blouse and blanket.

Two tons of tents, blanket and clothing, were sent up from Fort Leavenworth by order of General Terry for the needy in Dakota, Iowa and Nebraska.

Capt. John J. Clague, U. S. A., who had been making an enumeration of the losses sustained because of the flood in the sections of Dakota most seriously affected, under orders of General Terry, reported the following estimates: Union County, $30,000; Clay County, $450,000; Yankton County, $140,000; at East and West Pierre, $51,000; damage to steamboats at Yankton and above, $50,000; damage to the C. M. & St. Paul railways, $90,000. In the Clay County estimate the damage by the loss of Vermillion Village was $140,000. Green Island, opposite Yankton, was not included, but was estimated at $60,000. Within a radius of two miles of Meckling, 1,250 head of cattle and 125 horses perished. No indirect damages were included.

That there were still a number of buffalo on the Dakota plains was proven during the winter, where the heavy snows had so covered the grass on the feeding grounds that the animals were obliged to seek shelter and food so near the settlements and military posts that their capture alive had been an easy matter. They appeared to have been much enfeebled by a long fast. Grave fears were entertained for the cattle on the ranges which depend on the buffalo grass for their winter pasturage. Montana live stock men early predicted that the losses of range animals would be unprecedented, and the same was true of Wyoming.

The Dakota Southern Railroad throughout its entire length from Yankton to near Sioux City was a wreck. The grade had softened and washed away, leaving the rails engulfed in mud and water and forming a sinuous track, in many places for miles. The road required rebuilding in part, and one span of twelve miles from Yankton to Gayville was entirely rebuilt over a new grade on an improved road.

Dead animals encumbered the bottom lands to such an extent that the stench from the decaying carcasses threatened the health of the people, and an organized and systematic plan was adopted by county authorities to bury the carcasses.

Sioux City people lost heavily from high water, which invaded two or three squares next to the river, filled the basements and clogged the sewers. The river was said to have been eight miles wide at that point about the 25th of March.

Notwithstanding the unprecedented disaster a very few weeks elapsed after the danger was passed before immigration set in and swelled to a greater volume than during the previous year. The railways were almost "swamped" by this traffic before their lines were thoroughly repaired. So active, prolonged and general was this volume of immigration, that Dakotans apparently had dropped all remembrance of the flood, for it was seldom referred to after the relief business ceased to attract attention.

Seed for planting was in great demand from the drowned out people, when they were able to get back to their farms.

The calamity passed, leaving many scars in the form of ruined homes and wrecked fortunes, with a number of instances where the privation and hardship and worse—the starvation—had left an indelible mark; still, memory could revert to many features of it with pride in the valor and heroism of so many of Dakota's sons, who at the first call, abandoned business and bravely dared the discomforts and hazards of the flood and ice to rescue the imprisoned thousands in the cabins and other structures scattered through the flooded district. Every community situated near the submerged area furnished its full quota of these, and held another in reserve. Elk Point, Vermillion and Yankton, Canton and Sioux Falls were conspicuous in the work because of wide devastation in the immediate valley of the Missouri and the Big Sioux, while the settlers along the James in Hutchinson and Hanson counties were greatly aided by a like intrepid spirit. The weather at times was extremely cold, the temperature at zero or below, particularly on the ice covered water, and cold raw winds swept over the sea thus formed, raising huge waves that threatened to swamp the small boats, and drenched the rescuers to the skin. An instance was related where a rescue squad was caught in a northern gale, intensely cold at nightfall, the sea around them so rough and threatening that they could not make the shore, and were obliged to abandon their boat and seek refuge on an ice pack, hauling their craft "ashore" to preserve it from destruction. Here the party passed the night, tramping, wrestling, beating one another, giving to each other encouraging words and blows to drive away the fatal stupor which precedes freezing, and which at times threatened every one of the band. The gale and the waves continued until the morning dawned, and then, nearly exhausted, they launched their boat and made their way to land, three miles distant, where some fuel was gathered and a season of thawing out and drying thankfully enjoyed.

VARIOUS ITEMS

In 1880 the business interests of the City of Vermillion shipped 402,784 pounds of Clay County made butter and 50,230 pounds of eggs, a gain over 1879 when she shipped 237,364 pounds of butter, and 43,060 pounds of eggs.

The credit of the Territory of Dakota was good throughout its territorial existence, and when the territory began issuing securities in 1879 to raise funds for her public buildings, its officials found no difficulty in getting purchasers, who as a rule offered premium for long time bonds drawing 6 per cent. The first issue of penitentiary bonds, at 6 per cent in 1881, sold for \$1.03 $\frac{1}{2}$ and \$1.03 $\frac{1}{4}$.

Sanford A. Hudson, of Janesville, Wis., was appointed to succeed Judge A. H. Barnes, as judge of the United States court in the Third Judicial District of Dakota. Judge Barnes had served eight years, and retired with honor. He had been endorsed for reappointment by the bar of the entire territory. Judge Barnes settled at Fargo.

Harrison Allen, of Pennsylvania, was appointed united marshal to succeed Butler B. Strang, who resigned the office shortly after reaching the territory. H. J. Campbell was reappointed United States district attorney. C. J. Palmer, of New Hampshire, was appointed assistant United States attorney, probably on the recommendation of Governor Ordway.

Judge Kidder was appointed judge of the Fourth District in 1879, and W. C. Church, of New York, was appointed associate justice of the First District to succeed Gideon C. Moody.

CHAMBERLAIN CITY

Chamberlain, the terminus of the Milwaukee Railroad on the Missouri River, was named for a member of the Milwaukee directorate. It is located at the mouth of American Creek, a small tributary of the Missouri, on a plateau overlooking the river, and about eighty feet above low water mark. It was located by the Chamberlain Land Company, presumed to be an auxiliary of the Milwaukee Railway Company. Mr. T. J. Stearns was the secretary of the company and the resident agent. The company had purchased 640 acres at this point which included American Island. The completion of the railroad to Chamberlain had been delayed several months by the rigorous winter of 1880-81, and the great flood which followed, the end of the track resting about twenty miles east of the river, and when the great flood came on, the road, for hundreds of miles east of its temporary resting place was dismembered by the loss of bridges and the undermining of embankments, so that nearly a year elapsed before forward work could be resumed on the uncompleted end. In the meantime a cargo of building material was shipped up by the steamboat, C. K. Peck, and a number of buildings erected, including a hotel, stores, and a newspaper plant for the Chamberlain Register. The population of the town when the railroad finally reached it in the summer of 1882, was about six hundred.

CHAPTER LXXXV
GOVERNOR ORDWAY AND THE LEGISLATURE

1881

THE NEW GOVERNOR FAVORED ONE STATE FOR THE ENTIRE TERRITORY—JAMES A. GARFIELD, PRESIDENT—LEGISLATURE GIVEN A SIXTY-DAY SESSION—MEETING OF THE FOURTEENTH SESSION AT THE CAPITAL—NAMES OF THE MEMBERS—ORDWAY'S FIRST MESSAGE—SESSION NOTABLE FOR VETOED BILLS WHICH WERE PASSED OVER THE GOVERNOR'S HEAD—PENITENTIARY PROVIDED FOR AND TERRITORIAL BONDS AUTHORIZED FOR VARIOUS PURPOSES—SESSION CLOSES WITH EVIDENCES OF HARMONY—ORDWAY'S NOTABLE INTERVIEW IN WASHINGTON—CALDWELL'S REPORT OF AN ORDWAY INTERVIEW AT SIOUX FALLS—ORDWAY SEEKS TO USURP THE DELEGATE'S DUTIES—JUDGE SHANNON SEEKS A REAPPOINTMENT—IS DEFEATED—ALONZO J. EDGERTON APPOINTED CHIEF JUSTICE—RAILWAY BUILDING IN 1880—HURON FOUNDED.

The territory had a governor at this time who had been for twelve years sergeant-at-arms of the lower house of Congress, and knew the "ins and outs" of legislation. He had just come in to the territory—not for his health—and had not yet decided where his interests could be best subserved. He was of fair ability—a plausible speaker; desired to have a hand in "running things," as a leader, but was bewildered and uncertain as to his best course. He was early suspected with harboring an ambition to make his gubernatorial office a stepping stone to the United States Senate. His subsequent career confirmed this. But he must have foreseen, being a politician and a shrewd Yankee, that he could hope for no preference from the southern portion which was proposed by the people for immediate admission as a state; he could hope for nothing from the Black Hills; and the prospect that the northern part would be detained in the garments of a territory for a number of years did not appeal to him; therefore he felt that one territory was not too burdensome, and that the admission of the whole as one state promised the best and only solution of his problem. He therefore quietly and unobtrusively proceeded to delay progress of any plan looking to division, which his wide acquaintance with congressmen enabled him to do.

However, he might have failed in his selfish efforts, for there seemed a promise of the passage of what was known as the Saunders bill, by Congress, which was pending in the Senate at this time. It was almost identical with the bill introduced by Delegate Bennett, of Dakota, and was supported by the people of all sections of the territory. It differed from the tri-state plan in that it simply divided the territory on the 46th parallel of latitude or the 7th standard parallel, and provided a state government for the southern half.

A new President had been inaugurated, James A. Garfield, and he was making many changes in the civil list. Some of these proved unsatisfactory to the New York senators, Conkling and Platt, and they both resigned when the Senate refused to reject the objectionable nominations. Following this, an assassin named Guiteau attacked President Garfield in the depot of a Washington railroad where he was waiting, in company with Secretary of State Blaine, to take a short journey, and shot him, inflicting a mortal wound, though Garfield lingered for several months before death ensued. The ill feeling and tumult produced in the Senate by the Conkling and Platt resignations, Conkling being then a national figure and a Senate leader, followed by the assassination and the protracted suffering of the distinguished victim, so disturbed affairs in Congress and throughout the nation, that the Dakota bill, with many other important measures, failed of receiving attention.

Congress enacted, December 23, 1880, that the sessions of the legislative assemblies of the several territories shall be limited to sixty days' duration.

The fourteenth session of the Legislative Assembly of Dakota Territory assembled at Yankton, the capital, on Tuesday, January 11, 1881, at 12 o'clock M. The roll of members as furnished by the secretary of the territory, Hon. Geo. H. Hand, was called, when the following members-elect of the Council answered to their names:

M. H. Day, Bon Homme County; Ira W. Fisher, Cass County; John R. Gamble, Yankton County; John L. Jolley, Clay County; J. A. J. Martin, Pennington County; J. O. B. Scobey, Brookings County; Amos F. Shaw, Minnehaha County; P. R. Smith, Burleigh County; John Walsh, Union County; George H. Walsh, Grand Forks County; George H. Wiggin, Lincoln County; John R. Wilson, Lawrence County.

Judge Shannon administered the oath to the members, when prayer was offered by Rev. J. W. Trimble, rector of Christ's Church, Yankton, after which the Council organized by electing officers as follows: George H. Walsh, of Grand Forks, president; E. B. Dawson, of Clay County, chief clerk; Moses Liverman, of Lawrence County, assistant clerk; James B. Hull, of Brookings County, enrolling and engrossing clerk; Jacob Brauch, of Yankton County, sergeant-at-arms; W. H. Pelton, of Union County, messenger; A. S. Fuller, of Minnehaha County, watchman; Rev. William McCready, of Yankton County, chaplain. The usual committees were appointed and the Council then adjourned until Wednesday, at 10 o'clock.

The House first made a temporary organization by electing S. A. Boyles, of Yankton County, temporary chairman, and G. H. Dickey, of Barnes County, temporary clerk. Prayer was then offered by Rev. E. J. Brownson, of Yankton. Thereafter the roll of members furnished by the secretary of the territory was called, as follows: James Baynes, Hanson County; S. A. Boyles, L. B. French, A. L. VanOsdel, Yankton County; W. H. Donaldson, Deuel County; Isaac Moore, Silas Rohr, Union County; F. J. Cross, Pennington County; G. H. Dickey, Barnes County; Erick Ellefson, Albion Thorne, Minnehaha County; Porter Warner, J. D. Hale, J. A. Harding, S. McBratney, Lawrence County; D. M. Imman, Clay County; C. B. Kennedy, Lake County; Judson LaMoure, Pembina County; Paul Landmann, Bon Homme County; J. L. Miller, Richland County; Knud Nomland, Grand Forks County; Vale P. Thielmann, Turner County; David Thompson, Lincoln County; E. P. Wells, Stutsman County.

The House then organized by electing J. A. Harding, of Lawrence County, speaker, by a unanimous vote, the democrats declining to put a candidate in the field; Frank J. Meade, of Burleigh County, chief clerk; John C. Platt, of Richland County, assistant clerk; E. N. Falk, of Traill County, enrolling clerk; Knud Paulson, Union County, sergeant-at-arms; F. K. Berry, of Turner County, watchman; Rev. E. J. Brownson, of Yankton County, chaplain.

The usual committees were appointed, when the House adjourned until the following day.

Governor Ordway's first message was delivered to a joint convention of the two houses on the second day of the session, as follows:

Gentlemen of the Council and House of Representatives: In compliance with the organic act and territorial enactment, you are assembled to commence the fourteenth legislative session.

By a dispensation of Providence, in the removal by death of your late honored governor, William A. Howard, it has fallen to my lot to become the executive officer of this territory, and I desire to express on this occasion my dependence upon Divine wisdom to guide my steps in carrying out the good work so well begun by my distinguished predecessor.

Under the complex system through which the people of all new states must pass before full admission into the Union the executive and judicial officers receive their appointments from the President and United States Senate. The legislative branch derives its power and receives its compensation from the general government, and its members are also practically United States officials, selected by the people to make known their will and enact wholesome laws.

In the name, therefore, of the general government and the people of Dakota, I welcome you, the representatives of both, to the capital; and greet each and all of you as coworkers in weaving an imperishable fabric of just laws, which shall tend to equalize and lighten the burdens of the people, and at the same time give ample protection to the humblest citizen of this broad land, no matter from what section he comes.

It has been my purpose, in visiting various parts of the territory during the past year, to study the wishes and requirements of the people of every section; and it will be my aim in presenting views for your consideration, and in passing upon your acts, to conform to the intelligent popular will.

The territorial finances are in a most satisfactory condition, and but for the delinquencies of several county treasurers the exhibit would be much more favorable than the report of the treasurer shows. Our educational interests are receiving greater attention from all classes, and lawlessness has been proportionately diminished.

The tide of immigration set in with such force last year, and our material interests have taken such rapid strides, that the necessity of forming one or more states out of the 150,000 square miles of territory now embraced in under the name of Dakota is already pressing upon the people and the general government.

The remodeling of our institutions and so amending our laws that we shall be prepared fully to meet these great responsibilities will require the exercise of sound and unselfish devotion of every official as well as of all people of the territory. I esteem the privilege of having a part in laying the foundations of a new state, upon the broad principles of justice, freedom and equality, supplemented by wise local legislation, a higher honor than the state can ever bestow. With these grave responsibilities resting upon the executive, the Legislature and the people, the question arises, "Are our territorial laws and institutions so far perfected that state organization may safely follow and securely rest upon them? Are our tax laws so framed that all classes of property bear their equal and just proportion of the public burdens and so carefully guarded that none escape the assessor's list? Are the modes of procedure and the penalties ample and sufficient to insure the prompt and efficient collection of all taxes assessed? Are the finances of the various counties in such a sound condition that they will bear congressional scrutiny? Do the laws governing the casting and counting the votes of the people at elections insure absolute protection against frauds? Are our school laws adapted to the urgent and pressing necessities of the constantly increasing wave of new settlers with large families to educate? Are not our legislative districts covering, as some of them do, from five to seven thousand square miles, altogether too large, and the varied interests therein too much diversified, to find efficient representation with the present district system and limited membership? Are not some of the counties embracing, as they do, a greater area than the State of Rhode Island, too large and unwieldy for the comfortable transaction of the public business?"

The ordinary subjects which you will necessarily be called upon to consider may properly be stated in the following order:

FINANCES.—The report of the territorial treasurer shows that the total receipts were:

For the fiscal year ended November 30, 1879.....	$43,948.70
For the fiscal year ended November 30, 1880.....	46,597.65
Total	$89,646.41

The total receipts for the two fiscal years prior to November 30, 1878, amounted to but $50,840.86, although the rate of three mills on the dollar of valuation has not been increased. The receipts have been derived during the past two fiscal years from the following sources:

From various sources	$68,676.89
From sale of 8 per cent funding warrants, at par.....	14,170.22
From ex-Treasurer John Clementson.....	38 70
From sale of codes and laws of 1870.....	722.15
From sale of Fort Pierre Ferry franchise.....	394.50

From the territory's portion railroad tax, 1879.....	4,664.01
From Kidder's county proportion of railroad tax.....	890.14
From sundry sources	83.80
Total	$89,646.41
Cash in treasury November 30, 1878, add.....	4,518.17
Total	$94,164.68

Expenditures for the year ending November 30, 1879:

Paid auditor's warrants	$42,452.74
Paid interest on warrants.....	3,460.41
Paid interest on funding warrants.....	572.95
Paid for exchange and express charges.....	123.03
Total	$46,609.73

Total expenditures for the year ending November 30, 1880:

Paid auditor's warrants	$42,588.42
Paid interest on same.....	1,870.07
Paid interest on funding warrants.....	1,134.09
Paid for exchange and express charges.....	56.54
Total expenditures for past two years.....	$92,258.85
Cash in treasury November 30, 1880.....	1,905.73
Total	$94,164.68

Total indebtedness, less cash in treasury, November 30, 1880, $22,642.69.

To meet this indebtedness and carry on the government, there are taxes due from the various counties for the year 1880, amounting to $62,062.08. Also delinquent taxes against various counties for the year 1879, amounting to $11,783.74; for the year 1878, $7,838.29; for the year 1877, $3,689.77. Making the total assets $85,373.68.

If these delinquent taxes could be relied on as valid resources there would be a handsome surplus after paying the territorial expenses for the present fiscal year, and paying and retiring every form of outstanding indebtedness against the territory. But unfortunately, as I think, the law is not specific enough in providing the necessary machinery for assessing and promptly collecting the taxes from the various counties. Hence, I infer, that quite a large percentage of the delinquent taxes will not be available.

I would also recommend, as a measure of reform, that provision be made by law for the appointment of a financial agent of the territory, to be known as the "commissioner of finance and banking," whose duty it should be to make careful examinations of the books and accounts of the territorial treasurer, the territorial auditor, the superintendent of public instruction, and of the several county treasurers as often as twice during each year, and oftener if special occasion required, and make report thereof in writing to the executive at the end of each year, and especially when the condition should be such as to require immediate or special procedure for public protection.

The accounts of the financial officers of the various incorporated cities, towns and villages, the civil townships and the school districts, and other municipal officers, should be as far as possible included in the scope of his duties, as well as of all officers, such as county superintendents of public schools, whose duty it may be to either handle or apportion and order payment of public funds.

Inasmuch as the law passed at the last session, requiring all private banking institutions to file annually, with the secretary of the territory, statements of their assets and liabilities has not been complied with to any considerable extent, I would recommend that the proposed commissioner be also authorized to make careful examination of the books and papers of every private or territorial banking house, and of any other moneyed or insurance institution, and report their condition in the same manner to the executive, all to be by him reported to the Legislative Assembly.

HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE.—The report of the medical superintendent shows that fifty-two patients have been received and treated during the period of 19 $\frac{2}{3}$ months prior to November 30, 1880. Twenty-one of these were transferred from the hospital for the insane at St. Peter's and from the Lincoln, Neb., hospitals, where they had been kept under contract. The remaining thirty-one patients have been received under the law from the various counties. Twenty-five of the whole number were chronic cases of more than two years' standing; yet the report shows that about 20 per cent of the whole number treated since the hospital was established have been discharged as fully recovered. This result indicates that about 50 per cent of all who received treatment in the early stages of insanity recover; and proves the absolute obligation of the people to provide speedy and adequate accommodations for the treatment of this unfortunate class. The report also shows that the average weekly per capita cost for maintenance and clothing of patients, including the board of officers and employees, has been but \$1.38 4-5, which indicates economy and good management, especially when it is considered that nearly five thousand dollars of the various sums appropriated by the Legislature remain unexpended. I very much doubt if a county farm or poor house can be found, even in New England, where the weekly per capita cost of paupers will not range higher than the patients at the Dakota Hospital.

Through the energetic efforts of our delegate, Hon. G. G. Bennett, Congress appropriated at its last session the entire section, embracing 640 acres of land where the hospital buildings now stand, for a permanent hospital farm, and in my annual report to the secretary of the interior last year I made a strong appeal to him to aid the territory in securing from Congress an appropriation for permanent hospital buildings. I fear, however, that so many other matters will engage the attention of Congress during the few remaining weeks of the present session that no such appropriation will be secured.

The pressing necessity, therefore, of providing accommodations for from seventy-five to one hundred patients during the next two years will have to be met by the present Legislature. The present combustible structures, although they have answered a very good purpose, and are far preferable for the safe keeping of insane persons than the cold and sometimes loathsome prisons and jails in which the violently insane were confined before the hospital was established, are wholly unfitted to meet the present requirements. I cannot, therefore, too strongly recommend that you give careful consideration to that portion of the medical superintendent's report advising the erection of a plain brick structure, suitable for the accommodation of seventy-five patients, which would ultimately form one wing of a hospital large enough to accommodate all of the insane in the southern part of the territory. The severity of the weather during the winter season precludes the use of wood in the construction of buildings of this character, unless expensive inside ceilings of tongued and grooved hardwood are used, and even in that event the piercing winds and frost will after a few years find access through the apertures induced by the constant expansion and contraction of the wood. It is not my intention to recommend increased taxation upon the whole territory to meet this extraordinary expenditure.

If the work is undertaken, I would recommend that the board of trustees be enlarged from three to five or seven members, instead of three as now provided by law. That a portion of the trustees be selected from different sections of the territory. That a sufficient amount of bonds be issued bearing 6 per cent interest and to be known as the insane hospital bonds, to erect and furnish the new building. These bonds could be authorized early in your session containing a provision that in case Southern Dakota should be admitted into the Union as a state, the new state should assume and pay them at maturity. With this provision, Congress would without doubt sanction the bonds at its present session as an act of necessity and humanity, which would make them a good investment at par, and perhaps a small premium might be realized upon them.

The work could be commenced as soon as the season opens, and the new building could be completed and ready for occupancy before another cold season sets in. I am constrained to endorse the suggestions made by the trustees that an increase should be made in the salary of the medical superintendent, which is now but $63.33 1/2 per month, or about the usual price paid for a good mechanic.

TERRITORIAL PRISON.—A contract was made by Governor Pennington, August 20, 1877, with the authorities of the house of correction at Detroit, Mich., for the safe keeping of the territorial prisoners, at $1.50 per week for those remaining less than two years, and $1.25 per week for those remaining more than two years. The contract continues in force until canceled by giving three months' notice.

It appears from the auditor's report that the territory has paid, during the past four years, for the support of convicts at Detroit the sum of $14,602.76. The cost of transporting prisoners from the various counties to Detroit during the same period has amounted to $27,203.28, making a total cost for transporting and keeping the territorial prisoners for the before mentioned period, $41,805.94. This sum, under judicious management, would have built and fitted up a penitentiary of sufficient capacity for the safekeeping and employment of 125 prisoners, which is a larger number than the territory has ever had in the Detroit prison. While I make no criticism upon the management of the prison at Detroit, I feel assured that these convicts ought to be self supporting. In fact many of the state prisons have been sources of revenue. A bill has been introduced in Congress by Hon. G. G. Bennett appropriating $40,000 for the erection of a penitentiary in the territory, and in my annual report to the secretary of the interior, I took occasion to urge upon him the importance of recommending an appropriation for this purpose, which request, I am happy to say, the secretary incorporated in his annual report. If, however, our expectation should fail, your attention is now called to this important subject.

There are now about ninety convicts in the prison at Detroit, and judging from the increasing numbers during the past year, provision will be required for a much larger number during the next two years.

The subject of pardons of persons convicted and incarcerated for crime is then extensively treated, in an able manner, following the policy laid down by Governor Howard largely.

The message gives an able discussion of the importance of maintaining a wise system of popular education, compulsory and under the authority of the state, and says:

Your attention is invited to the exhaustive report of Gen. W. H. H. Beadle, superintendent of public instruction, accompanying this, and to the important and interesting discussion of the subject and plans therein discussed. You will find material for thoughtful consideration upon many points, and a considerate study of the many needs of the territory in the matter of education.

In connection with this subject of education, the message calls attention to the care of the blind, and mentions that under the authority of the law three blind pupils from the territory were being cared for at the Iowa Institution for the Blind at Vinton, Ia. Likewise an arrangement had been made with the Iowa Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, at Council Bluffs, where the territory maintained two pupils at an expense of $15 per month. The private institution for the care and education of the deaf and dumb, at Sioux Falls, is recommended, and a change in the law suggested that would permit the territory to contract with that institution, "unless it should be thought advisable to establish a territorial institution for the care and education of the deaf mutes."

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.—Yankton having been the largest city has been the seat of government since the territory was organized. The recent remarkable developments in the central and northern portion of the territory seem to have aroused the aspirations of the people in other growing towns to secure the capital, which may bring the subject of public buildings prominently before the Legislature.

It occurs to me that there are two practical methods to secure the necessary buildings without ultimate cost to the territory. One would be to adopt the Nebraska plan of securing a quantity of land in a central and accessible location, and dispose of the excess after laying out the public grounds, for a sufficient amount to defray the cost of the public buildings. The other plan would involve the receiving of propositions from suitable localities for furnishing proper capitol buildings without cost to the territory.

I do not think it would be advisable to take decisive action upon this important matter at the present session, unless reliable guarantees are offered that some town or county will furnish suitable capitol buildings before the meeting of another Legislature.

With the exception of furnishing adequate accommodation for the keeping of territorial prisoners, and for the comfortable care and treatment of the insane, I feel constrained to advise against any extraordinary expenditure for public buildings for the present.

RAILROADS.—The railroad developments have been most extraordinary in all parts of the territory during the past two years. The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Company have extended its lines across the southeastern portion of the territory to Yankton and Running Water on the Missouri River, and will soon have another line running via Mitchell to Chamberlain, a point on the east bank of the Missouri River, on its route to the Black Hills.

The Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company has extended its system of roads to Watertown, and its Black Hills line is now completed to the Missouri River, at the new Town of Pierre, leaving but about one hundred and seventy-five miles between that point and Deadwood.

The silver spike has been driven by the Northern Pacific Company at the Montana line, and that great corporation has now nearly four hundred miles of well-equipped road completed and in operation within our borders.

Nearly one thousand miles of thoroughly built and well equipped railroads are in active operation, and from two hundred to three hundred miles more will be ready for the rails early in the coming season.

Large and prosperous towns have been built up along these lines where two years ago nothing was visible but the trackless prairie. From a casual examination of our railroad laws I am inclined to think they are pretty well guarded.

The governor advocates the enactment of a registration law for all voters. He says:

ELECTIONS, COUNTY ORGANIZATIONS, ETC.—I cannot but regard the laws for the election of territorial officers exceedingly loose and dangerous, requiring amendment before another election.

The law now fixes the number of legal voters who may apply for the organization of new counties at fifty. Experience has shown that the first fifty individuals who take steps in securing Government land in an unorganized county are not in many cases actual settlers, or founders of the institutions which will ultimately make the county prosperous. A man without a family can make himself a legal voter in half a dozen counties within six months, if he chooses to arrange for a domicile in each, and it is notorious that great frauds have been practiced upon honest settlers by professional claimants to Government land in unorganized counties. Petitions have been received at the executive office bearing the names of fifty persons duly certified as legal voters in an unorganized county. In several instances recently an investigation has proven that more than half of the petitioners had families or homes in other places.

It has also been proven by the census enumeration that at the time some of these petitions were signed, not one-quarter of the names of the petitioners appeared upon the enumerator's list as residents and voters in the county.

I am clearly of the opinion that the law should be so changed that new counties cannot be organized until it is proven that they contain 100 bona fide settlers and legal voters.

MARRIAGE.—I recommend the passage of a law which shall require, in addition to the present provisions, that parties intending marriage shall procure a license from the register of deeds of the county, to whom they shall give their names and ages, names of parents, places of nativity, and such other facts as will satisfy that officer that they may lawfully be married. These facts should be recited in the license, and it should be signed by the officer under seal, for a proper fee, which should be sufficient to pay for the record of it afterwards. This license should be a pre-requisite to any officer, minister or priest, to perform the ceremony. The celebrant should then certify upon the same paper the fact of marriage, with two witnesses, and return it to the issuing officer for record.

DIVORCE.—I would also recommend that a law be passed requiring at least one year's residence in the territory before application can be made for a divorce from the bonds of matrimony.

Concerning statehood the message said:

The area of Dakota Territory is 13,000 square miles larger than Minnesota and Iowa combined. By extending its western line a short distance into Wyoming and Montana, it still leaves 200,000 square miles in those territories, and three large states could be formed with natural boundaries. The whole sisterhood remaining bound together by a community of interests, and the pride of a common name, which would carry great weight in the national councils, when the names of Southern, Western, and Northern Dakota should be added to the states of the Union. As to the names or number of states, the particular lines of division or the exact time when the first state should be admitted, I have no recommendation to make, except that we place the territory in such a position that the people may be prepared for any of the proposed changes. In order, however, to carry out any plan of division, it seems to me that congressional action must first be secured, and unless the bill now before Congress should become a law during the present session, in order to secure early action in the next session, we must go to Congress with a perfected code of equal and just laws, with a sound educational system, and with such a financial record that the new states can safely be entrusted with the control and disposition of the 5,000,000 acres of school lands already placed in trust for the people, and such other donations from the public domain as the new situation would demand.

The numerous pressing subjects requiring legislation, to which your attention has been especially called, together with local matters, will probably engross nearly all the time of the present session. If you find it impossible to consider measures necessary for laying the foundations of the state, I would suggest the propriety of your memorializing Congress for a special session of the Legislature, to meet the first of June or September, to determine all questions relating to admission, the adjustment of common interests, and to perfect all needed legislation that it may conform to the changes agreed upon. This work could all be accomplished within two months, and the members would have ample time during the adjournment to confer fully with their constituents and ascertain the views of the masses of the people upon all these important subjects.

If this or some similar course should be pursued, I apprehend that the united voice of the people thus expressed through their representatives would carry such weight that early action could be secured in the Forty-seventh Congress.

With a brief notice of the public library, a recommendation for the reorganization of the "Dakota Historical Society," a paragraph eulogistic of the grand Republic of America—the beacon light of liberty, his excellency concludes with the following:

Allow me in closing this already too extended communication to express the hope that our mutual relations may be most friendly, frank and cordial. And that when the work committed to our hands is accomplished the well done, good and faithful servant, may greet each and all.

N. G. ORDWAY.

An act was passed to establish a territorial agricultural college at Brookings, but no provision was made for the erection of buildings until 1883.

Bills were passed appropriating $40,000 for the purpose of erecting a substantial Hospital for the Insane at Yankton, the original wooden structure having been in use for two years and was overcrowded. Forty thousand dollars of territorial bonds were authorized to be issued and sold to defray the expense of building.

Fifty thousand dollars of territorial bonds were authorized to be issued and sold for the purpose of building a territorial penitentiary at Sioux Falls.

School districts were authorized to issue bonds for the purpose of building schoolhouses.

A law was enacted providing for the registration of voters.

There were 143 general laws passed, covering nearly every subject of legislation. And also seventy-six chapters of special and private laws enacted, nearly one-half providing for the construction of county buildings, jails, etc.

This was the fourteenth session of the Territorial Legislature, and accomplished more in the way of legitimate legislation than any of its predecessors. The principal feature of its legislative history was the large number of bills that were vetoed by the governor, and were passed over the veto. These measures were largely local bills authorizing the construction of buildings in counties and also authorizing the issue of county bonds for various purposes, the governor objecting on the ground that the proposed expenditure had not been submitted to a vote of the people. While this was true, it was shown that the matter had been quite thoroughly canvassed, the necessity was urgent owing to the rapid settlement of the counties effected during the past year or two, and the expense, direct and indirect of an election, would equal if not exceed the amount of bonds to be voted. An unprecedented emergency was pressing upon every interest of industry and improvement, and nearly all the members of the Legislature represented a constituency that was hindered in its enterprise for the want of whatever the proposed legislation authorized, hence the unanimity of sentiment among the members in supporting the vetoed bills, though in some cases the veto was sustained, by more than a one-third vote.

In the case of Lincoln County, there would seem to have been abundant public reasons for the passage of the measure which the governor vetoed. The bill, which was Council Bill No. 8, provided for the erection of a jail, and authorized the county commissioners to issue $5,000 in county bonds to defray the expense. The county had long needed a suitable jail and had been politely censured by the judge of the district for neglecting to provide one. Finally the necessity became so urgent that Judge Kidder issued a formal order directing the county board to build a jail without unnecessary delay. The county had no funds, and doubtless had issued its warrants, as most of the counties had, until their value was greatly depreciated. It was therefore deemed the wisest plan to ask the Legislature for authority to issue a small amount of county bonds, which could be sold at near par, and as an election would have cost about as much as the amount of bonds and would have to be paid in county warrants, which would have further augmented the county's floating debt, no election authorizing the issue had been held. For this neglect the scrupulous governor felt it his duty to prohibit its passage. The Legislature, however, passed it by more than a two-thirds vote over the veto. But the governor was making a record.

The second vote was that of a bill to provide extra compensation for the judge of the First Judicial District (the Black Hills, Judge Moody's district). In the first place, as justifying the bill, the expenses of living and providing for a family, were at a moderate estimate 25 per cent more in the Black Hills than in the eastern or northern part of the territory, and the presiding judge had more to attend to in his official duties than could be properly considered and heard, and adjudicated in the ordinary time devoted to such matters, and was compelled to give twelve and fifteen hours a day, a great portion of his time to his court duties. The United States court business was enough to employ all a judge's time that he ought to be required to give to matters where just judgment was to be meted out to litigants, but in addition to the United States business was a constantly increasing number of important civil as well as criminal cases, arising under the laws of the territory, which of itself was sufficient in volume to keep the court properly and prudently employed. The lawyers of the hills country appreciated this; they appreciated Judge Moody's ability, his judicial integrity, the superior value of his services which his long experience with the laws of the territory, as lawyer and legislator, and codifier gave them, and they unanimously favored the bill as the just measure and the only proper way to recompense the judge, and a much more consistent and proper course than to raise a fund by subscription, because a subscription by individuals would have been open to the objection that the subscribers would expect in return favors from the court. The judge, however, would decline to receive additional pay from a fund so provided. Governor Ordway vetoed the bill, and had the weight of legal authority on his side. He telegraphed the attorney general of the United States regarding the measures, but stated none of the peculiar and novel circumstances attending the case, and that official replied that such a measure was not desirable and ought to be vetoed but did not base his opinion on the illegality of the measure. The Legislature contained many good lawyers, and the bill was passed over the veto.

While there may have been some opinion that the governor had not been considerate of the energetic conditions prevailing, the general tenor of his veto messages was such as to indicate that the executive was determined to err, if he erred at all, on the right side, and make a record that would better serve to strengthen him at Washington, as a faithful guardian, steward, etc., rather than secure the favor of the Legislature. His subsequent use of the proceedings of this legislative body by parading them in the newspapers and recounting his heroic efforts to withstand the reckless legislation proposed, form the beginning of an estrangement between the executive and the people of Dakota that culminated in his retirement at the end of his term with a reputation very unlike that given him by the New Hampshire newspaper at the beginning of his term.

There were also a great many laws passed and approved for the erection of courthouses and jails and issue of bonds therefor, showing that the demand for such structures was quite general. Among these was an act for Hughes County, another for Kingsbury County, Lake and Turner counties, for Lawrence County, Minnehaha County, Stutsman County. Also school district bonds for District No. 1, Davison County, school districts in Grand Forks County, Grant and Deuel counties, District No. 1, Hughes County, Morton County School District No. 1.

Custer and Forsythe counties were consolidated under the name of Custer. Dickey County was named and defined, also Harding County, LaMoure County, Martin County, Morton County redefined, and Miner County.

Normal schools were located at Alexandria, Hanson County, Madison Lake County, Spearfish, Lawrence County, Springfield, Bon Homme County, Watertown, Codington County. The governor did not disapprove the normal school bills, but used them in his later criticisms as arguments to show the reckless extravagance of the people, and as measures having for their purpose the absorption of public lands. Yet with all our normal schools and other public educational institutions, the territory was never able to supply the rapidly increasing schools with teachers.

An interesting memorial was presented during the session by Councilman Walsh, of Grand Forks County. The secretary of the Interior at Washington had discovered that the Turtle Mountain band of Chippewa Indians had title to a strip of land in the western part of Grand Forks and Pembina counties, and to all the land in Cavileer, Ramsey, DeSmet, Rolette, McHenry and Bottineau counties. Much of the land had already been taken by settlers. The band of Indians who were found to be the owners of this princely estate numbered not over one hundred persons, and the purpose of the memorial was to induce the Government of the United States to make a treaty with the Indian owners in order that settlers might secure a clear title. The memorial succeeded in its mission. The Indians had composed a portion of a renegade band who were not consulted at the time the treaty was made with the Chippewas in 1864.

President Arthur, by proclamation issued about April 1, 1884, restored to the public domain all the Turtle Mountain Indian Reservation in Dakota, excepting townships 162 and 163 north of range 71 west, which was reserved for the benefit of the Turtle Mountain band of Chippewas.

Rep. Porter Warner, of Lawrence County, presented a memorial to Congress and the President of the United States, for a division of the territory on the 46th parallel of north latitude, and the admission of the southern half into the Union as a state, the north portion to retain the territorial organization, which was passed by an almost unanimous vote.

The laws of 1880, December, allowed sixty days for this session. March 5th the Legislature adjourned.

Hon. Carl Schurz, secretary of the interior, in his annual report for 1880, says:

The Territory of Dakota, having no penitentiary, it has been necessary to transport its convicts to Detroit, Mich., for imprisonment, at an expense of about ten thousand dollars yearly to the people of the territory. The penitentiaries in other territories have been built at the expense of the general Government, and the propriety of making an appropriation for the building of one in Dakota is submitted for the consideration of Congress.

REMOVAL OF CAPITAL

The removal of the capital from Yankton had been openly discussed by Governor Ordway for several months prior to the meeting of the Legislative Assembly in January, 1881, which was the first session following his appointment as governor. He began the agitation for a change, and was the first executive to advocate such a measure. His message to the Legislature gives his views and recommendations regarding the location of a more central capital, on a large scale, and he unquestionably had in mind such a location as would be suitable for the state when it was formed which he assumed would embrace the whole territory. It was known that the Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company was building a line north from Huron to a point on Elm River in Brown County, a small tributary of the James River, and the town there located was named Ordway. The governor had early disclosed a friendly interest in the Northwestern, and this site for the new capital of the whole territory was quite central; and owing to the vast country covered by Indian reservations west of the Missouri River, which might remain Indian Territory indefinitely, a point in the vicinity of Ordway would have been, in a few years, as near the center of population, practically, as any, for Northern Dakota was gaining population rapidly at that time. The governor had also a strong partiality for Pierre, probably as a second choice, and during his administration that point had had the honor of being the sub-capital. The governor had an interest in one of its financial institutions, and his son, George L. Ordway, with his partner Mr. Tebbetts, from Denver City, had located at Pierre, and engaged in a general land and townsite business, and young George had been appointed by the railroad company to some influential position in connection with the townsite of Pierre, which had become, to a large extent, the property of the railway company; and these parties, either as individuals or as a firm, subsequently handled a large share of the executive business pertaining to the organization of new counties, and the location of county seats, which, owing to the rapid expansion of settlements caused by the coming in of so many thousands of new settlers, was the most important and the principal legitimate duty of the governor during the remaining years of his administration, the record showing the organization of no less than forty counties during years 1881, 1882, and 1883, a greater number than had been organized prior to Ordway's term, from the earliest settlement of the territory to that event.

In his message to the Legislature, the governor takes occasion to recommend a plan for building a new capital, and it was later ascertained that certain members of the Legislature had gone so far as to form a combination to control the organization of that body in the interest of capital removal. The governor probably understood this, but the plan was checkmated by the skillful and adroit manipulation of the anti-removalists, and the Legislature finally organized in such a manner as to be practically independent of the governor, and the subsequent proceedings of the Legislature indicate that this was the case, for while the governor vetoed a number of bills, the organization was strong enough to override the veto in most cases. The cause of the failure of the plan of the removalists was probably due to the refusal of the legislators engaged in it, to consent that the law should be one that would give the governor practical control of the location as well as the patronage connected with the enterprise. At all events it failed for the time being, and the members of the Legislature went ahead and enacted laws, apparently indifferent to the governor's views regarding them, feeling secure in their strength to pass their measures regardless of the governor's objections. The subject of capital removal had also been discussed to some extent, late in 1880, by the newspapers, but the expressions, while admitting that a change would have to be made in its location, the time had not come when a satisfactory relocation could be made, owing as has been before remarked, to the pell-mell condition induced by the rapid and unprecedented inflow of new settlers who were coming in by many thousands, and invading the unoccupied lands in all sections. It was disclosed at this time that the people of Pierre had an ambition to make their place the capital city, and it was also discovered that its ambition was quite strongly encouraged by public sentiment that would doubtless support its aspirations when the time for a change was more opportune.

The session of the Legislature, however, was not disturbed by the question, nor did anything transpire save the governor's message and vetoes, many of which were based on substantial reasons, to awaken unpleasant feelings, and even these incidents becoming so frequent, and so easily overcome, aroused more of mirth than of indignation. Under the circumstances prevailing, the session was a very harmonious one, and accomplished as much if not more in the line of important and necessary legislation than any single session during the territorial era. Its members devoted more time to legislative work than had those of former bodies, and in excellence and completeness, as well as in volume, and in providing for the exigencies of the times, their accomplishments were highly commendable. The governor knew this to be true, and did not object to having it credited to his administration.

The citizens of Yankton tendered and provided a banquet to the governor and the legislators during the session, at which ex-Gov. Newton Edmunds presided, and made an address referring to the friendly relations existing among the members of the law-making body, and the valuable legislation that was being enacted. Hon. James A. Harding, speaker, made a very excellent speech, as did also Hon. Geo. H. Walsh, the president of the Council. Governor Ordway occupied the chair of honor by virtue of his office, and made the closing address. He alluded to the remarkable growth of the territory and the great pleasure the early pioneers must feel in the present situation throughout Dakota, and the fact that throughout its career, from the time their footsteps followed close upon the moccasins of the retreating savage, there had been no lawlessness or disregard of the laws of the land. It was a proud distinction the people of Dakota enjoyed that there has never gone up a complaint against them that they in the least had entrenched upon the reserved rights of the first owners of the soil. His excellency concluded with a commendatory allusion to the feeling of amity existing between the people of all sections of the territory.

Hon. Bartlett Tripp was one of the speakers, and on behalf of the citizens of Yankton spoke of the pleasant associations and cordial friendships formed between the citizens of Yankton and the members of the legislative body, and the strong social, commercial and political ties existing between people of all parts of the territory.

Mr. Walsh said the members of the Legislature heartily appreciated the cordial friendship and generous hospitality that had been extended to them during the session. In returning to their homes they would carry with them the liveliest feelings of friendship and regard for the people of the capital city.

Other speakers were Hon. John L. Jolley of Vermillion, Hon. J. A. S. Martin of Pennington County, Hon. E. P. Wells of Stutsman County, Hon. Albion Thorne of Minnehaha County, Hon. J. O. B. Scobey of Brookings County, ex-Governor Pennington and Hon. George H. Hand. As Yankton had not been accustomed to entertaining the legislative bodies in this public manner, it was surmised that the occasion was designed as "a flow of soul" and a "feast of reason" why the capital ought not to be removed. But the project of removal was not abandoned and was renewed with better success at the next biennial session.

After the adjournment of the Legislature, Governor Ordway visited Washington, and soon after his arrival there, late in March, he submitted a statement to the public in the form of an interview, which was designed to explain the disagreements which had been so marked between himself and the Legislature during the recent session. The statement as it appeared was in words following:

ORDWAY INTERVIEW IN WASHINGTON

When I went to Dakota I was requested by President Hayes and members of his cabinet not to write letters and make recommendations in behalf of candidates, for the reason that they desired to confer with me in regard to them. I have, therefore, refrained from signing petitions, or otherwise taking part in the appointments of the territory, except as above stated. The postmaster general made an order that when there were changes made in important offices, notices of the proposed changes should be sent to me, as well as the delegates, for advice. I also received general instructions to communicate freely with all the departments in regard to the Federal service in the territory, and have done so. The secretary of the interior has written and telegraphed me frequently in regard to the standing of men whose terms of office had expired, and also as to candidates for their places. I have not attempted to control the patronage of Dakota, but have given my views freely when asked, and acting upon the President's request, have endeavored to assist all other departments of the Government and protect the settlers from frauds upon them. My aid has also been extended to Federal officers in the territory in the effort to reform the public service, which was sadly necessary, owing to the combination of ring thieves and land sharks. In these efforts I came into contact with the Dakota Legislature, and first in this way: The chairman of the board of county commissioners of Lawrence County called my attention, while I was in the Black Hills last July, that a bill passed the Legislature in 1879, funding the outstanding indebtedness of the county, which was about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and for the issuance of $350,000 of bonds, a glaring fraud of $200,000 upon the people. When the Legislature of 1881 convened, the members informed me that a large number of funding bills and bills for bonds to build courthouses, jails, and bridges, and give aid to railroads, were prepared. I gave everybody timely notice that I could not approve such bills unless the question of issuance of bonds was submitted to the people, and came within 7½ per cent of the assessed valuation of the county. They went ahead and passed and I vetoed them. Some of them were most outrageous in their character. The result was that they were nearly all amended by supplementary bills, and the amount of bonds to be issued which the people are not to vote upon is only about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, which were forced through over my veto before better counsels prevailed. The public credit of the territory is good. In my course I claim to have had all along the support of the best business men and tax payers of the territory. In Yankton, and while the Legislature was in session, I was waited upon by nearly every business man and prominent citizen and urged to stand by the prominent position I had taken. Also, in the Black Hills, I was supported by everybody. I have yet to learn of a business man or United States official who disagreed with me.

It is remarkable that Ordway's predecessor, Governor Howard, had no such requests or instructions from the President or cabinet of President Hayes, and it will not be denied that it was not for lack of fitness for any proper duty, for on the scope of equipment and experience for public station Ordway was not to be compared with Howard, who was a ripe statesman, and a scrupulously honest man, who knew thoroughly what duties were demanded of him as governor. There was no reason, no cause whatever, why the President and cabinet should have taken Ordway into their confidence and instructed him to interfere in the matters he mentions. There had been no complaint against the territorial officials, the postmasters were satisfactory everywhere and no grievance was felt in that department of the public service. The scandals of extravagance and dishonesty that grew up under the Ordway administration, fostered by his intrigues and sordid schemes, were something new to Dakota, and one is constrained to believe that Ordway deliberately misrepresented the matter, and as vanity was a prominent element in his character, he gave such statements to the public through the newspapers as a means of extolling his own importance.

President Hayes appointed Governor Howard, with whom he was personally acquainted, on his own motion, knowing his qualifications and his character. Ordway he did not know, but took him on the recommendation of Vermont and New Hampshire senators, who, report stated, were anxious to get rid of him. He was a meddlesome man. He was prone to laud his own efforts for better government in his speeches and through the newspapers, but his example was pernicious and demoralizing. He was responsible for the corrupt conditions and hurtful sentiment that he afterward complained of. He did not find them in Dakota when he came here; and it is morally certain that if such conditions existed under Governor Howard, his predecessor, that official would have recognized it, and left some evidence regarding it.

CALDWELL'S INTERVIEW WITH ORDWAY

E. W. Caldwell was the editor and owner, or part owner, of the Sioux Falls Pantagraph in 1880, and he had a visit from and an interview with the governor during the year, which was the first year of Ordway's administration. Caldwell did not make public the subject matter of the interview for nearly two years later, when he decided to publish it. It is well to remember that this interview and statement by Governor Ordway was prior to the Legislature of 1881, concerning which Ordway afterward takes occasion to allude to as the source from which grew all the opposition and unfavorable comment he met with from the people of the territory. His statements to Mr. Caldwell leave no doubt that he had formed a corrupt plan in his own mind by which he expected to control the politics of Dakota by building up a corrupt political machine with the federal patronage he expected to control, with himself at the head. And he expected to be able to have his machine in working order when the Legislature of 1881 convened, when he would be enabled to provide for removing the capital on the lines laid down in his message to that Legislature, and control the legislation of the session. But the leading influences in the Legislature had been apprised of his schemes; a counter-combination was formed strong enough not only to checkmate the executive, but to override his vetoes, which were anticipated, and enact laws without his approval.

Following is the text of Mr. Caldwell's statement, with his preface explaining why he had delayed making it public:

Common honor would dictate that under ordinary circumstances any fact, or set of facts, coming into the possession of an individual as a matter of confidence should be sacredly kept by that individual, even though the facts be those the public should know. But the obligation may be considered removed when the person directly affected by the facts himself disregards the principle stated, and peddles to the public that which he says, either truly or falsely, came to him in the nature of a private and confidential conversation. For a long time the gentleman who is now editor of the Press has been in possession of facts affecting the integrity of N. G. Ordway, governor of Dakota, which came to him by unworthy propositions made to him by Ordway. In all the bitterness of the campaigns against Ordway, these facts have not been given to the public, because they were regarded as, of course, matters of confidence. But N. G. Ordway has forfeited all right to considerations of that kind by detailing what he declares was a private conversation, but which we believe to be a lie—this making no difference, however, as to the forfeiture of any right to considerations of the sanctity of a private conversation. Therefore, in order to let the public know more fully, if such a thing be possible, the sort of a miserable rascal who has been inflicted upon Dakota, we purpose relating, without color or distortion, the facts regarding the propositions made by Ordway, referred to above.

At the time of Ordway's first visit to Sioux Falls, he requested a conference with the editor of the Pantagraph, the writer hereof. Most of this conference was held on the veranda of the Cataract House, and it lasted until probably 1 o'clock in the morning. By degrees it led up to propositions and statements of which the following is a truthful synopsis:

Ordway said that of course it was no object to him to come to Dakota simply to be governor, because the salary was so much less than he could make elsewhere; but he recognized that there were opportunities here for making lots of money on the outside, and these opportunities could best be improved by making a coalition of forces in different parts of the territory. "I have," said he, "full power in the matter of Federal appointments in Dakota, and will have you made postmaster of Sioux Falls, and there can't be anybody appointed for anything unless I say so. It doesn't make any difference to me who is next President, for I am just as solid with Hancock as with Garfield and will control things anyway. The fact is, I wasn't in politics in Washington twelve years for nothing. You haven't any idea of the number of leading public men who are in my power. When I was sergeant-at-arms of the lower house of Congress I was practically the banker of the members, as they had to draw their salaries from me. Well, the number of them of both parties who sent checks to me for disreputable purposes by disreputable persons, gives me an absolute hold on them. None of them dare oppose me, for I have my thumb on them. Some of them are now senators, and others occupy high positions in the Government. By this means we could depend upon controlling appointments in this territory, whichever party wins. I want a newspaper in Sioux Falls, and also want to make arrangements to take into the combination some one or more leading citizens. In going about over the territory I will make similar arrangements in other localities, and we can organize affairs so as to have everything our own way.

"And furthermore," said he, "I will see to it that a project for organizing militia companies throughout the territory is passed by the Legislature, and I will have the appointment of the commissioned officers, and this will put them under our control, and through them we can control the men, which will be a great power when it comes to caucuses and elections."

And these are some of the plans laid out by N. G. Ordway nearly three years ago to blackmail and worm himself into power and fortune and to debauch the politics of this territory. He succeeded in some places in making the coalition which he hoped, but Sioux Falls has not been one of the towns he could count on. It seems, also, that his thumb was not so securely upon the public men of this country as he supposed, and that he did not succeed in controlling the Federal appointments in Dakota by the system of blackmail upon which he had depended. A knowledge of the purpose to which he sought to prostitute these appointments led to an especial warfare thereon, and the result was that he did not have that exclusive swing upon which he counted.

However, with that persistency which is a peculiar trait in Ordway's character, he continued his efforts for forming coalitions for the purpose of profiting by the prostitution of his position, with what success is only too well known to the people of this territory. He has plotted and connived in every possible direction—bribed legislators in some instances by promising support for their measures, and intimidating others by threatening a veto if his schemes were not carried out. He has compelled proprietors of prospective county seats to give him an interest in their town-sites before he would take official action for the organization of their county; he demanded of the Legislative Council the confirmation of his son as territorial auditor, in order that he might have control of the finances of the territory; he concocted, or fell in with, a scheme for the removal of the territorial capital, in order that he might profit by a real estate speculation connected with its relocation. Verily, to be governor of Dakota was no object to him, as he declared.

The editor of the Press and Dakotian was approached by the governor at Yankton, about the time of the assembling of the Territorial Legislature in 1881, with a proposition similar in all respects to that made by the governor to Mr. Caldwell, including the postmastership. The proposition was declined, but it was discovered that the governor was planning to build up a political faction which he could in a measure control, and thus gain a potent voice in the important political matters affecting the division of the territory and the admission of the state, which up to this time had been denied him. His attempt, a few months later, to get control of a convention through his Fargo conference was in line with this plan.

The first notes of the inharmonious relations existing between the governor and some of the leading political leaders of the territory were heard through Ordway's interviews following his scandalous reports concerning the reckless extravagance of the Legislature, and the "rings and land sharks" that infested the territory, and with whom and against whom he was waging a valiant contest. He had met with an early rebuff from Pettigrew, whom he had approached with a proposition to unite their forces and control the politics and political patronage of the territory, and it was authentically reported that Pettigrew at that interview advised him to resign his governorship as the surest way of doing something that would please the people, which advice greatly offended his excellency, and he thereafter openly exhibited his animosity toward the delegate, and made it a part of his business in Washington to oppose Pettigrew's recommendations and legislative measures. For several months or a year after this contest between the governor and delegate had been observed, the press and the people of the territory, and even in Mr. Pettigrew's own county, were about equally divided in their support of the governor and delegate. Ordway's plausible explanations, which were regularly published, were credited by many; he had succeeded in retaining the support of former Delegate Bennett, who, since his retirement from Congress, had been giving the governor his moral and intellectual support at Washington, probably expecting that the governor could reciprocate by securing an office for him through the influence he possessed with those members of Congress he had shielded from ruin while he was sergeant-at-arms of the House, and which he had portrayed so graphically in his interview with Mr. Caldwell.

While Mr. Pettigrew had been elected by an overwhelming majority, this might have indicated nothing more than ordinary party loyalty. Ordway understood the political conditions, the rivalries, in the territory, which were of a piece that existed in every state and territory. The man behind the ballot who voted for Mr. Pettigrew may have been a very ardent supporter of Bennett, or of Raymond, or Kidder, before the nomination, and predicted great disaster in case of Pettigrew's selection. But when the convention had uttered its voice this conflict ceased, not to be renewed until the next campaign. And there were already rumblings of active strife audible to those who kept their ears to the ground. It was not, therefore, at all remarkable that during the first year of Pettigrew's term, with Ordway's obtrusive meddling in his duties, and Ordway's frequent plausible communications to the public through the newspapers, in which he was observed to be acting by request of the President and his cabinet, that a large number of Dakota newspapers, and a larger number of people who had been identified with the anti-Pettigrew element before his nomination, felt like sustaining Nehemiah.

Ordway was the first and only governor of Dakota Territory that essayed to usurp the duties of the territorial delegate to Congress. Governor Burbank lived at Washington a large portion of the time while he was governor in attendance upon his brother-in-law, Senator Morton, who was a cripple, and needed assistance in getting to and fro in Washington. His trouble was a paralysis of his lower limbs. Dakota had a democratic delegate a large part of Burbank's term, who found Burbank's assistance at times helpful, and they worked together harmoniously. In the matter of appointments Armstrong purposely kept aloof, claiming no recognition, and Burbank, with the aid of his senatorial relative, was instrumental in selecting a number of federal officials, though invariably from the Hoosier state, which the senator represented. But Burbank uniformly treated the democratic delegate with the consideration due to his position as the agent and representative of the territory both in Congress and at the several departments. Mr. Armstrong proved one of the most useful and profitable of Dakota's long list of delegates.

Ordway frequented Washington also, not by invitation of the people or the delegate, but apparently with the purpose of usurping the duties of the delegate and obstructing him in the discharge of his duties. Instead of endeavoring to allay factious troubles in the territory, he endeavored to build up a faction with himself as leader, and this was his policy during almost his entire administration. He seemed to measure every movement for the progress of the territory by the effect it would have upon his own political fortunes, and to justify himself at Washington for his interference, he was obliged to represent affairs in Dakota in such a demoralized condition as to justify his assumption of the duties of the territory's lawfully chosen agent. Congress had appropriated $50,000 for a federal and territorial penitentiary—not an unusual donation, for a similar appropriation had been made for the other territories. This money Ordway endeavored to get control of, and in order to effect it he was obliged to disparage the trustworthiness of the people he had been appointed to govern under the law—a people who had made Dakota a great and prosperous subdivision of the United States, and which Ordway had not lifted a hand to favor.

Mr. Pettigrew, who was delegate during two years of Ordway's administration, was not one who would submit to the governor's officious interference without resenting it, and this he did in the most emphatic manner. The result was a constant conflict between these officials during Mr. Pettigrew's term, which must have worked injuriously to the interests of Dakota and in a measure neutralized the efforts of the delegate, who was disposed to represent and promote the best interests of the territory, and was never criticised for neglecting them. His constant warfare with Ordway, however, which should have been to his credit, aided in a measure to embitter factional differences, which, coupled with sectional influences, overthrew him after his first term.

Ordway was at Grand Forks at the republican convention of 1882. He secured the special train that carried a portion of Mr. Hand's friends to the convention, and was counted as one of Mr. Hand's supporters. He made himself conspicuous there, not as a Hand supporter, but as a foe to Pettigrew. He did not appear to care much who was nominated if Pettigrew was defeated; and when it was established by the proceedings of the convention that North Dakota's delegates largely had made a league with Pettigrew's forces, to defeat Hand and nominate Raymond, Ordway, who was present in the convention, excitedly exclaimed to Mr. Hand's friends: "Why don't some of you Hand men get up and move to nominate Raymond by acclamation, and thus defeat Pettigrew?" As the Hand men felt that they had been sold out, they did not take kindly to the governor's suggestion.

Governor Ordway states that the President and his cabinet requested him to report upon the fitness of persons recommended for appointment to federal office. The reader need not be cautioned regarding the truth of this statement. It had never been the custom of the presidents to employ the executive of the territory for such a purpose. They were aware that it would be demanding of the executive a duty foreign to his sworn duty as governor. They were intelligent enough to understand that such services were required of the lawful agent of the territory. If any such order as the governor tells of by the Postoffice Department that proposed changes should be sent to him for advice, it may be set down as a fact that such order was issued at Ordway's solicitation. The position of delegate to Congress was provided for in the organic act, the same law that provided for the governor. The duties of the delegate were to represent the people of the territory at Washington, to inform Congress, the President and the heads of departments of the conditions and needs of the territory. He was the only officer authorized by law to so represent the territory. Pettigrew had resided in Dakota a dozen years and was widely acquainted. The governor's duties were confined to the Territory of Dakota, where he was to see that the laws were faithfully executed, and to recommend to the Legislative Assembly such measures as were needed to cover new and changed conditions. He was also expected to make an annual report to the Department of the Interior of a character similar to the message given to the Legislature, in order that the secretary might include in his report to the President matters of interest connected with the territory, and the President in turn would, if he deemed them of sufficient importance, include the substance of them in his annual message to Congress. Postmasterships, nor any other appointments, were alluded to in these several reports.

The President and his cabinet never intended to encourage the governor to supplant the delegate; to take from the delegate his legitimate and lawful duties and turn them over to another official. The President and his advisers would not even tolerate the interference of the governor with the duties of the delegate, much less advise it, for they would have known that such a course would lead to conflict that would be of great injury to the welfare of the people, and cause a strife where harmony was demanded. Ordway came to Dakota a stranger, and the claim that all this confidence was reposed in him by the President before he had set his foot upon Dakota soil, and when there was not the slightest pretext for it, is preposterous. Its shallowness and hypocrisy appear when these conditions are examined. The President and his cabinet knew that the territory had an agent, given to it by law, a delegate who was authorized to look after all its interests, and they would not gratuitously offer him such an unpardonable indignity as to advise the governor, whom they must have known was not even in his official field when in Washington (for he was not then governor, but his office was filled by an acting governor), to interfere with the duties of the delegate.

Governor Ordway's predecessor, Governor Howard, had given the territory a wise, prudent and honest administration, and he had found no fault with the people; had not discovered their reckless extravagance, nor proneness to dishonesty. The Lawrence County case was entirely exceptional and stood alone. There was nothing wrong in the legislation which authorized the funding of their great burden of indebtedness. It was a wise and necessary measure. The county, and Deadwood, its principal settlement, had been overrun largely with a heterogeneous population almost within a couple of months. About eight thousand people, largely men, had gone in there allured by its rich gold fields. The county had been the theater of an Indian war which necessitated calling out the militia and equipping them, disastrous floods had played havoc with the mountain roads and numerous bridges, and finally came the disastrous fire which wiped out millions of dollars of property. All this before Ordway came upon the Dakota stage, but which he might have learned while at Deadwood in the fall of 1880 securing data for the scandalous picture he gave to the world regarding the affairs of the unfortunate community. Whatever had been done that was fraudulently consummated had been ferreted out or was in process of being brought to light by the law-abiding people there, who were as largely in the majority as in any of the counties. The expenditures of the county had been heavy, and to a great extent necessarily extravagant where payment was made in county warrants, but this had been the case with nearly every county in the territory in its early career. These conditions are not even hinted at in Ordway's interviews. He leaves the inference that a system of rascality was at the bottom of nearly everything in the territory.

Governor Ordway early disclosed a predilection for publicity, and the general tenor of the intelligence he gave to the newspapers was egotistically pessimistic and tinctured with scandal. Unfortunately, he would neglect to speak of anything or many things that were highly creditable to the people, but never grew weary of telling of their imprudences and faults, and how he had stood alone as a sentinel guarding the good name and upholding the standard of probity in the territory.

To such an extent did he inveigh against the management of public affairs that the people became indignant and resented his slanderous imputations by formal resolutions at their public meetings, and in some cases demanded his removal. According to Ordway's own story, he was sent to Dakota as a spy and scavenger with the governorship as a tail to his duties.

Ordway wrote to President Arthur, or claimed that he did, under date of December 10, 1881, concerning Dakota matters, as follows:

When I addressed you a communication a short time since relating to the necessary steps preceding statehood, I confidently expected to reach Washington before the holidays for the purpose of paying my respects in person. Also that I might be able to lay before you the alarming financial and political condition of affairs in this territory.

Following this the governor referred to several counties in the territory as illustrations of his statement that Dakota affairs were in an "alarming financial and political condition," and then speaks of his interference with federal appointments, and says:

I also felt constrained to differ with the delegate, who, backed by certain attorneys for persons indicted by the United States Court, seemed determined to prevent the reappointment of Chief Justice Shannon, an able and fearless judge, and so far as I have been able to learn, upon a full statement of all the leading cases, reciting the necessity of Judge Shannon's reappointment, made and signed by Hugh J. Campbell, United States attorney, in whom I have full confidence, I endorsed Judge Shannon for reappointment.

The protest against Shannon's reappointment to which Ordway refers came from the attorneys of the Second Judicial District, and included nearly all of them. The cases against the persons indicted by the United States Court, to which he refers, were the remaining "Livingston cases," which the defendant had been urging that they be brought to trial, but which the court and the prosecuting attorney had already determined would not be brought to trial, and for reasons best known to themselves no move had been made regarding them for more than a year. It is possible that these cases had been kept on the calendar for the purpose of having them to exhibit as pending and affording strong grounds for Shannon's reappointment. The petition of the attorneys practicing in Shannon's court will speak for itself.

As a matter of personal interest, Shannon had become quite a strong supporter of Ordway, and the governor might have been influenced in his support of Shannon by the reflection that a friend at court would be a valuable auxiliary.

Judge Peter C. Shannon had held the office of chief justice of Dakota Territory for eight years when in the fall of 1881 his second term expired. His second term had not been marked by that friendliness, respect and confidence that should exist between the presiding judge and the members of the bar practicing in his court, but on the contrary, there had grown up a feeling of distrust toward the judge, and an entire and a total lack of confidence in his official integrity. As Judge Shannon had made application for a reappointment for a third term, and had the assistance of Governor Ordway and some influential eastern senators, the members of his bar felt that they would be justified in openly opposing the reappointment, and in order to justify their action before the people and the appointing power at Washington, drew up, adopted and signed, at a meeting held for the purpose, a list of charges. These charges were adopted by the Yankton Bar Association on the 25th of March, and were filed in the Department of Justice. These charges contained seven specifications, wherein the judge was charged with:

Insulting attorneys and parties in open court.
 Offensive partisanship in criminal cases.
 Has endeavored by threats and other coercive means to secure endorsement of attorneys for reappointment.

Has been publicly intoxicated, and the habit has grown on him.
With writing fictitious letters.

Signed, S. L. Spink, president bar association; E. T. White, secretary; George H. Hand, Bartlett Tripp, J. R. Gamble, E. G. Smith, I. E. West, S. A. Boyles, Oliver Shannon, R. J. Gamble, E. L. Fletcher, L. B. French, C. J. B. Harris, G. M. Fay, A. C. Davis, and S. H. Gruber, members of the Yankton County Bar Association.

Monzo J. Edgerton, of Minnesota, was nominated chief justice of Dakota Territory, to succeed Peter C. Shannon, on the 21st of December, 1881. Mr. Edgerton was serving as United States senator from Minnesota at this time, having been appointed to that position by the governor of Minnesota to succeed Senator Windom, who had been appointed to a position in President Arthur's cabinet. Judge Edgerton reached Dakota a few days later, and entered upon his official duties on the 3d of January, 1882.

THE NORTHWESTERN

The Dakota Central Railway crossed the Big Sioux River in Brookings County and temporarily halted at Volga, while the grading was being energetically prosecuted on the survey west. The Village of Brookings, and also Volga, were founded in 1879, and as a large number of settlers had gone ahead of the railway track and selected claims farther west, these villages enjoyed quite a lucrative and active business outfitting new settlers. DeSmet, Kingsbury County, and Cavour, Beadle County, were founded in 1880 early, as well as Huron, and some months in advance of the railroad.

The railroad company surveyed the townsite of Huron during the last week of April, 1880. The track had not reached as far west as the James River at the time, but the company had made it the end of a section of their line, and laid out their roundhouse and machine shops, and a few adventurous men were on the ground, secured lots and began building early in May. Their lumber was hauled from Volga on the Big Sioux, but the distance would be lessened within a short time by the completion of the road to DeSmet, thirty-four miles away. One enterprising party had arranged to start a lumber yard and intended hauling his stock from the cars when they arrived at DeSmet.

The need of a county organization to start things going right was unanimous, but where to get the necessary number of petitioners was a puzzle just early in May. A petition was started, however, and forty-seven names were secured in and around Huron and north, and there were said to be a number more at Wessington Hills, in the western part of the county, but after securing the names (fifty were required under the law) it was discovered that nearly all were not eligible to sign because they were not legal voters, not having resided in the territory the required time. The organization plan was therefore put off for the time being.

The railroad bridge across the James River at Huron, completed in June, 1880, was the longest and highest railroad bridge in the territory. The town was one mile from James River and within four miles of the center of Beadle County (not then organized).

The railway reached Huron, on the James River, about 12.30 o'clock M. on June 25, 1880. The residents of the town, who had been given the sobriquet of Huronites, gathered at the place where the depot was to be built, and as the train came up gave three hearty cheers in token of welcome, and otherwise indulged in such ceremonies as are pertinent and popular on such occasions, and such as betray a fullness of joy too abundant to be suppressed. Huron has been doing much in the way of town and territory building ever since that eventful day. She is a credit to Dakota.

The company built from near Volga, Brookings County, north up the Big Sioux Valley to Watertown in 1880. From Watertown the company had projected a line west to the James River.

The Chicago & Northwestern Company surveyed thirty miles of its proposed line along the Bad River Valley toward the Black Hills, making its starting point opposite the new Town of Pierre; and considered the construction of seventy-five miles of the road during the year. Soundings were also made in the Missouri River for a bridge at that point.

The Northwestern Stage Company, then operating a line of stages from Bismarek to the Black Hills, put a line of stages on the Pierre route in the fall of 1880. The company erected stations every twelve miles, and put up about eighteen tons of hay at the several stations.

The Chicago & Northwestern Line from Hawarden to Centerville and Iroquois was surveyed during the summer and fall of 1881.

The grading of the Northwestern Line from Watertown to Clark, half way to Redfield, was finished in 1881.

The Northwestern Company extended its line from Ordway to Columbia, the county seat of Brown County, in 1882-83.

The Hastings & Dakota Division of the Milwaukee Railroad had been graded during the year, from Ortonville, Minn., at the foot of Big Stone Lake to Aberdeen, eight miles west of the James River. The track had been laid to midway between Webster and Bristoll, about sixty miles. The James River Valley Branch had been graded sixty miles north of Aberdeen, and forty miles south. It was claimed that the line would be completed to a point on the Northern Pacific Railroad, in Kidder County, the year following. At Milbank Junction, on the Hastings and Dakota, a branch line had been built up the Whetstone Valley for thirty miles and the track laid to Wilmot, seventeen miles.

The Village of Dell Rapids in Minnehaha County voted aid to the Southern Minnesota Railway Company, in 1880, amounting to $12,500 in village bonds, bearing 7 per cent interest and having twenty years to run. The election appears to have been held without lawful authority, and at the legislative session of 1881, the election and issue of bonds was legalized, and further authority given to the village to issue bonds due in ten years, bearing 7 per cent, amounting to $2,500 to defray the expense incurred by said village, in procuring the right-of-way for said railroad.

PRESIDENT GARFIELD ASSASSINATED

Hon. James A. Garfield, President of the United States, was shot down and mortally wounded at the depot of the Baltimore and Potomac Station, on the morning of July 2, 1881, a little less than three months after he had been inaugurated President. The assassin's name was Charles Gilleau, as it was given at the time and as he had written it, but later it was found that his name was Guiteau. The following dispatch from Secretary of State Blaine, which was immediately cabled to foreign ministers, gives the particulars:

Department of State, Washington, July 2, 1881.

James Russell Lowell, Minister, Etc., London:

The President of the United States was shot this morning by an assassin named Charles Gilleau. The weapon was a large sized revolver. The President had just reached the Baltimore & Potomac station, at about 9.20 o'clock, intending, with a portion of his cabinet, to leave on the Limited Express for New York. I rode in the carriage with him from the executive mansion, and was walking by his side when he was shot. The assassin was immediately arrested, and the President was conveyed to a private room in the station building, and surgical aid at once summoned. He has now, at 10.20 o'clock, been removed to the executive mansion. The surgeons in consultation regard his wounds as very serious, though not necessarily fatal. His vigorous health gives strong hopes of recovery. He has not lost consciousness for a moment. Inform our ministers in Europe.

JAMES G. BLAINE, Secretary of State.

The assassin claimed to be a Chicago lawyer, and was known in that city, but was not at all prominent. He was an eccentric man, thought by some to be half demented. When arrested, or just after firing the shots, he said "I did it and want to be arrested. I am a stalwart, and Arthur is President now." This declaration had reference to the prevailing political situation in the republican party, which, owing to disagreements with the administration had given birth to factions, the opponents of the administration policies being termed "stalwarts."

The President suffered much during his illness, and despite the most skillful treatment, died on the 19th of September following the shooting. Chester A. Arthur, the vice president, who was then in New York, took the oath of office there, and repaired to Washington, President of the United States. Gilleau or Guiteau was tried for the crime of murder in the United States Court at Washington, found guilty, and executed.

This lamentable occurrence cast a shadow over the nation, which remained during the long illness which followed the shooting, and the public mind was to a great extent engrossed with the subject. It had its effect in Dakota, where plans were maturing for securing the division of the territory, and it likewise was observable among congressmen and the country's public servants in other capacities, who seemed to have lost interest in every public matter except the physical condition of the suffering President. Garfield was affectionately regarded by the people.

Senator Saunders, of Nebraska, speaking of Dakota matters at the time, said:

During the past session of Congress I was instrumental in introducing a bill for the division of Dakota into two territories, with an eye to the admission of the southern part of it into the Union as a state. Owing to the deadlock arising from the Conkling-Garfield troubles, and the press of other public business, we did not reach it. Early in the coming session it will come up, and I am of the opinion that Dakota will be divided and the southern part of it made a state of the Union.

MISSOURI RIVER IMPROVEMENT

The rapid settlement of the Missouri Valley and its tributary country in Dakota and Montana had awakened a desire among the big river cities below the Dakota Line to share in the prosperity which accompanied the rapid development of the northwestern agricultural interests, the major portion of which had already been captured by the aggressive movements of the Chicago and Milwaukee and also the St. Paul and Minneapolis Railroad interests. The restoration of the Missouri as a commercial channel offered a way by which the City of St. Louis, Kansas City and nearer points could hope to divide at least this promising commerce and trade with the railway lines which were at that time actively extending their tracks not only into the settlements but far beyond the outposts, the iron horse having in fact become the pioneer in Dakota, now beginning to be viewed as the wheat garden of the United States in the future. Accordingly in December, 1880, an interstate meeting was held at Kansas City for the purpose of considering this subject. One result of the gathering was the formation of the Missouri River Improvement Association, with Col. Hersey Coates as president, a prominent leader of Kansas City enterprises, and H. J. Latshaw and E. O. Stanard, of St. Louis, as vice presidents. The declared purpose of the organization was the securing of appropriations from the National Government, for the improvement of the Missouri River. A prior convention had been held in Kansas City in October preceding for the purpose of arranging for the establishment of a barge line to navigate the river; a company had been organized for that purpose and had already a subscribed capital of $130,000. The river improvement organization was an outgrowth of that gathering. Here we have the beginning of a work that has since enlisted the best efforts of the people of Dakota aided by the people of the great valley, and in aid of which the Government has appropriated and expended many millions of dollars. The work is still going forward; but the railways have managed to control the great bulk of the trade nevertheless, and bid fair to hold their advantage as long as they are able to meet the demands of the constantly growing commerce. But a day is anticipated when the railways will be inadequate to carry away the vast product of northwestern farms and herds, and instead of aiming to depend upon rail carriage will be compelled to turn to the river to float away the surplus, as has been the case in the populous regions of Europe.

From the valuable statistics furnished at this meeting it was learned that the Missouri Valley country proper contains 215,000 square miles, and at that day had a population of 4,000,000. Its stable wealth was $700,000,000, and it was producing annually a half a billion bushels of grain. The memorial to Congress demanded a survey of the entire river to Fort Benton, the removal of snags, the deepening of the channel, the protection of the lands bordering the river from the damaging erosive action of the water. It also asked for the organization of a permanent Missouri River Improvement Association to promote whatever pertained to the improvement of the river and the interests connected with its navigation as a commercial channel.

The disastrous floods that mark the annual breaking up of the western rivers have been the subject that has elicited the attention of the Government for many years. Western people are familiar with this general subject, and with the efforts that have been made, from time to time, to provide some method of preventing the serious results that accompany the annual overflow of our great rivers, results which include human life, the destruction of material property of such prodigious value that it defies computation, and the irreparable loss of still greater moment of vast areas of our most productive lands. Many millions of public money have been freely provided by Congress for the purpose of preventive remedies to ameliorate, if not entirely prevent, these woeful events, and the best engineering skill the country possesses has been employed to direct the expenditure of these funds, but we still have the floods and continue to pay our annual tribute in life, suffering, wrecked homes and fortunes and fruitful acres to the devouring and insatiate element of destruction.

In 1881 more than usual attention was directed to this subject following the unprecedented floods of the year. A Mississippi River improvement convention was held at St. Louis, and following that a separate convention was called and held at Kansas City, Mo., for the purpose of considering more immediately the subject of improving the Missouri River.

At the earlier convention held at St. Louis, Mr. L. E. Cooley, of the United States river survey, advocated the necessity of improving the Missouri River for the purpose of showing that the success of any plan for the improvement of the Mississippi depended upon a prior and similar movement to improve the Missouri. The improved Mississippi depended largely upon the heavy bulk freight in need of cheap transportation upon points along the tributaries, hence their improvement was relatively of as great commercial value as that of the main streams. Furthermore, the cost of permanent improvement of the Mississippi would be largely augmented if not ruinous, unless prosecuted in connection with improvement of the rivers emptying their volume into its channel. The land appreciation and reclamation alone, on the Missouri, would equal in value the cost of its radical improvement, to say nothing of its value as an aid to permanency of the work to be done on the Mississippi, then the recipient of costly sandbars from above. The Missouri had been studied closely by the engineers who had been engaged in expending bagatelle appropriations and on their authority, it was stated, that :

The Missouri could be improved to Sioux City, and as well to the mouth of the Yellowstone, for $10,000 per mile, this improvement to be radical, giving a low-water width of 1,000 feet at the mouth, decreasing to about seven hundred feet at Sioux City, which width could be held to the mouth of the Yellowstone. The discharge of the stream at low water was ample to give a theoretical depth of twelve feet. We can knock off 50 per cent if we choose, and still have eight feet to the Yellowstone. And the question was asked whether an equal amount of navigation could be got from the Upper Mississippi or the Ohio for the same money.

The characteristic wanderings of the Missouri had given rise to the saying that "the Missouri has a mortgage on every foot of land between the bluffs." An improvement would absolutely reclaim from the river bed about four hundred square miles, and appreciate the value of an additional 4,000 square miles of bottom lands, rendering it safe from overflow. Ice gorges would not form, destructive floods would be less frequent, and probably flood lines would be lowered. In fact, it would just about cure all the serious ills the river was heir to.

An area of 524,000 square miles, nearly one-half the whole drainage of the Mississippi and its three main tributaries, and equal, if not superior, in richness of mineral and agricultural products, is drained by the Missouri River, a fact which of itself gives to its improvement national importance, especially when it can be so accurately demonstrated that the two rivers are inseparable when improvement, permanent and valuable, is being considered. It was an important factor in the attainment of the result desired by the people of the whole Mississippi Valley, and without it the work of the Mississippi convention at St. Louis would have proved fruitless. An appropriation for the Missouri was demanded both by its intrinsic value and as being essential to the permanent good to be derived from investments made in response to the demands of the St. Louis meeting.

The St. Louis convention referred to in the above statement was held in that city in February, 1881, and was a convention exclusively of those interested only in the improvement of the Mississippi River. Hence the advice and counsel given by the friends of the Missouri River Improvement Association.

A convention called the Missouri River Improvement Convention was soon after called to meet at St. Joseph, Mo., November 29, 1881. The object of this assembly was to take action to secure the interests of the Missouri River in any bill presented to Congress that proposed to provide aid toward the improvement of western rivers. Municipal corporations in all the states and territories lying contiguous to the Missouri River were invited to send delegates.

No account is found of the assembling and proceedings of this convention, though delegates were chosen from some of the upper river sections, those from the southern district of Dakota being Sanford B. Coulson, George R. Scougal, J. L. Foskett, Abraham Adler, J. C. McVay, Leighton Wynn, J. R. Sanborn, and C. J. B. Harris. There may have been a consultation of the leading promoters. There were at this time indications of rivalry between the Missouri and Mississippi interests which might work injury when the projects of the dual sections were presented to congress, a situation that it was all-important to avoid. Throughout Dakota Territory at this time and for several years following the people's minds were taken up with the wonderful immigration, the rapid extension of railways, and the consequent expansion of settlement covering all the territory east of the Missouri River. [See following chapter for later river conventions.]

THE CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD IN DAKOTA

The Central Pacific Railway Company was one of the leading transportation companies in the United States. It owned and operated nearly three thousand miles of railway in California and Pacific Coast states and territories, and numerous steamship lines. With the Union Pacific, it formed the great continental railroad from Omaha, on the Missouri River, to San Francisco, on the Pacific. Hon. Leland Stanford was president of the company, and C. P. Huntington, vice president, and Charles Crocker were associated with him. It was the pioneer transcontinental railway. It was organized under the name of the Western Pacific three years before the organization of the Union Pacific, as early as 1862, to build a line east, and during the following six years built to Promontory, Utah, where it was met by the Union Pacific from Omaha, and the Pacific and Atlantic seaboard were connected by links of steel.

The earnings of the company in the early '80s were about twenty-five million dollars per annum. It was this powerful, experienced and aggressive organization that had decided to cut loose from the Union Pacific and build an independent line from its terminal in Utah to the Missouri River and probably beyond.

The cause of the proposed rupture was similar to that which has led all enterprising transportation companies to enlarge their field and secure new territory. The Union Pacific had already trespassed, or was about to trespass, upon the territory of the Central Pacific in the Northern Pacific territory, so that retaliation was justified. Jay Gould was then a power in the Union Pacific and in southwestern transportation lines, and the Central Pacific was desirous of securing connections in that region, and railway corporations seem to have learned that if they want something of value from a brother corporation they must fight for it or buy it. The Central had probably vainly exhausted its diplomacy in endeavoring to secure that which it coveted and felt that it must have, and failing, had applied to the court of last resort, which was to build the lines it needed.

Going back just about one decade it was discovered by an item in an early day newspaper that there was then some friction between these companies that promised competitive lines instead of combined forces. The item states that:

An important movement in connection with the Union and Central Pacific railroads is coming to the surface. These two roads, forming the through line to the Pacific coast, have never been able to agree very well, the point of junction being at Ogden, Utah. The Union Pacific has about perfected arrangements for building an independent line west from Ogden to the Pacific coast, thereby giving them a through line. The Central will therefore be compelled to build from Ogden east to the Missouri River. In this Dakota may have a great interest as the most practicable line will be down the Niobrara River and through Southern Dakota to connect with one of the great lines now pointing in this direction from the East.

At that time there was no railway in Dakota. The Sioux City & Pacific and the St. Paul line were at Sioux City.

The surveyor-in-chief of this new line was Mr. Warner, who had been connected with the company a number of years. He reached the Missouri River at Niobrarah in November, 1881. He made no secret of the work he was engaged in, having come through from Corinne, Utah, and had been in the field for six months. He claimed that he had found the best route ever surveyed by a western railroad company. He gave no credit to reports of compromise with the Union Pacific, stating that his company had already expended thousands of dollars in the survey, and had actually bought the iron needed for 700 miles of new railroad. Speaking of the route, Warner said it was projected from the south pass of the Rocky Mountains to the headwaters of the Niobrara River, crossing the boundary line of Wyoming and Utah at Bear River; thence through Mintah, Sweetwater, Carbon, Albany and Laramie counties to the east boundary of Wyoming, where the Niobrara River crosses the boundary, a distance of 450 miles; thence east to Keha Paha; thence south to Niobrarah, where the bridge will span the Missouri; thence to Yankton. A branch would be built from Yankton to LeMars, Ia., making a connection with the Illinois Central. Locators and graders were expected to get to work in the spring of 1882.

Capt. N. W. Ellis was the assistant engineer in charge of the eastern portion of the line, with headquarters at Yankton. He made the preliminary surveys and did some locating work in the fall of 1881, from Yankton to Keha Paha, and at the latter place met the party under Mr. Warner. This survey began at the intersection of Douglas Avenue and Seventh Street, Yankton; thence west on Seventh to the city limits; thence running north of the Hayward farm, made a tangent to near Lakeport, Bon Homme County; thence west, passing Springfield two miles north of the city; thence to a point on the Missouri River opposite the City of Niobrarah, crossing to the town, and continuing up the stream a mile or more to a favorable place for crossing, where the survey crossed to the north side into Todd County, Dak.; thence west to Keha Paha, where Mr. Warner was met. Warner's line had been surveyed north of the Niobrara River, and his surveying party was at Pine Ridge, Dak., in October, indicating that the preliminary survey had taken notice of the topography of the country north of the forty-third parallel.

Rumors were current a little later that the differences between the rival companies had been adjusted and further operations would be suspended by the Central Pacific, whose engineer's office at Yankton remained occupied, however, during the winter.

In January, 1882, the Journal of Boston gave out this intelligence:

In relation to the Union Pacific and Central Pacific threats to enter each other's territory, it is claimed that the projected road of the Central Pacific will be from Corinne, through the South Pass, down the old emigrant trail, through the Sweetwater and North Platte valleys, to a point about sixty miles of old Fort Laramie, thence over to the headwaters of the Niobrara River, down which valley the road will pass to the Missouri River, at or near Yankton. This extension will be about nine hundred miles long, running almost parallel with the Union Pacific and about one hundred miles north. It is maintained by the managers that this road will be less likely to interruption in the winter on account of snow drifts than the Union Pacific. The work of construction will begin in early spring. Sixty thousand tons of steel rails have been ordered from England for this projected line.

This route, above outlined, was the one selected by the first railroad enterprise chartered by the Legislature of Dakota as early as 1864-65, called the Missouri River & Niobrara Valley Railroad Company, and designed to build the north branch of the Union Pacific road from Sioux City through Southern Dakota, and out to the south pass by way of the Niobrarah.

The rumors of a peace pact between the warring interests continued, and were finally verified early in the winter by the announcement that the rivals had reached a basis of settlement that would give to the Central all the eastern connections it demanded and render its independent line unnecessary. The leading parties to the arrangement were Mr. C. P. Huntington, president of the Central Pacific and Southern Pacific companies, and on the other side Mr. Jay Gould, president of the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and the representative of the New Orleans Pacific, Missouri Pacific, Kansas & Texas, St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Texas, and the International & Great Western. These railroads included both of the trunk lines and the connections necessary to reach the eastern seaboard.

Mr. Huntington was accorded by Mr. Gould about all he demanded, and the result was an amicable adjustment which made the Central Pacific, for all practical purposes, a continental line.

Dakota Territory contributed an entire county to the project, which may remain a monument to its public spirit if not to its magnanimity.

DAKOTA CONTRIBUTES A COUNTY TO NEBRASKA

During the time occupied in these preliminary surveys of the Central Pacific it became apparent that the road, if constructed, would pass from LeMars through Southeastern Dakota to a point on the Missouri River, nearly opposite the mouth of the Niobrara River; thence across the Missouri to a point on the north side of the Niobrara; thence west in Todd County, Dakota Territory, a distance of fifty or sixty miles at least, possibly more, if it should cross to the north of the forty-third parallel of latitude. Todd County was then included in the Big Sioux Reservation, but within the boundaries of the Territory of Dakota as defined by the organic act. Inasmuch as the territorial boundaries were subject to change at any time by Congress, Senator Saunders, of Nebraska, conceiving that the portion of Dakota west of the Missouri River, through which the Central Pacific would run, might prove a desirable addition to his state, introduced in the Senate a bill cutting off so much of Dakota Territory as extended south of the forty-third parallel, west of the Missouri, and attaching it to Nebraska. Following is the text of the Saunders bill:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

That the northern boundary of the State of Nebraska shall be, and hereby is, extended so as to include all that portion of the Territory of Dakota lying south of the 43d parallel of north latitude and east of the Kaha Paha River and west of the main channel of the Missouri River; and when the Indian title to the lands thus described shall be extinguished, the jurisdiction over such lands shall be and hereby is extended to the State of Nebraska, and the northern boundary of the state shall be and hereby is extended to said 43d parallel as fully and effectually as if said lands had been included within the boundaries of said state at the time of its admission to the Union; reserving to the United States the original right of soil in said lands, and of disposing of the same; provided that this act so far as jurisdiction is concerned, shall not take effect until the President shall, by proclamation, declare that the Indian title to said lands has been extinguished, nor shall it take effect until the State of Nebraska shall have assented to the provisions of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate on the 4th of February, with a number of amendments, none of which affected the main purpose of the measure, being designed to protect the Indians and the United States in the matter of preserving the right of soil, all of which were adopted, whereupon Senator Plumb, of Kansas, said:

I should like to inquire why it is that the State of Nebraska has not, by some home authority, made some proffer of its wishes in regard to this matter, and I should like to ask further, what is the feeling of the people of Dakota about it? We are taking away what is apparently valuable property from the Territory of Dakota, which is here seeking admission as a state. It seems to me we ought to have regard for the wishes of those people, and the fact that the State of Nebraska apparently never has put in an appearance here or asked anything about it ought to enter into the considerations bearing upon this question.

Senator Saunders replied: "This bill was before the Senate more than a year ago, nearly two years ago, and it was thoroughly canvassed both in the committee and in the Senate. Several times I think it was up, and finally it was adopted exactly as reported, and the amendments which have been agreed to this morning were suggested by the senator from Vermont, and remove all possible objection to the measure. So far as the territory is concerned, it belongs to an Indian reservation, and there are no persons particularly affected by it, because there are no white people on the reservation, and I do not know that there are any Indians on it now. The object of the bill is to straighten the line between Dakota and Nebraska. If the line had been straight, or if there had been a well defined line, no bill would have been brought before Congress in regard to the matter. The bill provides that the line shall go up the Niobrara River to the mouth of the Kaha Paha River. The Niobrara River in many places is a very wide and shallow river, changing its channel frequently. Sometimes in twenty-four hours the channel has removed a quarter of a mile or more. So difficult has it been to decide what is the real channel of that stream that one of the judges in that district told me himself that he had released a prisoner and refused to act upon a case because he would not take it upon himself to decide the northern boundary of Nebraska when it was the main channel of that stream, because it was so difficult to tell where that channel was. For these and other reasons, the main reason being to straighten the line, which would have been done when the act was passed originally if Congress had known anything where it would be, and not for the purpose alone of attaching territory to Nebraska, I ask for the passage of the bill. It does not affect anybody's interest particularly, but straightens the line and gives the map an appearance which it would not have without this enactment."

Senator Cameron of Wisconsin said: "I desire to inquire of the senator from Nebraska how extensive is the territory which it is proposed by the bill to transfer from the Territory of Dakota to the State of Nebraska; that is, how many square miles does it contain?"

Senator Saunders replied: "I cannot tell exactly, but it is about forty miles in length and probably there is a mean width of about three miles, perhaps not quite so much. There are, I think, over two townships of land, but it is in such an irregular shape that I cannot tell exactly the quantity."

Mr. Hale—Is there any population there whatever?

Mr. Saunders—There is no population, and no population is affected by the bill at all.

Mr. Teller—I should like to inquire if the Indians are not affected by it?

Mr. Saunders—Not the Indians themselves.

Mr. Dawes—The Indians have all been removed to the Indian Territory.

Mr. Edmunds—At the point of the bayonet.

Mr. Dawes—They have been removed at the point of the bayonet, so that the bill does not affect them.

The bill was then further amended so that it should not shut out the free navigation of the Missouri River, and passed.

The bill was also passed by the House, and it does not appear that any voice from Dakota was raised against it, though in place of two townships it took away from the territory an entire county, Todd, embracing sixteen or seventeen townships instead of two, as stated by the Nebraska senator. And what would have been the action of the Senate had they but known that the territory transferred by the bill had been the home of a white population who had organized a county therein, held elections, elected county officers and members of the Legislature, one of whom was made speaker of the Dakota House of Representatives; that a county seat was located and legally incorporated named Mixville, and the organization maintained until the land on that side of the river, about 1869, was by treaty included in the great Sioux Reservation? These were the facts regarding that section of the territory. This straightening of the boundary was not the purpose, or rather was not the reason, for desiring the change at all. Nebraska had prospered for about sixteen years under the excellent boundary marked by two large rivers, and there was no demand for the change among the people; but the Central Pacific Railroad, from LeMars, Ia., to Ogden, Utah, had been surveyed across the coveted tract, and Senator Saunders and his friends saw a way to secure it, together with the prospectively valuable town which would grow up near the mouth of the Niobrara River, and hence the senator's discovery of the deformed, ill-shapen boundary that seemed to be disturbing his rest.

SPOTTED TAIL ASSASSINATED

Spotted Tail, head chief of the Brule Sioux Indians and one of the most influential Indians in the territory, was shot and instantly killed at Rosebud Indian Agency on Friday, August 5, 1881. His assassin was Crow Dog, ex-chief of Indian police. The tragic affair was the result of an old grudge which had existed for a long time. There was great excitement among the Indians as a consequence. Gen. John Cook was the United States agent of these Indians at the time—the same General Cook who was given command of the first military expedition up the Missouri in 1863, but was superseded by General Sully before the expedition got under way. From the agent, a circumstantial account of the killing was had. Spotted Tail had been summoned to Washington, and before leaving, on the 5th, he held a council with a large number of his people concerning the purpose of his Washington visit. After the council broke up all left for their homes, Spotted Tail riding at the head of a party that happened to be going his way. An Indian who was riding close to Spotted Tail relates the killing, which he saw:

I saw Crow Dog coming toward us in his wagon. He had his wife with him. He got out of his wagon and was stooping down when Spotted Tail rode up to him. He suddenly raised up and shot Spot through the left breast. The chief fell from his horse, but rose from his feet and took three or four steps toward Crow Dog, endeavoring to draw his pistol. He then reeled and fell backward, dead. Crow Dog jumped in his wagon and drove off at full speed toward his camp, some nine miles distant.

No outbreak followed the shooting, but there was intense excitement among the Brules. Spotted Tail had many people in his tribe who were not friendly to him, hence the shooting may be said to have been quietly endorsed by this unfriendly element. Under the treaty of 1868 Crow Dog was amenable to the law for his crime, and in pursuance of that treaty the agent ordered Crow Dog arrested by the Indian police at the agency. This was done and the accused was sent to Fort Niobrara for safe keeping until his crime could be inquired into by the Government. The enmity between Spot and Crow Dog had been of long standing. It was reported that jealousy was the cause, but this was not sustained by Agent Cook and others who took great pains to find out the truth. On the 4th of July preceding the tragedy the parties met, when Crow Dog placed the muzzle of his cocked rifle against the breast of Spotted Tail, and told him he was going to shoot him. Drawing himself up to his full height, Spotted Tail looked into the eyes of his antagonist and said: "Why don't you shoot then? If I had my gun against your breast I would shoot." Crow Dog dropped his weapon and retired.

Spotted Tail was not an hereditary chief. He gained the place of head chief of the Brules by his prowess in war and by his superior intellectual strength. He was a man of rare diplomatic talent.

The chief, Crazy Dog, was next in line of succession to the vacant head chieftainship; but the agent, General Cook, being convinced that he should not be promoted, procured a delay. At this time the United States or the Great Father, claimed the right of consultation in the appointment of chiefs and in relation to this succession Agent Cook addressed the following official statement to the commissioner of Indian affairs, which contains the history of the tragedy and the causes:

Rosebud Agency, D. T., August 10, 1881.

Sir: I stated in my letter of yesterday the murder of Spotted Tail by Crow Dog and an accomplice named Black Crow, both head men of the Brule Sioux, and that it was the result of a long standing feud. While this is partially true, new evidence has been developed which throws a different light upon the affair. It seems to have been the object of a long and well matured plan to rid themselves of Spotted Tail. The conspirators were few, but of a desperate character, who had fully made up their minds that if the chief would not resign they would kill him. The ringleader was Black Crow, who now makes no secret of his intentions. His ambition was to hold Spotted Tail's position, and if it could not be accomplished by fair means they did not scruple to use the most foul and cowardly means. Upon ascertaining these facts I had Black Crow arrested as accessory to the murder.

Crow Dog and the company, with their leader gone, the disaffected element will rapidly disperse and no longer exist as an organization. In connection with the subject of a head chief over the people, I beg leave to offer the following suggestions, which I trust will receive your early consideration:

The position of a head chief is a hindrance to civilization. The main object of this person is to centralize all power in himself. To do this he must strive to continue tribal relations. To prevent his people from scattering over the reservation for the purpose of taking up allotments of land, he must gather them in villages where they can keep alive their barbarous customs, dances, etc. In short, to retain his hold as chief over the nation, he must act in opposition to the measures adopted by the Government for the ultimate civilization of the Indians. The minor chiefs are already squabbling for the office, but I have informed them the appointment and recognition of so important a position must come from the office of Indian affairs. I have, therefore, to recommend that no successor to Spotted Tail be appointed. That his son, Young Spotted Tail, be recognized as chief of his own immediate band, and that if at any time a representative of this tribe shall be desired at Washington for conferring upon the interests of his people, he shall be chosen with special reference to his intelligence and loyalty to the Government. Of this the agent would be the best judge. If the office of Indian affairs should direct this, it will forever preclude the possibility of such an occurrence as that of the 5th inst. Being of the opinion that this is necessary, it should be represented at the conference with the honorable secretary of the interior. I appointed White Thunder, chief of the Loafer Sioux, to take Spotted Tail's place in the delegation. He is a man of barely ordinary ability, but of unquestioned loyalty, and was the only available person to be found at the time. I trust my action in the matter will receive your approval. I have to add that prompt action in arresting the murderer of Spotted Tail has had the most soothing effect upon the people at large, all excitement allayed, and at present one would not imagine that we had just passed through a crisis during which some rash Indian or white might easily have turned a peaceful ending into a terrible tragedy. Monday orders will be given to 200 freighters to proceed to the steamboat landing for supplies, as I deem it a better plan to keep the young men busily engaged, thus preventing them taking advantage of the present situation and stirring up trouble.

CROW DOG IN COURT

The United States Court convened in Deadwood in September, 1881, and Crow Dog having committed his offense in that judicial district he was taken from Fort Niobrara to Deadwood for trial. The Deadwood Times gave an interesting sketch of the case, which is here produced:

For the first time, as we understand, in the history of the country, an Indian is held for trial for the murder of another Indian. Spotted Tail, a noted Sioux chief, was shot and instantly killed a few weeks ago by Crow Dog, a member of the same tribe. The crime was committed upon an Indian reservation by an Indian upon an Indian. Crow Dog was brought here for trial, and Mr. A. J. Plowman, a rising young member of the Deadwood bar, was engaged to defend him. Plowman is regarded with absolute confidence by the redskins, as he cleared a half-breed named Gallineaux who killed a white man, as it appeared in the testimony, in self-defense. As to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, we have no opinion to express, as we do not think it in the province of any journal to try any case, to acquit or convict in the advance of a trial. The case, however, presents several features which have never appeared in any murder trial in this country before. We have learned the following facts concerning Crow Dog and the Indian punishment for murder: Crow Dog is a Brule Sioux; he was born, he informs us, on Horsestealing Creek; where this stream is we have been unable to learn, but think it is in Montana. He has one brother named Brave Bull, and a sister. Crow Dog, as near as he can figure, is about forty-eight years old, has one wife and eight children. Indians are nearly all polygamists, but it appears Crow Dog is an exception. His family of children is unusually large for an Indian. Crow Dog claims he has been punished and made reparation for the killing of Spotted Tail, according to the custom and practice of his tribe from time immemorial. As Indians neither have nor understand courts, the surviving relatives are by duty and their religion, bound to demand reparation in goods and gifts for their murdered relative, or to appease his spirit by a bloody vengeance. Their religion is the primitive one of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth—a payment in goods in lieu of blood. In the case of Crow Dog, as in other offenses of like nature, the relatives of his victim and his own meet together in council, talk the damages over until they come to some agreement as to what they should be, and have an understanding as to how much property shall be given to make peace. The pipe of peace and fellowship is then smoked, the gifts distributed, and there the matter ends in friendship and harmony—the offense is forgiven and forgotten. The punishment of murder is solely the affair of the deceased's family and relatives. The tribe at large has no power, according to their customs, to take measures concerning it. In the case of Crow Dog the relatives of both parties held the customary powwow, and Crow Dog's brother, Brave Bull, paid for him to Spotted Tail's numerous families the following property, which was distributed among them: Eight horses, $50.00 in money, and one blanket valued at $30.00. The settlement was sufficient and Spotted Tail's shade supposed to be satisfied. When Spotted Tail removed his rival, Big Mouth, in much the same manner in which Crow Dog gave him his quietus, Spot satisfied the relatives of his victim by a gift of twenty horses. It sometimes happens no arrangement as to the amount of gifts can be made, then blood must flow. The relatives of the deceased must avenge his death. Any of the relatives of the criminal will answer the atonement, whether he or she be innocent or guilty. Some one of the family must be sent to the happy hunting grounds to appease the spirit of the murdered one. It is this bloody, heathenish belief which has caused Indians to massacre their best white friends, with whom they have been living on terms of amity and friendship. All whites are supposed by them to be relatives, and one will do as well as another for the purposes of vengeance. While they hold these doctrines, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to maintain a lasting peace with these people. Should a white person, rightly or wrongly, kill one of them, his relatives declare war on the entire white race. The trial of Crow Dog will be the first of the kind ever held in our courts and promises to be one of great interest.

The trial of Crow Dog (Kan-gi-shun-ca) took place before the United States District Court in Deadwood, Judge Moody, presiding, at the March term, 1882. The prisoner was described as a fine specimen of the North American Indian, about forty years old, medium height, light complexion, long glossy hair terminating in curls at his shoulders, a clear penetrating eye and rather pleasing features. The indictment against him consisted of two counts, murder and manslaughter, and recited the fact that on the 5th day of August, 1881, the defendant shot and killed, without cause or provocation, and with malice aforethought, one Sin-ta-ge-le-seka, commonly known as Spotted Tail. Attached to the indictment was the written pleading of the prisoner to the effect that he had already been convicted, punished and forever discharged of the offense charged in the indictment, by the judgment of the court of the Sioux Nation of Indians, rendered at Rosebud Agency, in the Territory of Dakota, August 5, 1881, according to the local laws of said tribe; and that he is not guilty.

A satisfactory jury was impanelled after considerable delay. A large proportion of the qualified jurymen of the Black Hills had experienced difficulties with the Sioux Indians, and were thereby prejudiced. Finally the following named were sworn in to well and truly try the cause, and a true verdict render according to the evidence: John Lawrence, Joseph King, Levi Daffebach, Richard R. Crowe, Louis Nathan, George Ayers, Wm. Hatfield, F. E. Batchelor, W. C. Linn, F. W. Hamilton, C. C. Fyler, John Witton.

The trial consumed about ten days, and concluded with a verdict of guilty of murder, and Crow Dog was sentenced to be hanged on the 11th of May. From the judgment of the court Crow Dog's counsel gave notice of appeal to the Supreme Court.

CROW DOG'S APPEAL

An appeal was taken and the Supreme Court gave a hearing to the case at the October term, 1882, and affirmed the decision of the lower court. Crow Dog was again sentenced to be hung on the 11th day of May, 1883, but his attorney, A. J. Plowman obtained a stay of execution until the case could be heard in the United States Supreme Court. It was possible that the pending effort to make a treaty with the Sioux for a portion of their reservation, might modify conditions in Crow Dog's case. The Government would not wish to provoke any animosity on the part of the Indians while this treaty was pending, and the hanging of Crow Dog to satisfy the white man's idea of justice would seem to the Indians like an unwarranted infringement on their tribal laws under which Crow Dog had already been tried and acquitted, or rather paid the penalty of his crime imposed by his own people according to their laws, and for that reason should the United States Supreme Court fail to reverse the territorial court it was probable President Arthur would be appealed to to pardon the offender.

Crow Dog was confined in the jail at Deadwood, and a few days following the action of the territorial court, he escaped from the jail. He was to be executed soon unless the Supreme Court should reverse the decision of the territorial tribunal, and his escape gave much anxiety to his keepers. He had been so long in confinement that his guards had been accustomed to allow him unusual liberties. It was conjectured that he had concluded to pay a visit to his family at Pine Ridge, and he knew of no reason why he should ask anybody's permission. He therefore trudged off toward the agency, and fortunately met with a small party of his Indian friends who sympathized with him and had no friendship for Spotted Tail, and these escorted him to the agency, providing food and comfortable blankets for the journey, which was made in November. Here Crow Dog was found a month later, though he had made no effort to remain concealed; but his presence at home and at the agency had worked up considerable of the old time animosity in the breasts of those who sympathized with Spotted Tail, and there were serious apprehensions of an outbreak. The agent, James G. Wright, apprehending trouble, sent word to the authorities at Deadwood to send for their prisoner. Crow Dog had been suffering for a long time from an old arrow wound that had only partially healed, which gave him much pain and was growing more severe. He had concluded he had not much longer to live anyway, but was determined to die fighting, rather than consent to return to Deadwood. He was encouraged, however, by the marshal, who sent after him to believe that the United States Supreme Court would release him from the death sentence, and finally consented to return and did so. About the last of December following, the United States Tribunal took up his case and decided it in his favor. The case was heard on an application for a writ of habeas corpus, and the court in concluding its opinion said:

The question, therefore, presented in this court is whether the express letter of section 2146 of the revised statutes, which excludes from the jurisdiction of the United States the case of a crime committed in the Indian country by one Indian against the person and property of another Indian, has been repealed. This court holds that it has not; that in such a case as the present one the Indians have a right to try and punish the criminal according to their own laws and customs without interference from the United States; that the United States District Court of Dakota had no jurisdiction; and that the imprisonment of Crow Dog is therefore illegal. The writ of habeas corpus and certiorari prayed for will accordingly be issued.

The final acquittal of the Indian on the ground that he had been once placed in jeopardy for the offense according to the laws of his tribe was received in the First Judicial District with expressions of satisfaction, and A. J. Plowman, the attorney, who had pushed the case to the court of last resort, confident that he would win in the end, won for him many demonstrations of commendation.

ARTESIAN WELLS

Necessity is said to be the mother of invention, and this parentage will not be questioned in many cases, and it might be added that it is frequently that necessity leads to important discoveries. It was necessity that drove the City of Yankton and the Dakota Southern Railroad Company to encourage the sinking of an artesian well for the purpose not only of securing a water supply for domestic use; but also power sufficient to be of service in case of conflagration. Yankton was paying high rates for insurance because of the lack of fire protection, and was also paying expensively for water for domestic purposes. This water was hauled in tanks from the Missouri River and distributed to the towns people at from 15 to 25 cents per barrel. Well water could be had in abundance but not of good quality, which discouraged the sinking of ordinary wells. Yankton had reached that stage in its growth and value of its improvements when a system of waterworks was demanded, adequate for all purposes. There was no doubt that a supply could be obtained from the Missouri, but the expense of constructing suitable machinery for hoisting the water from the river to an elevation where it could be distributed to the various parts of the city was a serious handicap. Another bonded debt following so close upon the aid voted to the Dakota Southern Railroad was not to be considered. About this time the officers of the Dakota Southern Railroad Company, who were interested not only in a water supply but also in discovering a supply of cheaper fuel, induced Mr. I. T. Farrand, a Chicago artesian well borer, to visit Yankton for the purpose of investigating the conditions bearing upon the water question. Farrand was not a professional geologist, but had been engaged in artesian well work for a number of years, and was therefore considered an authority who could be profitably consulted, and whose counsel could be safely followed should he conclude that an artesian supply was practicable at Yankton. After a few days spent in investigation, Mr. Farrand at a public meeting, assured the people that in his opinion they could safely make the venture for an artesian water supply, with a strong probability of disclosing an abundance of coal. Here the matter rested, and Mr. Farrand returned to Chicago. His price for sinking a well was $3 per foot, and he was prepared to go 1,000 feet if necessary. The local company had but $700 subscribed at the time, and the making of the contract was deferred to a more convenient season.

A portion of the subscribers to the stock of the new Artesian Well Company at Yankton held a meeting in that city September 9, 1880, and elected Rev. Joseph Ward, chairman, and W. S. Bowen, secretary. E. T. White, Wm. P. Dewey, C. J. B. Harris, and J. W. C. Morrison were appointed to draft a constitution and by-laws for the organization, and to report the same at the next meeting. A committee of three consisting of Isaac Piles, Frank L. VanTassel and E. E. Hudson was appointed to correspond with parties engaged in the business of boring artesian wells, and to select a site for the proposed well. The meeting then adjourned to the 13th, at which articles of incorporation were adopted and signed by the stockholders. The location of the well had not been decided upon. The following are the names of the stockholders: George E. Hawley, E. E. Hudson, Isaac Piles, Joseph Ward, L. M. Purdy, C. J. B. Harris, John M. Fogerty, E. T. White, John Krause, Geo. H. Hand, E. Miner, John O. Bates, Robert Cox, A. W. Lavender, T. B. Burleigh, VanTassel & Miner, Adler & Ohlman, S. K. Felton, Joseph Pier, J. W. C. Morrison, A. W. Howard, W. P. Dewey, Wilcox & Williams, J. C. McVay, J. L. Pennington, S. B. Coulson, D.

McCully, J. L. Foskett, Jacob Max, W. H. McVay, Bowen & Kingsbury, W. B. Valentine, Stier & Ferdinand, W. H. Carr, E. P. Stone, Harry Katz, John Foerster, and Fred Schnauber. By-laws were adopted, and a board of directors selected as follows: J. C. McVay, A. W. Lavender, Isaac Piles, E. E. Hudson, and F. L. VanTassel. J. C. McVay was elected president of the company; E. T. White, secretary and John M. Fogerty, treasurer. The following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, By the board of directors of the Yankton Artesian Well and Mining Company, and the board of directors hereby orders, that the sum of $10 per share, of the subscribed capital stock be, and the same is, levied, payable to the treasurer of said company at the office of said company, in the City of Yankton, as follows: Five dollars per share, payable on October 1st, next, and $5.00 per share, payable on the 1st of November following. That on the 10th day of November, 1880, all unpaid assessments shall be delinquent, and that on the 30th of November, 1880, at the office of the company in the City of Yankton, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m., all delinquent stock, if any, shall be sold as provided by law.

A seal and stationery were ordered, and the meeting adjourned.

A number of propositions had been received from artesian well borers east, the capital was already subscribed ample in amount, and a contract for sinking the well was certain to be made within a reasonable time. The optimistic opinion was that the water problem for Yankton and vicinity was about as good as solved.

WALLACE'S THEORY

In June, 1887, Samuel M. Wallace, a scientist, inventor, and much interested in territorial matters, who resided at Washington, D. C., learning that the great artesian well at Aberdeen was supposed to be failing, felt called upon to give out a statement regarding the artesian supply, based upon several years of intelligent study of the subject, and personal explorations of many portions of the artesian belts, which may prove valuable and is certainly interesting. Experience would tend to support Mr. Wallace. It was the experience of a majority and possibly all of the hundreds of wells sunk during a few years following the first discovery, that the wells began to show a diminution of pressure and loss of volume after a few years in some cases, and this decrease would in some instances continue until the well had to be abandoned and a new one was opened. Mr. Wallace holds, in substance, that the remedy would have been found by sinking the well deeper. He says:

It is practically impossible for an artesian well to fail. Of course, the first source of supply may wane, and the force decrease. But the well should be sunk into the bowels of the earth until one of the subterranean streams be struck, and then the flow is as ceaseless and perennial as the verdure of the tropics. I apprehend that economy led the Aberdonians into a cessation of their work too soon. I don't know how deep their well is, nor does it make any difference. If it is seeming to fail, that is sign enough that it is not deep enough. Away down in the midst of the supposed fiery depths of the prairie there are to be found living streams as cold as ice and as hot as fire can make them. Not only Aberdeen, but all prairie cities and counties should seek to find that water. By an upheaval of the Rockies, the fertile acreage of the prairie country became a desert. Millions of acres are still arid land. The artesian well will settle the question of the great American desert. It will settle the question of the Bad Lands, the alkali lands, and all other questions which so largely engage the attention of farmers and agriculturists in this country.

As for my reasons for supposing that these never failing streams abound in the great West, I have no reason beyond actual knowledge. If the sun rises, you see it, don't you? And you don't ask one to tell what reason he has for believing that the sun shines, do you? And if you see a field of wheat or oats, or corn, and tell your friend, "That is a beautiful field of grain," you are not expected to give reasons for believing that you see a field of grain, are you?

I have traced these subterranean streams from their sources and know their courses, and deltas, and mouths. I cannot take you with me in a brief time, all over the ground that it has taken me nearly six years to survey, but I can assure you that by actual study, I know the course of the sub-earthly currents, as well as one knows, and better, the currents which run through the ocean. We teach the ocean currents in the schools, and have, very good maps for them. And this will probably be done for the currents beneath the earth. The artesian well will find an abundance of water everywhere in the prairie country if it is sunk deep enough. Not only are there living streams percolating the entire earth, but the well known laws of endosmosis and exosmosis, or the seeping process, make the base of the prairie country a watery bed, just as the hill country is founded on the everlasting granite.

The artesian well will solve the problems of agriculture, because moisture is necessary, and that alone, to make the desert blossom as the rose. Fill Sahara with water, or moisten it deeply, and the weeds which are everywhere, even in the air particles which we breathe—the seeds floating through the air will lodge, extend their roots and bud into promising plants and put forth their foliage. As soon as this first step is taken, the rains will seek the erstwhile barren waste and continue to encourage the enlargement of the vegetable kingdom.

There are enough of these subterranean streams under the prairies of Dakota to wash away all the accumulated alkali of the ages if the people will only permit them to do so. Let them put down their drifts and make an opening for the water to burst forth, and it will do all the work of irrigating, fructifying and enriching the land. Especially is this true of the Black Hills. All of that country is rich with water, and there is a great deal of it on the surface. But the country between Rapid City and Dickinson needs artesian wells more than any other portion of the territory. All should have it, however.

ARTESIAN WELLS IN CLAY COUNTY

It had been given out by some authority that was respected but not heeded, that artesian water would not be found in Dakota east of the James River, or within a very few miles of the eastern valley boundary of the James. The statement was purported to have been made upon geological authority. It was held that the artesian basin which underlaid the country west of the James, extended no further in that direction than the eastern rim of the James Valley, and the early attempts to secure an adequate flow from wells bored in that portion of the territory had been attended with discouraging results. However, the success of one enterprising farmer in the eastern part of Clay County in securing something of a "gusher," turned the attention of many others in that direction, and during the season of 1887 one of the principal industries in that county was the sinking of artesian wells, and nearly all were successful. They tapped a basin of wholesome water that poured out a generous volume, at a moderate depth, which was stated to be five or six hundred feet. It was said by the artesian experts that the flow obtained would diminish in time, that the borers had not gone deep enough. Many of the wells that were sunk during the early years of the artesian era proved to have been too shallow and their pressure was diminished gradually until they ceased to flow, but they were not abandoned. An abundant supply of water remained which could be reached with a pump, propelled by wind power. Others were sunk to a greater depth where a new flow was struck, confirming in effect the theory of Professor Wallace that once the well reaches the true artesian stream there will be no diminishing or hindrance to the flow, that the supply is inexhaustible and the pressure reliable and constant.

Five years later, a former contract by the Yankton Company with Captain Strait having been annulled by the neglect of the contractor to furnish an adequate bond, the company entered into a contract with J. D. Marrs, of the firm of Marrs & Miller, Chicago, on the 31st of December, 1880. The terms of the contract, substantially, were that the contractors should receive $4 per foot for 1,500 feet, and if it was found necessary to go deeper, $5 per foot for an additional 500 feet. No money was to be paid until water was procured or 1,500 feet completed. If no water was reached at a depth of 1,500 feet, then the contractor was to receive 50 per cent of the amount due before they commenced the additional 500 feet. The contractors were allowed until the 1st of March, 1881, in which to commence operations, but they intended to begin as soon as they could get their machinery on the ground and put in order for drilling.

Artesian water was found in this first artesian well sunk in the soil of the Territory of Dakota to be exact, in the forenoon of Monday, August 29, 1881, at a depth of 460 feet, when the water gushed from the top of the pipe filling the well in the bottom of which the bore was started, and from thence ran out over the hill and down the gutters on Fourth and Fifth streets, carrying to the people of the city the glad tidings that the days of water famine were ended. This awakened not a little excitement and elicited many exclamations of rejoicing, and hundreds of people repaired to the scene of operations on the hill. To test the pressure a pipe nineteen feet long and six inches in diameter was with some difficulty screwed down upon the pipe from which the water flowed, and in 30 seconds the water rose through this nineteen feet of pipe and discharged from the top. The contractors contended that the pressure was sufficient to carry a six inch column of water fifty feet above the surface of the ground upon which the well stood, and perhaps higher. A rough calculation made by those in charge fixed the flow in quantity at 216,000 gallons in twenty-four hours, and they concluded that the pressure was increasing. These estimates, it will be understood, were largely modified in time. There was, however, such a feverish anxiety to know all about the new discovery that the two chemists in the city, Drs. F. A. Brecht and E. Webber were at once employed to make an analysis of the liquid in order to determine whether it was suitable for domestic purposes, and each took a sample from the flowing stream and hurried off to his laboratory to make the scientific inquisition.

This well passed through a shale and clay formation to a depth of 340 feet, where it struck an imperfect lime stratum twenty feet in thickness. Below this forty feet more of shale was penetrated, and at a depth of 400 feet the drill entered the water bearing rock—a more solid lime formation. At a depth of 405 feet, which was reached Saturday evening when the workmen quit, the vein was cut which filled the bore to the depth of 130 feet, and it remained in this condition until operations were resumed the succeeding Monday.

The report of the chemists confirmed the most sanguine hopes of the people. Each of the analyzers premised his report by the statement that his analysis had been hurriedly done. Doctor Brecht found that the water contained sulphate of magnesia, sulphate of calcium, phosphate of sodium, chloride of potassium, chloride of sodium and chloride of magnesium. The doctor had not given attention to the proportion of the different ingredients but was satisfied that it was good, wholesome water, suitable for a beverage for man and beast. Dr. E. Webber reported that the water was not objectionable as drinking water; that it contained no organic matter. It was a hard water owing to the presence of such salts as sulphate of magnesia, and sulphate of calcium in abundance. There were also traces of chlorides but not in abundance. A closer analysis would follow.

Intelligence of this good fortune to Yankton spread throughout the country with amazing rapidity. Hundreds of visitors from various parts of the territory made hurried visits to Yankton and to the well, and returned to their homes enthusiastic. There seemed to be a consensus of belief that the problem of an adequate water supply for the settlers of the territory had been solved, and the boring of artesian wells would furnish lucrative employment to many people for many years.

Artesian wells were not a new thing under the sun except to Dakotans. The strike at Yankton brought to light a great deal of artesian lore, whereby it was learned that this peculiar well was named for Artois, France. A well at Aire, in that French province, bored before our War of the Revolution, had since been flowing steadily at the rate of 250 gallons per minute. Another at a place named Lillers, France, claims an age reaching back to the eleventh century. In London it was discovered that the height to which the water rises diminishes with an increased number of wells. This was not encouraging to the advocates of a well for every quarter section. In 1855 the United States Government sent an expedition to bore for water in the Llano estacado, a barren tract in New Mexico. Two wells were sunk, one 641 and the other 860 feet, in neither of which the water came nearer the surface than 110 feet. The three great wells in the United States were located at the time of which we write in St. Louis, Mo., Louisville, Ky., and Charleston, S. C. The St. Louis bore is 1,179 feet in depth, and the water is discharged through a twenty inch pipe at the rate of seventy-five gallons per minute. The Louisville well is a three inch bore and is 2,086 feet deep. The water flows from it at the rate of 330,000 gallons per day, and with a force of ten horse power. The Charleston well was begun in 1848, and after encountering many difficulties flowing water was found at a depth of 1,250 feet, and it flows at the rate of 1,200 gallons per hour. There were a number of flowing wells in and throughout Illinois.

The cost of the boring of the Yankton well was about two thousand five hundred dollars, and the Artesian Well Company had estimated and provided for an expenditure of $10,000.

The first artesian well sunk in Northern Dakota was at Tower City on the line of the Northern Pacific. It was bored in the summer of 1881 by the railway company. Its total depth was 890 feet. In boring the well salt water was struck at a depth of 560 feet, which rose 400 feet in the pipe, and at a depth of 585 feet another flow of salt water and gravel was pierced. At 604 feet fresh water with quicksand was reached, and at a depth of 890 feet the water was found to be pure and wholesome. There was a moderate flow from the mouth of the pipe.

CAPT. PAUL BOYTON

Capt. Paul Boyton was something of a hero, and quite famous during a number of years following the centennial anniversary of American independence. While he had all the ordinary as well as extraordinary methods of achieving fame and acquiring fortune, he cast them all aside and concluded to attain his goal as a solitary navigator of the principal navigable rivers of the world. He had invented a rubber suit or boat in which he encased himself, and when this was properly adjusted and inflated with air it would float easily, carrying along its lone occupant, who was provided with a light double paddle which he used to propel his novel craft. In addition to his rubber boat he had constructed a supply boat, named the "Baby-Mine," dimensions 3 feet in length, 14 inches wide, and 10 inches deep. This was made of sheet copper. In this boat he carried his daily food, his rifle, revolver, ammunition, barometer, thermometer, compass, note books, map, pencils, medicine, shaving outfit, hatchet, matches, fishing tackle, cigars, signal rocket, and flashlights, canned provisions, spirit lamp, and cooking utensils, cement and rubber cloth for repairs, and a pocket knife and watch. Boyton was about thirty-five years old when he navigated the Yellowstone and Missouri rivers in 1881. He was superbly equipped physically—a powerful frame; medium height—not a weak point in his body. He had adopted his novel mode of startling the world for the purpose of accumulating material for a book he intended writing entitled, "Roughing It in Rubber." He had set apart the year 1881 for a voyage down the Yellowstone and Missouri rivers. He had counted on going to the head of navigation on the Yellowstone, or at least to Fort Custer at the mouth of the Big Horn, as the starting point, but he was constrained to change his plan and make Glendive, the town where the Northern Pacific Railway struck the Yellowstone, the starting point. He left St. Paul, Minn., with his navigator's outfit the 10th of September, taking the Northern Pacific, and reached Glendive in due course, made no tarrying, but encased himself and embarked from that port on the Yellowstone, September 12th, near evening, and please note that he had no companion except the aquatic inhabitants of that famous river. He did not sail but navigated, propelling his boat with the double bladed oar which he held in the middle and as required, shifted it from leeward to starboard, and this was frequently done on our great Dakota river where the navigator was beset by snags and sandbars. His trip down the Yellowstone was a perilous one. His rubber suit was torn by snags and rocks and he had to lay by for repairs. Remember, he was without a companion and in an unsettled and untamed country. His paddle fell in the fire at one of his camps and was badly damaged. He patched it and paddled with it. When he thought of what might happen if he lost his paddle, he realized something of the perils which environed him. On making his way through a bend in the river he suddenly discovered an Indian who had his rifle pointed toward him. He knew only one word of the Sioux language, and he wasn't sure what it meant, and this was the word "How?" and he wasn't certain that it was an Indian word, and he thought for a moment that its meaning might be a note of defiance. But he uttered it with all his voice and threw up his arms with the double-bladed paddle in one hand, and to his intense gratification the Indian took him for some unearthly or unwatered being, and quickly recovering his rifle, turned, and by great leaps and bounds disappeared in the timber. On the 20th of September Boyton paddled out through the mouth of the Yellowstone into the broad Missouri and across to Fort Buford where he met with a cordial welcome and remained there for the day making repairs. After leaving Buford, a trapper discovered him, thinking he was a bear on a log, and was about to shoot him, when Boyton rose upright and convinced the trapper of his error. The trapper expressed little surprise, and was evidently chagrined that he had not shot before he heard the explanation, for bear-skins were worth dollars. Boyton halted at Fort Berthold, and after resuming his journey discovered an Indian who was pointing a rifle at him. He yelled "How?" and "Don't shoot" in the same breath, and the massacre was averted. He now concluded that the word "How?" was worth knowing in the Indian country. This was Boyton's first journey through the country of the native American red men. He had gone through Asia, parts of Africa and Europe, on their principal rivers, and was menaced by no such serious if not deadly perils as confronted him here in the wilds of Dakota. He realized that he was not taking a pleasure trip, and regretted that he had no companions to share its novelties. He reached Bismarek on the 28th of September with his scalp intact, and here he was met by James Creelman, a correspondent of the New York Herald, who had been sent out, equipped with a canvas boat to accompany the navigator during the remainder of his trip to St. Louis. Bismarek was famous for the excellent entertainment it generously bestowed on the country's famous heroes, nearly all of whom found it convenient to visit there during these exciting years, though none had ventured to cross its watery threshold, clad in the weird, walrus like garb which enrobed the sturdy form of this unique and daring navigator. Bismarek made him feel at home and here he remained two days, writing "Paul Boyton" in the albums of the fair dames and daughters of the hospitable city. He then, in company with Mr. Creelman in his canvas craft, plunged again into the muddy current of the longest navigable river on the continent. He found a better river after leaving Bismarek, and had the pleasure of a genial companion; there was room enough for both and water enough, and together they rowed and paddled along. Boyton's one great peril between Bismarek and Fort Bennett was when he ran into a bed of quicksand and began to sink in it. It was with great difficulty that he extricated himself. His companion could do little to aid him, except share his uncomfortable apprehensions. Quicksand affords no foothold except one that gradually sucks its victim down and swallows him bodily. By a superhuman effort his strength greatly augmented by the imminence of the danger he was in, Boyton fairly threw himself out of his peril, thence against a snag that punctured a hole in his rubber armor, and obliged the novel fleet to make haste to land, where necessary repairs were made with material contained in the little copper supply boat which was towed along by a chain in the rear of the rubber flagship. This was nearest to a hair-breadth escape, except a later one in the Vermillion whirlpool of the long voyage.

A friendly call was made at Cheyenne Indian Agency where the newspaper man of the fleet desired to get some information for a letter to his great newspaper. Major Love of the regular army was in charge. This was one of the agencies where the new administration had deposed the civil agent who had been appointed on the recommendation of the Episcopal bishop, and had substituted a military officer. It was not far from Standing Rock where Sitting Bull's reformed and surrendered warriors were stationed, and these people annoyed Major Love a great deal by visiting his Indians and inculcating discontent among them. Sitting Bull had quite recently been sent down to Fort Randall for confinement, and when the Steamboat Sherman, which had the honor of transporting the doughty chief, passed the agency the Cheyenne Indians assembled on the banks of the river, and the most violent demonstrations of grief were displayed. Major Love had been disposed to humor his Indians and treated them with much civility. They made themselves at home in the agent's office. While Boyton and his companion were in the room chatting with the agent, a chief entered, took a seat, loaded his pipe, and called to the agent for some matches, which the major quickly furnished him. Boyton witnessed the apparent obsequiousness of the agent, and with much indignation, exclaimed:

If I had my way I would take the fellow by the ear and turn him out to work for his living. This lionizing of men who spend part of their time in murdering whites and the other part in drawing rations from the Government ought to stop, and the sooner the better. These savages are not half so valuable to the community as the negroes, and yet they are waited upon like princes.

Accompanied by the agent in the afternoon they drove out from the agency a couple of miles to a tree in which a number of Indians, according to the custom of the tribe, had been buried. About six feet from the ground the trunk of the tree forked and divided into a number of stout branches with a bark peculiarly and appropriately as black as nature would have it. Everywhere among these branches and hundreds of additional limbs were perched heaps of decaying garments and new ones. In some places the storms had torn away the wrappings of the bodies and whole skeletons were exposed. All the implements which the Indian dead are supposed to need in the happy hunting grounds were placed at the side of the skeleton. So many Indians had been placed upon the branches of this old tree that it was said to have a more vigorous growth than any other tree in the neighborhood in consequence of the fertilization. The agent explained that the Crow tribe of Indians had laid three of their braves there, and Boyton, apparently meditating, absently remarked: "Three crows sat on a tree." The Sioux still used the cemetery in case of emergency.

Leaving Cheyenne, where they had been well entertained, and had learned something of the nature and customs and the treatment of the Government's Indian wards, they voyaged downward to Fort Pierre, where they made a friendly call, also at the new hamlet of Pierre, on the east bank, which was just beginning to grow. At Fort Randall under the command of the veteran Colonel Lugenbeel, they were received with the honors due to heroes, and the commandant was greatly interested in inspecting the novel craft of the daring navigator. Thence on to Yankton without incident, but at this point Boyton expected to receive some valuable material by express, and he betrayed some eagerness to reach it, for his old rubber suit was in a leaky condition and unsafe for further use. Its place in the future was to be in his armorial hall where he had already consigned a number of its elders. His reception at Yankton was quite in keeping with the navigator's wishes; there were a large number of steamboat men in port, and they hailed him as a worthy member of their honorable and useful brotherhood. He told the Yankton people that the Missouri was by far the most hazardous stream he had ever tackled. Its perils were many besides those already alluded to, and included eddies and whirlpools, and the caving of the banks which at times threatened to bury him. He reached Yankton on the 23d of October, thirty-five days from Glendive. This 2,000 mile journey down the Yellowstone and Missouri, was the longest as well as the most precarious he had ever undertaken, though he had traversed over twenty thousand miles of rivers in various quarters of the globe. He had also lectured occasionally, and had kings, queens and princes among his auditors. His lectures abounded in descriptions of the places he had visited in his novel craft and incidents of his journeys; they were quite entertaining, but they were not of a character that would tend to the improvement of navigable streams, nor did they popularize the individual rubber boat. Had this been his design, and worked successfully, it might have increased the demand for rubber. The party got away from Yankton early on the 25th. The weather was quite uncomfortable, especially on the water, and Boyton wanted to reach St. Louis as early as practicable. There was excitement and danger near at hand, however, that the party had not apprehended when saying good-bye to Yankton. It was caused by what was known as the "Vermillion Whirlpool," and was thus introduced and referred to by the talented correspondent of the New York Herald:

St. Helena, a pretty village, perched high on a cliff, was reached at 5 o'clock in the afternoon. We had been warned several times that a large whirlpool existed somewhere on the river near Vermillion, Dakota, and the villagers confirmed these rumors and advised us to wait until daylight before making the perilous passage.

"I don't want to lose such an opportunity for voyaging as this weather presents," said Boyton, "and we will go on until we hear the whirlpool, and then camp until daylight." So on we went, as the sun sank slowly in the west and the night shadows stole softly over the scene. Sunset on the Missouri is surpassingly beautiful. The wild scenery seems to mellow perceptibly, and the grassy buttes, worn smooth, it is said, by the action of the wind, assume a purple and crimson light until their farthest ranges seem but as dim shadows against the glowing horizon. As day declined every breath of air died out, leaving the surface of the river without a ripple, every part of the changing headlands being reflected in the aqueous mirror. The branches of the trees were almost bare of foliage, and the dead leaves drifted along shore in great heaps. A sweet scent filled the air like the perfume of new mown hay, a most delicious fragrance rising like a grateful incense from the shorn grain fields, wild flower beds and wild fruit thickets of these marvelous Dakota bottom lands.

Even when night closed the sky was bright with stars, which gave out sufficient light to enable us to see our way. The black, recumbent figure just ahead of me glided on through the water like a phantom, and the steady dip, dip of his dripping paddle kept time with the creaking of my oars. The movement of my arms became so monotonous that I fell into a half reverie and half dream. I was awakened from my drowsiness by a shout, and a moment later I heard the captain say: "The whirlpool cannot be very far away, for I can hear it. You had better pull in close to the shore and be ready to ground your canoe at any moment." My oars quickened and in a few moments we reached the land, only to find that we were running in a very swift current along a high undermined sandbank, which was caving in foot by foot. It was folly to think of making a landing there, as the whole mass was likely to sink under the slightest weight and engulf us. A faint roar, as of rushing, tumbling waters, could be heard in the distance, and as the sound increased it was apparent we were approaching it very rapidly. In twenty minutes we began to feel the peculiar effects of the eddying current in the neighborhood of the "sinkhole." It swung us from side to side for awhile, and then my canoe developed a sudden taste for waltzing, which, try as I might, I could not control. I flew past a great snag at a rate which made my flesh creep, and the boiling water began to seethe and foam around us. That we had been drawn into the whirlpool was evident, and I shouted to the captain for advice as to how we should get out of the terrible circle. The answer came back from a distance of about fifty yards: "Pull towards shore with all your might. We are in the whirlpool." I knew what that meant. My canoe would be either torn to pieces on a snag or upset in the center of the whirling vortex if smooth water was not reached. Every time Boyton spoke his voice came from a different direction. Our relative position was plain. He was on one side of the funnel and I was on the other side. It was impossible to tell which was the right direction in which to pull, for one moment we were going up the stream and the next coming down again as the circling current carried us around. I could hear Boyton struggling manfully against the influence which was sweeping him in closer and closer to the real seat of danger. His paddle worked as though it was driven by steam until, finally, he passed beyond my hearing. My canoe began to rock from side to side, and some rough water broke over it. But there was no time to bail out, everything depended on my getting into the channel of the river again. We had been told that the whirlpool was strong enough to turn even the most powerful steamboats around, and as the feeling of fear grew upon me I strained every muscle and bent the basswood oars in my effort to reach a place of safety. In the height of my excitement I cracked one of the oars at the most important point, but as I threw myself into the bottom of the canoe, not knowing whether the whirlpool was great enough to suck me beneath the surface or not, I heard a grating sound, and the next instant my little craft grounded on a sandbar. It was the work of a moment to leap out and walk down the bar, towing the canoe after me, and I was in a smooth current again.

Removed from the noise of the swirling waves, I could hear the captain sounding on his bugle far down the river. I rowed in the direction of the music. Then I lost him again, and rowed along for several hours, occasionally shouting, but receiving no answer. About 3 o'clock next morning I was startled by a bugle blast almost at my side, and looking round found Boyton standing upright in the water about twenty feet away. "The next time I encounter a whirlpool," he said, "I will take good care to do it in broad daylight. There may have been little real danger at the heart of the swirl, but that current was fast enough to have wrecked us both against the slightest obstacle that presented itself."

The remainder of the voyage to St. Louis was tedious and uncomfortable owing to inclement weather, and on the 20th of November, Captain Boyton, with James Creelman, his first mate, cast anchor in the port of St. Louis. Boyton had traveled about three thousand miles in his rubber sack. He stated that the trip was the hardest he ever experienced, and he felt like a sick man physically. He concluded that he would require at least a year to rest up, and then he might try a trip down the Amazon. During his year of rest he hoped to be able to make good progress with his writing up of his "Roughing It in Rubber."

BRAVE BEAR KILLS A WHITE MAN

Brave Bear was the English name of an Indian who was among the first to pay the life penalty, according to law and the Treaty of 1868, imposed for the commission of crime in Dakota. He was a son-in-law of the renowned Sitting Bull; a shrewd, intelligent Indian, and one of the incorrigibles. He, together with Rain-in-the-Face, another of Sitting Bull's chiefs were charged with the murder of the DeLong family near St. Joseph, in Pembina County in 1876. Brave Bear was arrested and tried for the offense, at Fargo, in 1878. The evidence was sufficient to convict him, but the question of the jurisdiction of the court being raised, the judge held that as Pembina was an organized county, the accused should be tried by the District Court of that county. He was then transferred to Pembina County, confined in jail, broke jail, and with his Indian wife made his way to Fort Sully in 1879, where he was accused of murdering a young white man, Joseph Johnson, and robbing him of a sum of money and a horse. He then fled north and joined Sitting Bull in British America. He surrendered with the hostiles in the spring of 1881, and returned to near Fort Sully, where he was discovered and arrested for the Johnson murder. He was taken to Bismarek and had an examination before the United States commissioner, who found sufficient evidence of guilt, and held him for trial before the United States District Court at Yankton, in November, 1881. He made an effort to commit suicide by poison while in the Yankton jail, but recovered. He was indicted for the murder of young Johnson, a discharged soldier, tried and convicted at the November term of court, but the trial was not reached until late in the term. Judge Edgerton had succeeded Judge Shannon as judge of the district. The trial jury was composed of R. B. Finlay, Clay County; Erick Haralson, Lincoln County; William Allison, Brookings County; George Ford, Sr., Union County; Willis R. Stone, Brookings County; Isaac N. Esmay, Yankton County; Patterson F. McClure, Hughes County; Edwin F. Devol, Deuel County; Andrew A. Quamberry, Clay County; Albert P. Hull, Deuel County; Ira Ellis, Union County; Duncan Ross, Union County.

But one day, January 4, 1882, was consumed in the trial. The principal witness was Edward Allison, a Government scout under General Terry. Brave Bear was found guilty of murder and sentenced to be hung. He was hung. His own admissions, frequently made to Allison and others, convicted him. Oliver Shannon, Esq., of Yankton, defended him, but he had no testimony to offer. The jury was out one hour. H. J. Campbell, United States attorney, conducted the prosecution. He was hung on November 23, 1882.

THE YANKTON INDIANS

The Yankton Indians, though members of the Great Sioux Nation require mention in history separate and apart from the other tribes of the same nation. We find them first in council with Lewis and Clark, near the future Town of Yankton in 1804. They then send a delegation of their own tribe to Washington under Dorion. Next, a detachment of Yankton's accompany Colonel Leavenworth in his march against the Arickarees as volunteers in 1817; and wherever they are met with they are living independently and without association with the other Sioux. In making their treaty of 1858, they claimed and ceded a large portion of what is now South Dakota, east of the river, while the Government recognized their claim and purchased their land, giving them a reservation. We hear something from the Sioux on the upper river at this time—threats and declarations that the Yanktons exceeded their authority in selling the land without consulting the other tribes, but nothing came of it. No steps were taken to test the validity of the sale or purchase. And from that time on all of which has passed since the whites came in, the Yanktons have been treated as a separate nation in nearly every transaction, and have kept themselves scrupulously aloof from any entangling alliances with their kindred west of the Missouri. As this presents the facts in their career, and the historical narrative has followed the facts, the independent treatment accorded the Yanktons will need no further comment.

SIoux CITY LARGELY A PRODUCT OF DAKOTA

Sioux City had been for all practical purposes the headquarters and the central point for many Dakotans since the very earliest settlement of the country; in fact it was practically Sioux City people, those who had business and landed interests there that became the earliest settlers and who organized and set on foot the first associations for the purpose of laying out townsites, and establishing business in Dakota. Nearly all the pioneers of Yankton were "old timers" in Sioux City and had made and lost fortunes there during the speculation craze in land values that raged from 1854 to 1859. The firm of Frost, Todd & Co. had its principal mercantile interest there, and while Todd's family and residence were at Fort Randall, his business was transacted at Sioux City where he spent much of his time when in the West. The Sioux City newspapers were to all intents and purposes the exponents of the political ambitions and business enterprises of Dakotans, and General Todd himself was at one time a silent partner in the old Sioux City Register. The Register printing plant furnished the material for the first Dakotan office in Yankton. As Yankton grew in business enterprises, her merchants and others including the federal officials, patronized the substantial banking house of Weare & Allison, established in 1856, the pioneer bankers of Sioux City, and through such influences Sioux City continued to be the Dakota Metropolis, and to a great extent enjoys that distinction today. Its citizens have worked intelligently and successfully to make Sioux City a metropolis—a great trade, commercial and manufacturing center, and while their gain may have been purchased by loss in certain Dakota communities, it can not be denied that the citizens of the place have acted with great public spirit, with lavish liberality and with a foresight that has been justified time and again by bringing to their doors ample reward. It is now so far advanced, and still advancing, that with its network of railways reaching in all directions, it can hardly fail to grow and expand and become a rival for all time of all Missouri River cities west and north of St. Louis, and no doubt it will always continue to be a sort of headquarters for a large section of South Dakota, as Kansas City, Mo., is the commercial metropolis of Central and Southern Kansas.

INVESTIGATING FORT PIERRE

Reports of a semi-scandalous nature were in circulation regarding the lawlessness and disorder prevalent at Fort Pierre in 1880. This point was then the starting point for a large proportion of the supplies which were daily going in to the 15,000 people then inhabiting the Black Hills, and being on the Sioux Reservation was without any form of government other than the restraint placed on the extremely lawless classes that had gathered there for sports, gambling, and an occasional disturbance by a small force of troops. The interior department being appealed to to provide measures to restrain the worst forms of disorder, the secretary of the interior requested the war department, which had stationed a company or two of troops there, commanded by Colonel Bartlett, as a prudential measure, to remove the people therefrom as the Indians objected to its occupation. The colonel was not ordered to make any removal but to investigate the matter and report, which he did. He reported that there were 100 houses in Fort Pierre, 300 permanent residents, and 500 transient residents. He stated that 20,000,000 pounds of freight had so far (up to July, '80), this year, 1880, been shipped to the hills from there, and this amount would be largely increased. He stated that the town was a necessity and that the route was the best one to the gold fields. He mentioned the numerous dance houses that were maintained as the only serious drawback to the peace and quiet of the village, but did not suggest a remedy. Nothing was done at that time to remove the transient element.

The Northwest Transportation Company was organized at Pierre during the winter 1880-81, with Capt. Russell Blakesley, manager. This company put on a line of stages and freight trains between Pierre and Deadwood. It was a sub-organization of the Chicago and Northwestern Railway, and enabled the Northwestern to bill passengers and freight through from Chicago to Deadwood. It was designed to secure for Chicago and the railroad company a portion of the commerce that had been controlled by St. Louis and the steamboat lines.

FORT PIERRE AND PIERRE

A steam ferry boat was built at Pierre in 1881 from materials shipped from Chicago. It operated between Pierre and Fort Pierre.

Pierre, the present capital of South Dakota was laid out in 1880 by the Dakota Central Railway Company, a subordinate corporation of the Chicago & Northwestern. It was the terminus of the road on the Missouri River, and opposite the prominent settlement and unorganized Town of Fort Pierre which had grown up to be an important business center since the Black Hills were opened, and the Government wagon roads established connecting it with the mining regions. Its occupation as a town must have been a privilege granted by the treaty ceding the Black Hills. Fort Pierre, being located on the Great Sioux Reservation was beyond the authority of the territorial laws and county organization, and became to some extent a disorderly community, though having a large majority of good citizens who exerted themselves to maintain law and good order. But without legal authority—courts and officers—it is a very difficult matter to keep in restraint the very large class of men who find employment in freighting through a country exposed to such hazards as at that time beset the overland routes to the hills.

About the time that the Northwestern Railway reached Pierre, the company procured a lease from the Indians, through the interior department of a mile square of land at Fort Pierre on which to establish their warehouses and offices necessary to accommodate the successful forwarding of their Black Hills business. The company expected to control the boisterous element of the population, but its lease of the land gave it no police or judicial authority; the land was not within the jurisdiction of the territory, and it was only where some offense against the Indian intercourse laws was committed that the Federal courts could take judicial notice of it. A company of United States troops had been stationed either in the town or near by, for the purpose of quelling any serious outbreak or wild disorder, but they would act under instructions from the war department, and took no part in the ordinary policing of the city. Owing to this situation, and that at times as many as 1,500 people were gathered at the place, that dance houses and gambling houses flourished, though no liquor of an intoxicating kind was openly sold, Fort Pierre obtained the reputation for a time of being "fast and furious."

BROWN COUNTY—ABERDEEN FOUNDED

Brown County was defined by the Legislature of 1879. The Brown County bill changed the entire geography of the James River Valley from Davison County north to the 46th parallel. Many changes in county boundaries were made by the bill and new names took the place of older ones, which strengthened it with the members of the Legislature. There did not appear to be any public demand for the measure, but its author and projector pushed it with such energy that he secured its success and earned for himself the sobriquet of "Consolidation Brown." Mr. Brown was a native of Canada, settled in Hutchinson County in the '70s, was an intelligent go-ahead man, had been elected from Hutchinson to the Legislature, and took this method of stamping his footprints in the soil of the territory. But he was not an audacious man at all, and when his county bill was first presented to the Legislature the large square subsequently answering to the name of Brown County, was without a name, and Mr. Brown was given to wondering what he had best call it. With that reserve which is frequently met with in the ranks of meritorious men, Mr. Brown insisted that he was at loss for a name for the county which occupied such a prominent position, and in this quandary some sympathetic friend suggested the name of "Brown." This seemed to awaken a pleasant emotion in Mr. Brown's mind, and it is related that he made no further search for a title. Being subsequently interrogated as to his object in making the county so large, he explained that it made no difference, as that part of the territory would never be thickly populated.

The first settlement in Brown County was made before the county boundaries were defined, and was an incident of the beginning of the heavy immigration which began in a mild form in the spring of 1878, during the Drifting Goose Indian excitement in that portion of the James River Valley. These first settlers are said to have been Clarence D. Johnson, William Young, Hattie Young, a sister, and Benjamin Arendall, who located on the west bank of the James River on unsurveyed land, though the 5th standard parallel had been located near their claims, which subsequently proved to be in town 101, range 63. The Johnson mentioned was a brother of J. S. Johnson, the discharged soldier, whom the Indian Brave Bear killed and robbed, for which crime he was some years later convicted and executed at Yankton. The victim of Brave Bear was doubtless on his way from Fort Sully to join his brother, when he was slain. There were no railroads in Brown County at this time. In 1879 Mr. B. M. Smith located on the present site of Columbia, which had its first settlement that year. In July, 1880, the county was organized, D. C. McKenzie, J. R. James and Clarence D. Johnson were appointed the first county commissioners and Columbia was made the temporary county seat. Immigration flowed in rapidly, coming largely from Minnesota by way of Watertown.

The first locomotive reached Aberdeen, July 6, 1881. It came over the Hastings and Dakota Railroad. There were no improvements on the town site at the time, but they were made rapidly and in surprising numbers following this event. A year later there were 194 buildings in the town, sixty-eight of them business houses, and 800 inhabitants. There was also the Milwaukee Railway from Mitchell, and the Northwestern from Huron which went on to the Town of Ordway. It was something of a magic city.

An artesian well had been sunk by the Milwaukee people near where their depot was to be placed, and a lake of pure artesian water of respectable dimensions covered a large number of vacant town lots.

The artesian well was one of the most generous in quantity of water thrown out in a specified time of any that had been successful up to April, 1882. The water gushed out with great force at the rate of 2,000 gallons a minute. The temperature was 58°, and pressure 132 pounds to the square inch. It was claimed to be the largest and most powerful flowing well in the world. The water was muddy and sandy when it came from the well but when filtered was pure and wholesome for drinking purposes. It became clear in the course of time, and it also provided Aberdeen with a magnificent lake right in the center of its busy population that threatened to become a permanent settler.

The story of Aberdeen's enterprise in securing a new railway connection with the great lakes, is related in the following paragraph printed about the close of December 27, 1885:

About a year ago a meeting of the citizens of Aberdeen decided that it was necessary that Aberdeen have an east outlet by way of Duluth. Steps were at once taken to secure a road. The Aberdeen, Fergus Falls & Pierre Railway was incorporated by John T. McChesney, president; C. A. Jewett, secretary; T. H. Haggerty, treasurer; J. H. Perry, Henry Beard, James Ringrose, C. T. McCoy, directors, five of this list residents of Aberdeen. As to routes, various ones were examined, and it was finally decided to connect with the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba (afterwards called the Great Northern) at Campbell Junction, Minn. In May, 1886, grading was commenced and progressed rapidly. Track laying had been pushed ahead through blizzard and cold weather. Two gangs were employed, one for day work and one for night, in order to reach the limits of Aberdeen by January 1, 1887. The citizens of Aberdeen had voted $25,000 bonus to the company if Aberdeen was reached by the time stated, and the company earned and received the bonus. Three hundred members of the track-laying crew were given an Aberdeen banquet on Christmas eve in recognition of their "staying qualities" during the heavy snows and frigid temperature which had been characteristic of the fall and winter. This made Aberdeen the hub city of seven independent railway lines radiating to as many important points, and laid a substantial foundation for the enterprising and prosperous city which has since grown up around the "hub."

ENCOURAGING OUTLOOK IN 1882

The good year 1882, the first six months at least, was a year of great expectations to the people of Dakota Territory, and these great expectations were centered in a division of the territory and the erection of a state government in the southern half—below the 46th parallel; the northern half retaining the territorial government. Negotiations were initiated this year for obtaining, by cession, a portion of the Great Sioux Reservation.

Encouraging words for a statehood movement came first from the outside world. The State of Dakota was claimed to be a necessity to keep the balance of power where it belonged. The senators and representatives were needed by the grand old party, whose majority in Congress was threatened. A possible disaster was impending and it could be prevented by making Dakota a state. But a more forcible and legitimate argument than this was that the territory was entitled to admission, being possessed of the necessary population, industries, and ample domain. We were told by the outside parties that the people of the territory were anxious to have their territory erected into a state. The people wanted better provision for public education. They were expending hundreds of thousands per annum for the support of their common schools, which amount was raised by taxation. The territory had within its boundaries 5,360,451 acres of public lands reserved for common schools, but could make no use of them until their territory became a state, and the value of these lands was depreciating for the want of protection, and the value of the lands surrounding them was impaired because these lands were uninhabited and non-productive.

It was urged also by outside friends that the territory be divided into two equal parts on the 46th parallel of latitude—the southern part admitted as a state, as it possessed the requisite population and resources, and that the northern part be given the territorial organization, not having at this time the population that would entitle it to demand admission into the Union sisterhood. All this came from the outside, but it corresponded harmoniously with the prevailing sentiment within the territory. It did not need this encouragement nor any encouragement whatever to move the people of Dakota to bestir themselves for a state government and a division of the territory. It was a goal they had been striving to reach for five years; but it was exceedingly gratifying to learn that powerful influences from without and reaching to the halls of Congress had discovered that statehood was due to Dakota in justice and in accordance with well established precedent.

THE MOUSE RIVER VALLEY

Mayor Edmond Hackett, of Bismarck, in the late winter of 1881-82 (March), made a reconnoissance survey for the Bismarck, Mouse River, Turtle Mountain & Manitoba Railroad Company, designed to connect Bismarck with that terra incognita known as the Turtle Mountain country. His survey and explorations led him to the international boundary line where it crosses the Turtle Mountains. During this trip through the Mouse River region, he found a fine country, well adapted to farming and cattle raising, and he declared it to be equal in extent to the Red River Valley.

In his report to Vice President Jewell, of the company, he says:

I have discovered the source of James River, and will note it in this report for the benefit of Dakota geography. The stream rises on the north side of the Dog Den Mountains, and only forty miles from the Missouri River. It is formed from many springs coming out from the base of these mountains. I followed its course ten miles and am satisfied that it is no other than the head of the James River. Its course from here is due east. I have taken my course from Villard, a little east of north, to this point on the boundary line, crossing the Mouse at right angles twice, the last time six miles below Little Medicine Lodge. I find it to be the most beautiful country the sun shines upon. A level prairie, stretching away as far as the eye can reach, with the exception of the obstruction called Turtle Mountain.

I spent two days on the west side of Turtle Mountain, and examined its water and timber to some extent. It is the heaviest timbered region in Dakota, not excepting the pine-clad peaks of the Black Hills. The varieties of timber growing on Turtle Mountain are of a valuable kind. Ash, oak, some elm, but the greater portion is quaking asp, a species of poplar or whitewood. The trees grow tall and thrifty, and from two to three feet in thickness. This timber is very much needed in the Northwest, and is a prize worth contending for. Turtle Mountain seems to be very extensive, and looks to an observer somewhat like the Black Hills, and no doubt contains minerals. The Willow River flows down across the west side, taking its course for the Mouse. There are some fine water powers on this river. The Mouse River Valley is larger than the Red River of the North Valley and is better timbered, and better adapted to grazing. A railroad to Bismarck could be built on the proposed route at a comparatively trifling cost. No heavy grades—nothing but a level and fertile prairie to run over. Ties can be procured in quantity along the line.

I will start tomorrow and cross the mountain to the half-breed settlement, on the east side of the line, and will forward you this report.

Turtle Mountain, D. T., March 16th.

As I stated in the above, I wish to inform you that I have accomplished the journey after four days' hard traveling. I intended to cross the southern range, but could not on account of the heavy snow that has fallen, and I was compelled to go round the south side on the traveled road or trail, some sixty miles, to the half-breed settlement on the east side of the mountain. Myself and party struck the settlement about 4 o'clock in the evening, both stock and men pretty well fatigued from hunger and exposure. The grass was covered with snow, so that our animals could not procure any pasturage. When first we discovered the settlement we were saluted with the howling of about fifty half-starved dogs. The village is scattered over some three or four hundred acres; the buildings or dwellings consist of small log huts mainly, with some tepees made of skins. The general appearance of these improvements is dilapidated. Each family has a patch of about an acre under cultivation which comprises their farms. I was met by the chief at once, and he wanted to know my business, and was surprised to see a party of white men in his country at this time of year. I told him I was instructed to go to his village and have a talk with the chief, to find out their condition. He kindly invited me in his tepee. The name of the chief is "Black Bear," and he talks broken English. He is not a full-blooded Indian. I entered the lodge; two women seemed to be the only occupants. After the pipe was handed round, supper was ordered and was gotten up on short notice, consisting of Mouse River fish, hard bread and coffee. I asked him if he was the head chief of the Turtle Mountain band of Chippewas. He answered, "No," the head chief, he said, "lived at Woody Mountain, on the other side of the international line." I asked why he did not live there with his tribe. He said the chief became disgusted here with his people and would not live with them. He also said the chief at Woody Mountain held the papers from the President for these lands. I asked how they proposed to dispose of these lands, and learned that the half-breeds wanted a reservation sixty miles long and fifty miles wide, and a certain sum of money to the chiefs. I told him that I did not believe the Government would give a reservation to the half-breeds, but that they could take 160 acres, the same as a white man, under the homestead, or pre-emption law. He said the half-breeds should have a reservation as the whites had all the money. I asked him what he thought about going to the White Earth Reservation, and he said they would not go anywhere until they got pay for their lands, and then they could go where they pleased.

This ended the conversation for the evening, and he kindly procured us a lodge for the night. During my stay I looked the matter over carefully, and I find not a full-blooded Chippewa in this tribe called the Turtle Mountain band of Chippewas. They are nothing but a renegade set of half-breeds from the various tribes of Northern and Canadian Indians. There is not over 250 souls all told in this so-called band of Turtle Mountain Indians. They are settled here in this remote part of our territory on the boundary line. They are the outfit that have been furnishing Sitting Bull and his band of cut-throats and murderers with ammunition and guns during all our frontier troubles, and now they are perched on this mountain, on the boundary line, ready to jump from one side to the other, as the case may be; and after all this they have the cheek to ask the Government for a reservation 60x50 miles,—the best lands in Dakota.

There is a small trading store here kept by a party named Bruce, from Pembina. His goods are all shipped over the line, and I should judge his duties are not looked after. There is a large flouring mill twenty miles north of here on the Manitoba side, on a branch of the Pembina River. The country east from here seems to be somewhat broken, but is well watered and timbered. The mountain is forty miles wide at the line and is a solid body of timber. It would be safe to say there is 10,000 square miles of timbered country here in North Dakota. Timber enough to supply two generations. People do not know the wealth that is to be found here. Very little of it is known to the outside world.

Eighteen months ago it would not have been safe for a white man to have put his foot on this soil, but since the surrender of Sitting Bull, the white man can travel here with perfect safety. I will start for Villard in a day or two as soon as our stock has recuperated.

Willard was 100 miles north of Bismarek, and was located on the Mouse River in McHenry County. The stockholders of the Bismarek, Mouse River, Turtle Mountain & Manitoba Railway Company were made up of the substantial element of Burleigh County's citizenship, and included outside capitalists. The directors of the company were John E. Carland, John P. Dunn, John A. McLean, James A. Emmons, C. R. Williams, Erastus A. Williams, Donald Hannaford, E. Hackett, Alexander McKenzie, David Stewart, and H. M. Jewell. Erastus A. Williams, of Freeport, Ill., was president of the company; H. M. Jewell, vice president; David Stewart, secretary; John P. Dunn, treasurer; and Alexander McKenzie, general manager. A preliminary survey of the line was made from Bismarek via Villard to the Manitoba boundary during the year.

In January, 1883, President Arthur, by an executive order, withdrew from settlement six townships of land in Rolette County, on the northern boundary of the territory, for the use of the Turtle Mountain band of Chippewa Indians. The tract withdrawn embraced townships Nos. 150, 160, 161, 162, 163, and 162, north; ranges Nos. 70, 71, 72, 73 west.

Mayor Hackett's report continues:

West of Fort Totten the land in places is broken, though the soil is excellent even at the summit of the highest elevations, and going further west the topography changes to great wave-like swells, forming small valleys a mile or two in width, and this is repeated until we reach what are locally called the "Great Flats," about twenty miles west of Totten. Here the country assumes the appearance of a vast and deep basin, and one keeps going down the side of the basin until the bottom is reached, where the valley is met with;

this is about four miles across; when another ascent is made of the incline on the west side of the basin, which leads over and down into a much larger valley; and here the first object to interest attention is a small lake, known as Wood Lake, which name it has because of the timber which borders its pebbly beach. The aggregate of the timber here was not far from two hundred and fifty acres, nearly all hardwood. The lake is fed by a large spring of excellent water—cool, of course, and refreshing. The half-breed people who in moderate numbers make up the population of the valley, claim that the lake has nothing but water under it, no matter how deep you go. Its waters are crystal clear and the air near is freighted with a humid flavor. This lake is about one mile long and an eighth of a mile in width, and is without a doubt the head of the Cheyenne River. It is about forty-five miles west of Fort Totten. The country west of Wood Lake is well located for settlements on a large scale, being slightly rolling, and abounds in small lakes. This characteristic continues for nearly one hundred miles west of Totten when the Mouse River Valley is reached after crossing a range of hills of respectable proportions.

Standing upon these elevations the view of the famous valley that forms a connection between the two leading civilized nations of the earth is a splendid theme for the pencil of the best of artists—those who have enjoyed this view declare that its fascinating grandeur robs one of any desire to speak—one is held spellbound by the loveliness and immensity of the picture spread out in the foreground. This valley would seem to have been here at some early day without any river for a companion—the stream would seem to have been cut out of the valley. This fine stretch of valley or bottom land is as level as the surface of a floor, just as far away as your strength of vision will permit you to get a glimpse of its uttermost limit. As one becomes better acquainted with the country he learns that he is in one of the largest valleys in the Northwest, having a width not far from forty miles and a length of eighty. Its name comes from the Mouse River which rises across the line in the possessions of Great Britain, courses south and east about one hundred miles when it turns rather abruptly and flows back to its fatherland, emptying its waters into the Assinaboine. On this side of the line it waters Renville, Ward, McHenry and Bottineau counties.

The Turtle Mountains were the largest mountain range in the territory east of the Missouri River, lying northeast of the Mouse River Valley, and about twenty-five miles from that river. Beds of coal are scattered here and there through the valley. Geologists couple it with the Red River Valley, and find what they consider ample evidences that the waters of a past age covered it, and a veritable sea existed there bordered probably by the Turtle Range on the northeast. In modern ages its sea of water diminished to the singular stream, the Mouse River, which remained as its legacy. The Indians found it a profitable region for large game, and abundant pasturage for their herds of ponies, while the fur bearing animal yielded for a century or more, a rich harvest annually to the Hudson Bay traders. Partially civilized and peaceable half-breeds were its only inhabitants in the early '80s, and in a general way, they were prosperous for such people of only moderate ambition, raising some grain and fine herds of cattle and horses. The vehicle altogether in vogue was the Red River cart.

TURTLE MOUNTAIN COUNTRY OPENED TO SETTLEMENT

Delegate Pettigrew, being authorized thereto by a memorial from the Legislature of Dakota, presented a bill to the House of Representatives to provide for a commission to treat with the Turtle Mountain Chippewas. He then made further investigation of the matter, and concluded the Indian claim was not valid and ceased his efforts to promote the making of the treaty. It would appear that he made still further investigation and concluded that his first movement in behalf of a treaty was justified, and urged the measure providing for a treaty commission that could investigate the equities and validity of the claims of the Indians with authority.

It appeared from reports of reliable men who had personally visited the Turtle Mountain country and acquainted themselves with its inhabitants, that there was no such tribe of Indians as the Turtle Mountain band of Chippewas; but there was about two hundred half-breed settlers in the Turtle Mountain country and Mouse River country, who claimed the land. The Government, however, had never recognized the title of a band of half-breed Indians exclusively to any portion of the public domain, and a portion, at least, of these half-breeds were conveniently British subjects or United States subjects, as their interests inclined. They were at liberty to become citizens and take up homesteads and pre-emptions, but they had no defensible title, as an Indian tribe, because they had never been a tribe.

The lands embraced in this Turtle Mountain country and the claim of the Indians had been before the Department of the Interior for some years, with a prospect of being decided in their favor. On the incoming of Hon. Henry E. Teller, as secretary of the interior under President Garfield, he caused a rigid investigation to be made of the question of title, and based upon that examination he declared the Indians had no claim to the land whatever; and the entire tract was thrown open to settlement. It embraced the country within the following boundaries, to wit:

Beginning at the east end of Devil's Lake, Dakota Territory, thence along the eastern boundary line of the Sioux Reservation, which lay immediately south of the lake; south 20 degrees and 30 minutes east to the Cheyenne River, thence to Stump Lake; thence to headwaters of Salt Creek; thence due north to the international line; thence west to La-Rocke Perce; thence in a southerly direction to the headwaters of Knife River; thence to Dog's Den; thence to the west end of Devil's Lake; thence along the north shore of Devil's Lake to the place of beginning.

This included portions, in some cases all of the counties of Pembina, Cavalier, Ramsey and Grand Forks.

SURVEYING THE UPPER MISSOURI RIVER

The House of Representatives appropriated $25,000, in the river and harbor bill, in 1882, for a survey of the Missouri River. When this bill reached the Senate Delegate Pettigrew filed a statement with the Senate committee asking an increase of the appropriation to $50,000, in which he explained his reasons for requesting the increase, in substance, as follows:

The Missouri River has never been surveyed from the north boundary of Nebraska to the Yellowstone, a distance of 1,000 miles by the river. On this stretch of river there is more commerce than upon any other stretch of the same river of equal length. From the Town of Yankton, about twenty-three steamboats, of 11,400 tons capacity, received and discharged their freight during 1881. This is a larger number of boats than run from any other point on the river, either above or below, unless it be from Bismarek, which is also located upon this stretch of unsurveyed river, from which point over twenty boats load and discharge their freight from and to points upon the river above that place. In 1881 there was shipped from Bismarek 21,000,000 pounds of private freight for points above on the Missouri River, and 7,200,000 pounds of military freight. There was shipped from Bismarek to points on the Yellowstone River, 8,400,000 pounds of freight, making in all 36,600,000 pounds of freight from this point alone. There were transferred from Bismarek 10,000 passengers, 160,000 buffalo skins, and 180 tons of wool, besides a large amount of fur and other pelts received.

There are three railroad points on this stretch of the Missouri River, other than Yankton and Bismarek, namely: Pierre, Chamberlain and Running Water, from which points several boats received freight. The Government engineer who was in charge of the improvement work on the Missouri near Vermillion, endorsed the application for an appropriation of $50,000 for the survey.

The Senate made the desired increase.

The navigable portion of the Missouri River had been found to measure 3,150 miles. The river through its many tributaries drains an area which has been carefully computed at 518,000 square miles.

RIVER IMPROVEMENT CONVENTION

The Mississippi and Missouri River Waterways Convention held a meeting at St. Paul, Minn., beginning September 3, 1885, and continuing several days.

The object of the meeting was the promotion of plans to secure the improvement of the rivers named and the Red River of the North in the interest of navigation, and to enlist the co-operation and financial aid of the Government in the work. The Mississippi interest was predominant at the convention, which was made up of about eleven hundred delegates from the Missouri and Mississippi states and territories. Mr. Warner, of Kansas City, was elected president, though Governor Bross, of Illinois, was the favorite of the Mississippi interest. In the organization Dakota was given recognition on the following committees:

Credentials—Hon. Johnson Niekus, Jamestown; S. E. Young, Sioux Falls.

Permanent Organization—John O. Gifford, McCook County; E. O. Faulkner, Sully County.

Rules of Order—Hon. G. H. Westover, Pierre; Capt. H. E. Maloney, Bismarck.

Resolutions—Hon. W. H. H. Beadle, Yankton; John H. King, Chamberlain; C. A. Morton, Mandan.

General Beadle was also appointed chairman of the Committee on Resolutions, and submitted and read the report of the committee on the second day of the proceedings.

After reciting at length the vast area of the United States drained by the Mississippi and its value to millions of people as a commercial channel, facts well known and recognized, the resolutions gave attention to the Missouri River in the following plain and comprehensive language:

Whereas, The Missouri River, one of the largest and longest rivers in the world, watering an agricultural and mineral country unsurpassed in wealth, its borders populated by over six million people, yet never having received a direct appropriation from the national Government for its general improvement prior to the Forty-seventh Congress; therefore, be it,

Resolved, That we earnestly recommend and urge its present and permanent improvement upon a general and systematic plan, to prepare it for commerce by steamers and barges, and we urge the policy of large and continuous appropriations by Congress therefor. We further recommend that the improvement be carried forward as a distinct and separate measure, and in not less than five divisions of the river, and under United States engineers and civilians resident thereon, with equal application to the several divisions. We urge the prosecution of this work upon a scale commensurate with the wealth and growth of the great country tributary thereto, its remoteness from eastern markets, and the fitness of the river for a great commerce. We further recommend the construction of ways at various points for the protection of boats against damage from ice.

Resolved, That this convention urges upon the Government to appoint upon the Missouri River Commission, engineers and civilians residing upon and interested in the improvement of the Missouri River, and whose other interests are not incompatible with their duties as members of such commission.

Resolved, That we do also recommend an appropriation sufficient to immediately complete the work undertaken, and that may be necessary for the improvement of the Red River of the North and tributary adjacent lakes and streams.

Resolved, That in the opinion of this convention an annual appropriation of $25,000,000 for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the United States and the construction of artificial waterways would not be extravagant, and could be expended so as to enrich the country far beyond the amount so appropriated.

The reading of the resolutions, only a portion of which are given above, was interrupted frequently by marks of approval, and at the conclusion of the reading they were unanimously adopted. In preparing the resolutions the committee overlooked the importance of directing attention to the enormous waste of our best agricultural lands, amounting annually to tens of thousands of acres, priceless as the basis of the world's food supply, and irreclaimable. It would seem that this feature of the unprotected situation of the rich soil bordering the rivers was of greater importance than all else. The adequate protection of the river's banks against the erosion of flood waters, and the consequent mitigation of our annual spring floods which cost the people many millions of dollars and dire hardship, would all find a remedy in the proper improvement of the rivers.

Following the adjournment of the general convention, the Missouri River delegates met and formed an organization, electing L. R. Bolter, of Logan, Ia., chairman, and adopted appropriate resolutions, the preamble reading:

Resolved, That we, the delegates in attendance upon the waterways convention at St. Paul, who are residents upon and near the Missouri River, do hereby organize ourselves into an association to be known as the "Missouri River Improvement Committee," for the purpose of promoting the improvement of that river throughout its navigable course.

The following officers were elected: President, L. R. Holter, Logan, Ia.; secretary, W. H. H. Beadle, Yankton, Dak.; treasurer, J. D. Barker, Girard, Kan. John R. King, of Chamberlain, was chosen vice president for Dakota, and Mr. Beadle was also made corresponding secretary. Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Montana and Iowa, with Dakota, were represented in this convention and among the officers.

A Missouri River convention was decided upon, and a meeting of this committee was called to assemble at Kansas City November 18th to make arrangements for the convention. The committee authorized each state and territory belonging to the Missouri River Valley to select two delegates to constitute a committee to wait upon Congress and present the results of the convention. The members of this delegation selected for Dakota were D. M. Inman, of Vermillion, and Alexander McKenzie, of Bismarck.

IMPROVING THE UPPER MISSOURI

The following is an abstract of the annual report of the Missouri River Commission concerning the condition and needs of the river above Sioux City:

The commission recommends that for the present work be mainly confined to the construction of dams and the dredging of shoals on the "Rocky River" above Carroll. Below that point the snag boat should be kept at work removing obstructions, and funds should be provided therefor. For these purposes, and for certain experimental dams to be constructed near Bismarck, the commission recommends an appropriation of $100,000.

For continuing the survey of the river and for obtaining the data necessary for a proper study of the important interests committed to their charge, the commission recommends a separate appropriation of $150,000, which shall also include the salaries of the commission.

The last river and harbor bill, that of July 5th, 1884, appropriated $150,000 for a survey of the Missouri River above Fort Benton. The commission having found no present necessity for such a survey, has held the money and recommend it to be reappropriated and made available for the survey of the river below Fort Benton.

The report of Capt. J. R. Quinn, officer in charge of the work of improvement between Sioux City and Fort Benton, is in brief as follows:

The project for the improvement of the Missouri River from Sioux City to Fort Benton, having been submitted for the consideration of the commission, so much of it as referred to the improvement of the rocky portion was approved, and the necessary statements of the funds available for the work were made December 23, 1884. Steps were immediately taken to carry out the designs of the commission. Dredgers, snag boats, and all materials necessary for prosecuting the work were secured.

The work of dam building was carried on to some extent, but owing to the failure of the last river and harbor bill, no funds were available for snagging. There are a great many snags at present obstructing the channel, and their removal is of pressing necessity. It is hoped that this important work may be begun next season, since the boat with which to do it is already on hand. It is recommended that as soon as the ice goes out, the work of snagging be begun at Sioux City and continued up the river until the high water prevents, the boat then to proceed to the upper portion of the river.

No work upon the sandy portion of the river has been attempted during the last year. Captain Quinn has a project before the commission for improving the sandy portion which would require an appropriation of $100,000 for the coming year.

All the work done thus far upon the Missouri River, between Sioux City and Fort Benton, under the direction of the commodore, has been of a preparatory character, though some improvement in the channel is already noticeable. Captain Quinn thinks that the permanent improvement of this portion of the river at a very moderate outlay, is entirely feasible. As this is the portion that at present presents the greatest obstacles to navigation, it should receive the earliest attention.

But while the improvement of the river may admit of slight delay, says Captain Quinn, it must be borne in mind that as the country develops the river commerce will increase, and a better channel will become a necessity. The land along the river is not yet occupied. But the brush and timber now available for improving the channel will soon be in the possession of private parties who will exact from the Government its full value, and in consequence, feasible works of improvement today may, for financial reasons, be impossible in the future. Already the character of the commerce upon the Upper Missouri is assuming a feature that points to its permanent increase. This feature is the fact that the down river freight is almost equal to that carried up stream and bids fair to exceed it in a short time. The cereals raised in the Upper Missouri Valley are the finest in the world, and the apparently inexhaustible beds of coal and iron ore, close to good water power, only await development. The cattle and sheep industry is growing rapidly. It needs but a casual glance to convince one that the possibilities of this great region have not yet been even guessed at.

The wild and wayward Missouri must in time yield to persistent but gentle treatment and develop into a deep and commodious avenue wherein the commerce of this country shall pass securely and economically.

LAND DISTRICTS OF HURON, ABERDEEN, WATERTOWN AND JAMESTOWN

Congress established two new land districts in Dakota Territory by act of March 23, 1882. The first named was bounded as follows:

Commencing at the southeast corner of township 109 north, range 59 west of the 5th principal meridian; thence west along the 2d standard parallel north to the Missouri River; thence up and along the east bank of said river to a point where the 5th standard parallel north intersects said river; thence along said standard parallel north to township 120 north, range 59 west; thence south to the southwest corner of township 113 north, range 59 west; thence east to the southeast corner of said township; thence south to the place of beginning; be, and the same is hereby constituted, a new land district, the office of which shall be located at such place as shall be designated by the President of the United States.

The President designated Huron as the seat of the office.

The second district boundaries were thus defined:

Commencing at the northwest corner of township 120 north, range 59 west of the 5th principal meridian; thence west along the 5th standard parallel north to the Missouri River; thence up and along the east bank of said river to the south line of township 130 north; thence east along said line to the northeast corner of township 129 north, range 59 west; thence south to the southeast corner of township 129 north, range 59 west; thence east along the 7th standard parallel north to the northwest corner of township 128, range 59 west; thence south to the place of beginning; be and the same is hereby constituted a new land district.

The President appointed Aberdeen as the seat of the land office.

The Watertown Land District boundaries were newly defined in this act, as follows:

Commencing at a point where the 2d standard parallel north of the 5th principal meridian intersects the eastern boundary of said territory; thence west along said parallel to the southeast corner of township 109 north, range 59 west; thence north to the northeast corner of township 112 north, range 59 west; thence west along the third standard parallel north to the 8th guide meridian; thence north along said guide meridian to the northwest corner of township 128 north, range 59 west; thence west along the 7th standard parallel north to the southeast corner of township 129 north, range 59 west; thence north to the southeast corner of township 130 north, range 59 west; thence east to the eastern boundary line of the Territory of Dakota; thence southerly on said boundary line to the place of beginning. -

The land office was continued at Watertown.

On the 6th of March, 1882, Delegate Pettigrew introduced a bill for an additional land district in the territory, with the following boundaries, to be called the Jamestown Land District, to-wit:

Commencing at the southeast corner of township 130, range 60; thence north to the 9th standard parallel; thence west to the southwest corner of township 139, range 61; thence north to the 14th standard parallel; thence west to the 11th guide meridian; thence south to the 11th standard parallel; thence east to the 10th guide meridian; thence south to the southwest corner of township 130, range 73; thence east to the place of beginning; be, and the same is hereby constituted a new land district to be called the Jamestown Land District; the office of which shall be located at Jamestown, D. T.

THE POLITICAL CAMPAIGN OF 1881-82

It was apparent quite early in the territorial political campaign of 1881-82 that the republicans of the northern portion of the territory expected to be able to secure the nomination of a northern man for delegate to Congress, probably John B. Raymond, of Fargo, ex-United States marshal. The north had but 100 votes all told in the convention, while the total number was 343; but the active strife between the Pettigrew and Hand forces in the south gave promise of a somewhat equal division of the southern delegates between these candidates, while the Black Hills were considered a battleground between Pettigrew and Raymond. The north was not unanimous, but nearly so. There was friction between the Red River and Missouri River representatives. The Red River, however, was by far the strongest, and its managing politicians had control. They did not antagonize either of the southern forces, but maintained a prudent neutrality in order that they might be prepared, as peace-makers, to make an amicable arrangement with either of the southern factions when the time came to nominate the delegate.

The preliminary campaign was unusually aggressive in the counties south of the forty-sixth parallel, more so than any similar contest Dakota had yet experienced, and resulted in numerous contesting delegations to the Territorial Republican Convention, which was held at Grand Forks, from quite a number of important counties, Lawrence County, with the largest county delegation, being one of the number. The territorial convention was something of a novelty in Dakota, and its proceedings might appropriately be quoted to affirm the saying that "everything is fair in politics." The northern convention manipulators were about to give an exhibition of the modern methods of "running a convention" in such a skillful manner as to nominate their minority candidate.

The territorial central committee, anxious to placate the sectional feeling which pervaded the people of the northern portion of the territory, had called the convention in that portion of the territory, influenced also by a belief that the convention at that point would be less liable to be influenced in favor of any candidate. It would be where it would be immune from prejudice for or against any of the aspirants, and was therefore an ideal point under the circumstances that then existed. It was the second territorial political convention to be held in the northern part of the territory, and was called to nominate a republican candidate for delegate to Congress. Hon. Richard F. Pettigrew, of Sioux Falls, was the incumbent of that office, and was a candidate for renomination. Hon. George H. Hand, of Yankton, secretary of the territory, was also a candidate and was strongly supported in the southern counties and was favorably regarded in the north, though it was generally understood that the northern counties, with two or three exceptions, had concluded to present a candidate from that section in the person of Hon. John B. Raymond, then United States marshal, who resided at Fargo. The supporters of Mr. Hand and Mr. Raymond had manifested the strongest regard for one another during the preliminary campaign; in fact, had worked together in some of the counties, and on the eve of the convening of the nominating convention it was apparent that the union of the supporters of these two gentlemen was all that was required to control the convention and nominate a candidate.

Mr. Hand's name had been mentioned quite favorably in connection with the delegateship for some years. He had been secretary of the territory for nearly eight years, and had resided in the territory since 1865. He had been for many months acting governor, and had formed an extensive acquaintance, among whom he was highly regarded. Captain Raymond was also a general favorite, and while his avowed supporters were in his residence section of the territory and in the Black Hills, he had a numerous following in the southern counties, and had been supported for the nomination in the convention that nominated Mr. Pettigrew two years before.

It could not be claimed that Mr. Pettigrew had been unfaithful as the delegate, or had lost his popularity. It was not his popularity that gave him the nomination at Vermillion, but strenuous effort, ably guided, and his predecessor's apparent weakness in his home county. It would seem nearer the fact to say that Pettigrew had gained in popular esteem. He had been a very diligent official and had presumably accomplished all that any delegate could have accomplished for the interests of the territory, hindered as he had been by the interference of Governor Ordway, whose hostility seemed of such a nature that he would prefer the defeat of a worthy measure if presented by Pettigrew in order to weaken his standing at home.

In July, 1882, the Grand Forks Herald discovered that the omens were favorable to a northern candidate owing to the personal enmities that were being engendered in the southern half of the territory between the Pettigrew and Hand factions, and with some show of exultation predicted the nomination of John B. Raymond, of Fargo, as the candidate who would be nominated for delegate.

Mr. Raymond's candidacy had not been authoritatively announced at any time until the territorial convention had gathered, and then it was understood by many that he would not enter the field unless it became necessary in order to defeat Pettigrew; but still there were substantial indications, which were confirmed by the proceedings of the convention, that the plan of the Northern Dakota delegates, or the Cass County contingent, was to nominate Raymond regardless of the methods that might be necessary to accomplish it. Mr. Hand's supporters were all, personally, friendly to Raymond, and so far as any expression was had from them they intended to support him whenever it appeared that Mr. Hand could not be nominated.

The leading issue with the people was the division of the territory into a north and south territory, and Pettigrew had displayed excellent judgment in his efforts to secure it. Former delegates had tried and failed, not from any dereliction of duty, but from the stubborn hostility of Congress to grant the favor. There was also an irreconcilable element that felt that Judge Bennett had been wrongfully deprived of a renomination two years before. But Pettigrew's strongest opposition arose from the character of the candidates who opposed him, and their friends had discovered that the time was propitious for pressing their claims. Mr. Hand's supporters disclosed surprising strength in the counties south of the forty-sixth parallel, which was the line upon which it was proposed to divide the territory; and Mr. Raymond's friends, without much effort, secured the north. The Black Hills counties were a third division where each of the candidates had supporters; but Pettigrew and Raymond divided the field between them. In Lawrence County the preliminary campaign was so warmly contested that it resulted in two county conventions and two delegations—one for Pettigrew and one for Raymond.

As the county conventions were held in the southern section of the territory, it developed that the contest was between Pettigrew and Hand; and in a large number of counties this contest was so spirited that the conventions were broken up and separate conventions held, resulting in the election of two sets of delegates to the territorial convention.

THE TERRITORIAL CONVENTION

The territorial convention, under the call, provided for 343 delegates. As the various county conventions were held and the delegates elected it was ascertained some time before the assembling of the convention that Mr. Pettigrew had secured uncontested delegations from the counties of Minnehaha, 10; Brule, 3; Charles Mix, 2; Codington, 7; Clark, 2; Douglas, 1; Hughes, 3; McCook, 5. Total, 42.

Mr. Hand had secured uncontested delegations from Yankton, 12; Brown, 6; Brookings, 12; Clay, 7; Davidson, 6; Day, 2; Hanson, 6; Hamlin, 3; Hand, 4; Hutchinson, 6; Kingsbury, 7; Lake, 6; Miner, 4; Spink, 5; Turner, 10. Total, 96. Union and Lincoln were for Alexander Hughes, but declared for Hand at Grand Forks, giving him 116 uncontested votes.

The counties presumed to be supporting Mr. Raymond, or a Northern Dakota candidate, were: Cass, 15; Barnes, 6; Custer, 4; Grand Forks, 15; Griggs, 2; Kidder, 2; Mandan, 1; Morton, 6; Pennington, 6; Ransom, 3; Richland, 10; Stutsman, 6; Traill, 12; Walsh, 8. Total, 95. Burleigh, 10, supported McLean, and Pembina, 12, supported LaMoure or Nelson. These two counties were hostile to Raymond because he was a Fargo man.

"Double-headers," as they were called, or two sets of delegates, had been selected from the counties of Lincoln, 11; Bon Homme, 9; Beadle, 6; Moody, 7; Deuel, 5; Grant, 8; Beadle, 5; Lawrence, 30. Total, 81.

The following list of delegates, elected by the several counties, claimed seats in the convention: Aurora County, A. M. Andrews, J. D. Miracle, B. H. Sullivan; Bon Homme County, T. O. Bogert, A. J. Mills, John Williams, S. W. Wilcox, John McNeal, D. L. Burgess, Solomon Wenzlaff, T. M. Hitt, J. O. Simmett, Daniel Wilcox; second delegation, C. T. McCoy, Asa Covell, F. A. Morgan, George W. Snow, John L. Turner, Frank Alexander, George Helzinger, Peter Wagner, Joseph Stone; Barnes County, B. W. Benson, F. H. Remington, F. H. Devaux, Seth Mills, J. E. Hubbell, H. O. Steel, W. F. Kingsbury, Myron Blodgett, S. W. Howe, J. B. Wynn, H. Ellermann, Hald Sater, Alexander Hughes, B. S. Williams, A. W. Lavender, Jacob Brauch, S. B. McGlumphy, M. A. Baker.

The convention was called to order by Chairman Walsh, of Grand Forks County, whereupon Col. H. F. Ball, of Cass County, was elected temporary chairman, and A. W. Edwards, of the same county, temporary secretary. The chairman explained the situation regarding the contested delegations and the impropriety of admitting either party of the contestants to take part in the preliminary proceedings; and also stated to the convention the agreement that had been made to refer the disputes to a credentials committee composed of five North Dakota delegates, to be appointed by the chair, together with two uncontested Pettigrew delegates and two uncontested Hand delegates from the southern counties; these southern members of the committee to be selected by the uncontested Hand and Pettigrew delegations, making a committee of nine, with the northern part of the territory holding the balance of power.

The chair then appointed as the Credentials Committee: From North Dakota, W. E. Dodge of Stutsman County, N. Upham of Walsh County, F. D. Hughes of Grand Forks County; R. H. Young of Pembina County, and F. H. Remington of Barnes County; for Mr. Pettigrew, C. H. Winsor of Minnehaha and F. A. Goodykoontz of Brule; for Mr. Hand, Alexander Hughes of Union County and John A. Owen of Kingsbury.

This committee began its sessions the same day (Wednesday) and occupied all of Thursday, holding nearly all-night sessions, and Thursday night it became known through friendly committeemen that the Credentials Committee had completed its investigation and that the report would favor the admission of a majority of the Hand delegates from the contested counties east of the Missouri River and the Raymond delegates from Lawrence County—the Parker-Dawson delegation instead of the McMasters delegation.

These night reports must have been received as authentic and convinced the friends of Mr. Pettigrew he could not be renominated. As it was morally certain, with the northern counties standing by their agreement, to sustain the report of their own committee, it practically insured the nomination of Mr. Hand.

Mr. Hand's defeat and the defeat of the report of the majority of the committee were points in the political game much desired by the friends of the Sioux Falls candidate because of their influence upon home sentiment, and in order to accomplish this a bargain was effected between a large majority of the northern delegates to the convention and the delegates favorable to Mr. Pettigrew, during Thursday night and Friday morning, under which the committee's report was to be practically ignored by the convention, and a minority report submitted by Mr. Winsor, of Sioux Falls, adopted. (This minority report recommended the admission of the Pettigrew delegates from Lincoln, Bon Homme, Moody, Deuel, Grant, Beadle and Aurora counties.) The agreement further stipulated that Mr. Raymond, of North Dakota, was to be nominated, Mr. Pettigrew presenting his name to the convention, and Pettigrew and his friends to have the privilege of naming the members of the Territorial Central Committee from the southern counties.

This program was carried out when the convention met the following day. The first business, however, was the report of the Committee on Permanent Organization, composed of A. R. Z. Dawson of Lawrence County, S. G. Roberts of Cass County, W. F. Steele of Kidder County, E. W. Caldwell of Minnehaha, and A. C. Horst of Grand Forks. This committee recommended the election of George H. Walsh, of Grand Forks, for permanent chairman, and J. F. Stahl, of Lake County, secretary. The report was adopted.

The convention assembled at 9 A. M. on Thursday to receive the report of the Committee on Credentials, but adjourned again until 2 P. M., as the committee required further time. Reconvening in the afternoon, the report of the Committee on Credentials was presented and read.

The majority report, signed by the five North Dakota members, and by Hughes and Owens, recommended the admission of the Raymond delegation from the Black Hills, Lawrence County, and the Hand delegations from the contested counties of Brookings, Grant, Lincoln and Bon Homme, the Pettigrew delegations from Aurora, Lake and Hughes, and that both delegations from Moody, Deuel and Beadle be admitted with half a vote each. This report was signed by the five northern members, Messrs. Dodge, Upham, Hughes of Grand Forks, Young of Pembina, and Remington; also by Alexander Hughes and John A. Owen.

C. H. Winsor, of the committee, then read a minority report proposing to give the Pettigrew delegations the counties of Bon Homme, Beadle, Deuel, Lincoln, Aurora, Grant and Moody. This report was signed by Winsor and Goodykoontz.

The uncontested counties were Barnes, Burleigh, Brown, Brule, Cass, Clay, Custer, Charles Mix, Davison, Day, Griggs, Hanson, Hamlin, Hutchinson, Kidder, Kingsbury, LaMoure, Miner, McCook, Minnehaha, Mandan, Morton, Pennington, Pembina, Ransom, Stutsman, Spink, Traill, Turner, Walsh, Yankton, Union and Dickey.

The contested counties were Aurora, Bon Homme, Beadle, Brookings, Douglas, Deuel, Lake, Lawrence, Lincoln, Moody and Grant.

That portion of the majority report relative to uncontested delegations was, upon motion, adopted.

Roberts, of Cass County, moved that both reports be accepted and presented to the convention; then each contested county be presented, and arguments, limited to five minutes, be heard on each side. The motion was carried.

The Lawrence County contest was an affair separate and apart from the differences which divided the Hand and Pettigrew forces. The discussion before the convention was carried on by such forcible speakers as Colonel Moody, Colonel Parker, Gen. A. J. Plowman and Gen. A. R. Z. Dawson. The Raymond delegation was admitted.

A long discussion followed regarding the various county contests, which was terminated by the chair declaring that all counties were entitled to vote except Aurora, Bon Homme, Beadle, Brookings, Deuel, Douglas, Hughes, Hand, Lake, Lawrence, Lincoln and Moody.

A motion was then made to accept the minority report from Bon Homme County. Another motion to lay the minority report on the table was voted down. This was the first Pettigrew victory. The question recurred upon the original motion to adopt the minority report and admit the Pettigrew delegation, which was adopted, the North Dakota delegates on the Credentials Committee who had signed the majority report voting for it with the exception of Mr. Young, of Pembina, who refused to sanction the deal.

The minority reports favoring the Pettigrew delegations on all the remaining contested cases, except Grant County, were then adopted. When the compact between Northern Dakota delegations, save those of Burleigh and Pembina, was disclosed, Capt. Alexander Hughes, for the Hand forces, arose and said that he had been requested on behalf of the Hand delegations to say that they bow to the combination.

This part of the proceedings being concluded, Mr. Pettigrew stepped forward in front of the delegates, and addressing the convention, withdrew his candidacy and placed in nomination Capt. John B. Raymond. It was then moved to nominate Raymond by acclamation, but an amendment to vote by counties was carried. Two hundred and twenty-seven votes were cast, all but ten of which were for Raymond. Brown, Brookings, Clay, Douglas, Grant, Hamlin, Hutchinson, Kingsbury, Miner, Pembina, Davison, Day, Turner, Union and Yankton counties declined to vote.

Burleigh and Pembina counties had refused to sanction the trade, and their votes were cast: Burleigh for McLean, and Pembina for Nelson or LaMoure. Mr. Hand's friends and delegates declined to participate in the proceedings and his name was not presented. Mr. Raymond was nominated by the vote of all the counties that voted except the two northern counties above noted.

The report of the Committee on Resolutions was presumably submitted to the convention at the evening session, and adopted; but the substance of its declarations, and not the text of the document, was given out, due probably to the haste which characterized the closing moments of the proceedings. However, it very appropriately resolved that the course of Delegate Pettigrew during his official term met with the approval of the people of the territory; that he had been untiring in his efforts to promote the important measures before Congress which were considered of first importance to the people, including the division of the territory, the improvement of the Missouri and Red rivers in the interest of navigation, and in promoting a treaty with the Sioux for opening a large portion of their reservation.

The resolutions also declared for a division of the territory on the forty-sixth parallel, and pledged the nominee of the convention to work for the success of such division uncompromisingly. Another resolution gave the unqualified assurance to the people of the territory that the nominee, Captain Raymond, was a man of superior intelligence, wide acquaintance with America's public men, a man of sterling integrity, and thoroughly in sympathy with the efforts being made to develop the natural resources of the territory; and that the national Government should by liberal legislation encourage its people by every legitimate means in their resolute endeavors to reclaim the fertile but unsettled domain of the great West.

The other resolutions had to do with the hospitality of the people of Grand Forks, and an acknowledgment of the generosity of the railways in transporting the delegates, and a vote of thanks to the president of the convention for the able and impartial manner in which he had discharged the duties of his position. These latter resolutions may not have been intended as a part of the platform, but in the pressure of business and haste to get away they were all included on the page devoted to the platform.

The Raymond forces did not need the contested county vote to nominate their man, but with the help of the Pettigrew uncontested reinforcement could have controlled the convention. And the first agreement between the conspirators was to leave out the contested counties or admit both sides; Pettigrew to be given the honor of personally nominating Raymond, and also have the privilege of naming the members of the central committee from the counties south of the forty-sixth parallel. Finding their allies of Cass and Stutsman counties willing to even further abase themselves if they could be assured of Raymond, the stalwart Pettigrew lieutenants, who were members of many of the proposed rejected delegations, amended their original claim and demanded that their delegations should be legitimized and whitewashed by their admission to the convention on an equal footing with their fellow conspirators, and this was acceded to by the disciplined forces under Edwards, Haggart, Ball and Nickens.

The Territorial Central Committee selected was composed of E. P. Wells, chairman, Stutsman County; H. M. Gregg, Stutsman; A. J. Plowman, Lawrence; A. J. Boland, Pennington; C. T. McCoy, Bon Homme; F. A. Goodykoontz, Brule; E. W. Caldwell, Minnehaha; George W. Hawes, Grant; William Skinner, Brookings; W. M. Cuppett, Lincoln; John Fadden, Grand Forks; Iver Larson, Traill; H. F. Miller, Cass; B. H. Benson, Barnes; W. F. Steele, Kidder.

The methods by which the nomination had been obtained, and not the nominee, were severely criticised throughout the territory. Mr. Raymond's personal acquaintance with the people and the regard in which he was held quieted any disposition to revolt, and he was accepted by the republicans in every section of the territory, and also well supported, and elected by an unprecedented majority. It proved, however, a barren victory for Northern Dakota, and not a happy event in the career of Mr. Raymond, as will appear from the territorial convention held at Pierre two years later, and other events following. It was subsequently asserted that the removal of the capitol, which took place the following winter, was connected with this deal, but we find nothing to support this charge. On the contrary, it is found that Mr. Pettigrew strenuously opposed the removal, and Mr. Raymond gave mortal offense to Ordway and McKenzie because he refused to introduce a bill in Congress validating the capital removal proceedings. Still there is little doubt but that the capital removal was suggested by these proceedings. If the northern wire-pullers could by their wits control a convention, two-thirds of whose members were from the south, why should they hesitate to tackle the Legislature and secure the capital as well as the delegate? A half year later this was accomplished by much the same methods as those pursued by the ring-leaders of Cass and Stutsman counties in this convention.

Neither Bennett's or Pettigrew's failure to be renominated by their party representatives was due to any delinquency on their part in their capacity of delegate to Congress, for both were diligent in their duties and fairly successful, especially when it is considered that the former was not in sympathy politically with the democratic House, and the latter had, in addition, the interference of the governor in his duties. But the difficulties they encountered in seeking a renomination were inherent in the factionalism that prevailed in the republican party of the territory. The party was much divided when their nominations were made, and though in obedience to party discipline the nominees were supported by the full strength of the party, except in the case of Judge Bennett; after the election had passed the adherents of each faction to a great extent fell apart and remained apart, and were enabled, in each case, to defeat their former antagonist for renomination. That is about all that can be said in explanation of the territory's failure to keep these experienced leaders longer than one term.

These frequent changes did not indicate dissatisfaction in the minds of the people, but emphasized the restless ambition of leaders, and sectional rivalries and differences. There can very little, if anything, be said derogatory to the efficiency of any of Dakota's numerous delegates. They accomplished all that could be accomplished, and nothing failed for lack of attention. The delegates were also, as a rule, capable representatives, and were so regarded by the members of both House and Senate.

DEMOCRATIC TERRITORIAL CONVENTION

The Democratic Territorial Convention of 1882 met at Mitchell on Wednesday, September 27th, and was called to order by Hon. D. M. Inman, of Vermillion, chairman of the Territorial Committee. C. H. Wynn, of Sioux Falls, was elected temporary chairman, who made a fine address in response to the compliment which had been paid him, and on motion appointed the following committees:

On Credentials—J. Brinkerhoff, chairman, Bon Homme County; D. P. Wilcox, Lawrence County; Dennis Hannafin, Burleigh County; J. V. Conklin, Lincoln County; A. P. Allen, Moody County; D. R. Demean, Brule County; A. A. Partridge, Clay County.

On Resolutions—Maris Taylor, Yankton; F. M. Ziebach, Bon Homme; T. S. Goddard, Minnehaha; J. S. Foster, Davison; John R. Whiteside, Clay; Frank Foster, Hanson; Ben C. Ash, Hughes; C. E. Brooks, Yankton.

On Permanent Organization—M. H. Day, Bon Homme; William VanEps, Minnehaha; J. Geehon, Lincoln; C. J. B. Harris, Yankton; William Leeper, Hughes; John R. Wood, Union.

After a brief absence the Credentials Committee submitted the following report, which was adopted:

Your committee found the delegates entitled to seats in this convention from the several counties are as follows: Bon Homme County, J. Brinkerhoff, F. M. Zeibach, Charles W. McCullom, S. Simpson, Wesley Janda, Frank Richmond, James Keegan (proxy to George Hefner), M. H. Day, C. S. Rowe; Barnes, Beadle and Brown counties were not represented; Brule County, S. W. Duncan, Louis Richards (proxy to L. W. Lewis), E. Greene (proxy to S. W. Duncan); Charles Mix and Cass counties not represented; Clay County, John R. Whiteside, A. A. Partridge, Franklin Taylor, John Babb, Jonathan Kimball, James Devine, G. Schott, D. M. Inman; Codington County, James Monahan, Lewis Hottinger, George W. Carpenter, R. F. Wagner (proxy to M. W. The Committee on Permanent Organization reported, recommending Judge W. M. McLaughlin, of Lawrence County, for permanent chairman; J. W. Turner, of Turner County, and T. S. Goddard, of Minnehaha County, vice presidents; Maris Taylor and M. W. Sheafe, Jr., secretaries.

The report was adopted, and the permanent officers were escorted to their places.

The Committee on Resolutions made the following report:

Resolved, That we view with alarm the growing evil of influencing and controlling public elections by the use of money, to corrupt and intimidate voters; that this pernicious practice is fostered by the republican party by its levies of head-money for base uses, to tempt the voter for gain, to barter his suffrage, or awe him into inaction by reason of its power; that our institutions can remain permanently free so long only as the voters are free to discharge their civic duties according to their best judgment.

Resolved, That we are in favor of the division of Dakota on the 46th parallel, and of retaining the present name of Dakota for the southern half.

Resolved, That we believe in home, and are opposed to the system of foreign appointments to federal positions within this territory.

Resolved, That we deprecate the dishonesty and corrupt practices in many counties in Southern Dakota under republican control, and pledge the democratic party to the support of men for all public positions who possess the Jeffersonian qualifications of honesty and capability.

Resolved, That we favor a strict and stringent license law for the regulation of the liquor traffic, and oppose all sumptuary and prohibition laws.

After discussion, the second resolution, relating to the division of the territory, was stricken out and the remainder adopted.

Nominations for a candidate for delegate in Congress being in order, the following named persons were presented by the delegations from their respective counties as candidates:

William R. Steele of Lawrence County, William VanEps of Minnehaha, F. M. Ziebach of Bon Homme, Alexander McKenzie of Burleigh, James S. Foster of Davison, D. M. Inman of Clay, E. W. Miller of Union, and a ballot being taken, resulted: Ziebach, 37; Steele, 57; Inman, 20; McKenzie, 15; Foster, 6; VanEps, 5; Miller, 10; Brooks, 2; McLaughlin, 2. After a number of changes in the vote and the withdrawal of a number of candidates, Mr. Steele was found to have a large majority, and was declared by the chair to be the nominee of the convention for delegate.

D. M. Inman was then elected chairman of the Territorial Central Committee, which was made up of three members from each judicial district, as follows: First District, D. P. Wilcox, R. P. Cormack, Judge Rhinehart; Second District, C. J. B. Harris, M. H. Day, James S. Foster; Third District, M. McCormack, John P. Dunn, D. M. Kelliher; Fourth District, Abe Boynton, John R. Wood, T. S. Goddard.

On motion, the action of the convention in striking out the second resolution in the platform relating to division was reconsidered, and the plank was then reinserted by a vote of 115 to 36. Wilcox, of Lawrence, championed the reconsideration. The convention then adjourned.

Shortly after the adjournment of the convention the chairman of the central committee received from Mr. Steele a telegraphic dispatch positively declining to accept the nomination.

Mr. Steele had been a resident of Cheyenne, Wyo., for a number of years, and was elected delegate to Congress from that territory for two successive terms, and had removed to South Dakota two or three years prior to this convention. He was an able young man, a lawyer, and was highly regarded as a citizen by the people of the territory generally. His selection was regarded as very creditable to the democratic party of Dakota. It was therefore a serious disappointment to receive from him a positive declination to accept the nomination on account of pressing business engagements; but he would do whatever he could to assist whomsoever the convention might agree upon.

The central committee met with considerable difficulty in finding a suitable person who was willing to accept the candidacy. Finally, at a meeting held at Elk Point, they agreed upon Judge W. W. Brookings, who had recently severed his connection with the republican party, of which he had long been a leader, and he consented to become the democratic standard bearer. Considerable comment was occasioned by this turn of affairs, as it was not generally known that Mr. Brookings had left the republican organization; and he was unquestionably influenced in accepting the democratic candidacy by a mistaken conception of the sentiment of the people growing out of the action of the republican convention at Grand Forks. The methods pursued by that convention in making their nomination were generally condemned, but the candidate selected was satisfactory to the republicans and was supported by a united party. Mr. Brookings doubtless felt that he would be able to draw heavily from the disgruntled republican element, but instead of receiving aid from that quarter the democrats fell away from his support by thousands.

The election was held on Tuesday, November 7th. The official vote in Dakota by counties, as canvassed, was as follows:

Mr. Raymond received the certificate of election, and entered upon his duties March 4, 1883.

NO. 1 HARD GAVE NAMES TO OUR STATES

There was considerable interest taken in the name of the new territory to be erected out of the northern part of Dakota Territory. The memorials of the Legislature for many years, while they urgently plead for a new territorial organization, had not mentioned the name of Dakota or North Dakota as the name of the new political organization, but Pembina had been the favorite name with the North Dakota representatives, and occasionally Chippewa and Ojibway. Pembina seemed to be the title that all united upon until the great farms of Dalrymple and others were opened, when the Northern Pacific people and other influences conceived the idea that "North Dakota No. 1, hard," would be a commercial asset if retained in part as the name of the new territory.

Dakota wheat had been celebrated for its excellence from the earliest settlements in the southern part of the territory, and there were seasons when thirty bushels to the acre was about the average, while exceptional cases were cited as high as fifty bushels to the acre. But there were no colossal farms and no way in which they could be readily procured until the Government made its munificent land grant to the Northern Pacific Company. Then a 30,000-acre tract could be obtained, and capitalists could make money and also a national fame for their holdings by planting 5,000-acre wheat fields and harvesting from 125,000 to 150,000 bushels of wheat of the best quality. A crop of such magnitude from a single farm created a sensation throughout the country. Presidents became interested, and were pleased to pay the homage of their distinguished presence to the bonanza farmers of "Northern Dakota." Congressmen, scores in number, took advantage of the very moderate transportation rates that were offered at that time to our distinguished men, came out and gazed with wondering admiration on Dakota's waving grain fields. Railroad presidents, our territorial governors, military chieftains, cabinet ministers, eminent judges and a host of minor lights followed, and saw with real or well-feigned enthusiasm the marvelous steam plows cutting through the sod and turning over the fertile earth; beheld the long ranks of mowers and reapers at work in the field, and through clouds of dusty mist, saw the giant threshers at work. It was an exhilarating experience to many, and when these returned to their constituents they related what they had seen, and naturally enough awakened a desire in the breasts of thousands of humble husbandmen in the eastern states to remove to the grand Dakota land and share in the prosperity and popularity its people enjoyed.

Our statistics show that the average production of wheat to the acre has been about the same throughout the territory, from south to north, and the quality was quite uniform under like conditions of planting, weather and harvesting. But corn and live stock growing had been discovered to be most profitable to the farmers of the southernmost section, and they to some extent abandoned the less remunerative cultivation of wheat. However, an examination of the statistics of the various counties in the territory show that wheat has uniformly formed a large item in the annual produce of every county. Many good progressive and prosperous farmers insist that a wheat patch is essential to a fair distribution of the land cropped, and benefits the land for the succeeding crop of some other variety of grain or grass. It is a fact that before Dakota had a mile of railroad within its borders to furnish cheap transportation for its surplus produce to market, the wheat grown in the limited settlements of the southern portion was eagerly sought after by millmen of rural Nebraska and Iowa because of the excellent quality of the flour it produced. Thus the name "Dakota" was a valuable trade mark, its reputation was well sustained as settlements increased and production grew into the many millions of bushels, and the timely and gratifying successes of the wheat growers in the northern sections gave to the name "Dakota wheat" a value and an additional selling price that in the aggregate would pay a large proportion of the taxes.

DAKOTA'S LIVE STOCK INTEREST

Dakota Territory acquired fame because of its immense herds of fine cattle that people its ample pastures, particularly in the country west of the Missouri River, and included the Black Hills after the opening of that region in 1877. It was from that date that the great industry had its beginning. Rapid City was prominent as the headquarters of a number of the leading owners of the animals, with Charles K. Howard, the pioneer of modern Sioux Falls, as a cattle king. Deadwood was also a residence center, and Custer City another. The industry was in the zenith of its prosperity about 1882, and at the annual round-up in that year some notes were obtained of its magnitude and other features. The winter had been an average one on the ranges, but the spring had not been favorable owing to freshets and a late season. The round-up occurred in June; but the small misfortunes of the season had been fully compensated by a rise in prices in the consuming markets.

The stock growers of Dakota and Wyoming were an intelligent body of men and realized the importance of their industry not only as a wealth producer, but as contributing to the food-consuming people of the nation who made up the foundation of their patronage. They were quite desirous to increase the number of their herds, but equally solicitous about the quality. They maintained a number of expert purchasers who were engaged in securing the best brands of beef cattle to mix with their herds. There was one drove of eighty blooded bulls brought into Dakota from Minnesota in 1882, and other herds were obtained from Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska. The result of this enterprising policy pursued for a few years was to secure for Dakota beef as high a standard in the live stock market as had been accorded to its famous northern grown wheat in the grain markets of the world. The magnitude of the industry was not realized outside the realms where the cattle kings were monarchs of all they surveyed. And it may not have been generally known that the amplest and best feeding grounds in the country, save those in Texas, were the former buffalo plains of Dakota and Wyoming. In what was called the Black Hills ranges there were 500,000 head of cattle, exclusive of work stock. Reduced to its money value, it is apparent that the industry was one of the most important in the territory. As the opportunities and facilities favored an increase of the herds, there was an expectation that another year would witness an addition of 25 per cent to the industry. The business, as conducted by experienced parties, found that the labor expense was the largest item to be met. One round of complete stock was turned loose to range for eleven months, in many cases comparatively unattended, and compelled to "rustle" for food. In some instances taxation was avoided by ranging herds upon land without the pale of the assessor's jurisdiction, such as unorganized districts, which were abundant in Western Dakota. The Indian reserve also furnished pasturage, and though the treaties prohibited any encroachment by the whites, this obstacle was not infrequently overcome by the marriage of white stockmen into Indian families, thus becoming members of the tribe to an extent sufficient to secure the privilege accorded the Indians to pasture their live stock on the reservation land. At a later day the Government arranged to lease the nonused Indian land to live stock men at a certain price per acre, the rental price being given to the Indians interested, which was regarded as a commendable economy on the part of the Government.

BUFFALO

The reports heretofore made from time to time of the scarcity of buffalo on the northern plains appear to have been in large part founded on incorrect reports. A responsible fur and buffalo robe dealer named Wolfolk returned to Bismarck in January, 1882, having spent several weeks on a fur-buying trip to O'Fallon's Creek, a tributary from the south that empties into the Yellowstone. Wolfolk had purchased $26,000 worth of buffalo robes while on his trip from white hunters. There were no Indians in the country. The hunting was all done by whites, who had been quite successful. Game existed in great abundance in the O'Fallon Valley. The plains for miles around were strewn with carcasses of animals that had been slaughtered for their hides alone, and it was apprehended that the decomposition of these thousands of dead animals, which would set in with the return of summer, would be apt to breed a pestilence on the frontier, though the extraordinary healthfulness of the mountain climate and the curative effect it has on exposed meat of any kind was expected to modify this danger largely. While there were thousands of these animals killed every winter for their skins, and thousands more slaughtered during the summer by the Indians for food and their hides, yet the number and extent of the herds in the far Northwest, judging from the vast number of hides secured, showed no diminution. But there was a limit, and the completion of the railroads through the buffalo feeding grounds brought about the extinction of the century old traffic. The buffalo, like the wild and untamed Indian, abhors civilization and the shriek of the locomotive, and will not remain where their presence can offend him. Even following this venture of Mr. Wolfolk, a remarkable falling off of all the game animals in that country was observable.

INCREASE OF POPULATION NOTED BY CONGRESS

The rapid increase of population in the Territory of Dakota during the two years beginning January, 1880, and ending December, 1881, is nowhere more reliably shown than in the report of the House Committee on Territories, submitted in 1882, when reporting the bill for the admission of the State of Dakota. We copy the paragraphs exhibiting this increase:

From the establishment of the first land office in the Territory of Dakota until June, 1880, a period of eighteen years, the whole number of preemption and homestead claims filed was only 44,122, while the records of the land office disclose that since the census of 1880, and to the 31st of December, 1881, there were entered of these claims 16,718 during a period of less than nineteen months. That the whole number of acres thus entered previous to the census of 1880 was only 7,381,880, while 1,029,280 have been taken during the succeeding nineteen months.

As each of these preemption filings and homestead entries must be based upon a personal settlement, residence and cultivation, and as no claim can be perfected except upon strict proof of these essentials, such entries alone furnish the strongest evidence of a large increase of population. Estimating four persons for each land entry, it would give an increase of population since the 1st of June, 1880, of 66,872. This calculation does not take into account the increase of population based upon the number of entries and filings since the 1st of January, 1882, nor the number of persons constantly settling ahead of surveys or engaged in mining, prospecting, freighting, commercial and other pursuits, which, it is believed, would swell the aggregate of increase since the census of 1880 to nearly 75,000.

PENITENTIARY OFFICIALLY OPENED

Pursuant to a law passed at the session of the Legislature of 1881, providing for the erection and opening of the territorial penitentiary, the following proclamation was issued by the governor of the territory on the 22d of November, 1882:

Whereas, The following notification has been received from the directors of the territorial penitentiary, showing that the new penitentiary at Sioux Falls is ready for occupancy:

To his Excellency, N. G. Ordway, Governor of Dakota Territory.

Sir: We are pleased to inform you that the territorial penitentiary is now in readiness to receive convicts, and would most respectfully ask that an order be issued for the removal of the territorial convicts now in the house of correction at Detroit, Mich., to the territorial penitentiary at Sioux Falls, D. T.

Respectfully,

W. L. DOW,

R. H. BOOTH,

THOS. H. BROWN,

Board of Directors of Dakota Penitentiary.

Now, therefore, I, Nehemiah G. Ordway, governor of the Territory of Dakota, in accordance with the before named law, do make this my proclamation, announcing the fact that the territorial penitentiary located at Sioux Falls, in the County of Minnehaha, is now ready for occupancy and the reception and safe keeping of territorial prisoners who are now confined under previous acts of the Legislative Assembly at the house of correction, in the City of Detroit, in the State of Michigan; also all persons who have been or may hereafter be convicted and sentenced to the territorial penitentiary by any and all territorial courts within and for the Territory of Dakota. And each sheriff and judge of the district courts in this territory is hereby required to take notice that after thirty days from the date of this proclamation, any and all persons, sentenced to imprisonment in the territorial prison, shall be committed to such prison at Sioux Falls, D. T.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the great seal of the territory. (L. S.)

Done at Yankton, the capital of Dakota Territory, on this 22d day of November, A. D. 1882. N. G. ORDBAY.

By the Governor; GEO. H. HAND, Secretary of the Territory.

The removal of the prisoners from Detroit was begun on the 11th of December following. There were twenty-nine prisoners in the first squad transferred, in charge of Warden Koehler, who had been deputy warden at Detroit, but had been appointed warden of the new Dakota institution. He was assisted by Sheriff Dixon of Minnehaha County, Sheriff M. A. Baker of Yankton County, Sheriff Boyce of Union County, Sheriff Clark of Moody County, and Messrs. Booth and Brown of the penitentiary board. The transfer was accomplished without unpleasant incident. There were a number of prisoners whose terms of imprisonment would expire within a short time, and these were pardoned.

INSANE HOSPITAL DESTROYED BY FIRE

The State Insane Hospital at Yankton was destroyed by fire on the afternoon of Sunday, April 2, 1882. The cause of the fire was no doubt accidental, but further than that there seemed no satisfactory clue except that a spark of fire had been wafted into an open window while the patients were outside enjoying an airing, the day being a fine one. Four of the male patients lost their lives in the fire.

Henry Heflen, attendant in the male ward, gave these particulars. Himself and his brother, Marion, had the male patients, thirty-four in number, out on the lawn playing ball. After the hour of sport the attendants started to take the patients back to their ward, Heflen leading, and as he opened the door of the west wing he saw that the room was filled with smoke. He sprang up the narrow stairway, and at least a dozen of the patients crowded behind him. He discovered that the whole upper dormitory of the west wing was in flames, the fire reaching entirely across the room. When he turned to descend he found the stairway blocked by the excited patients. He crowded them back, and was compelled to knock some of them down and drag them with him. The fire made quick work of the entire structure; but the infirm patients and the women were all taken out in safety. There were five lives lost, but this was due to the uncontrollable frenzy of a very few patients, who would rush into the burning building, and become involved in the smoke and intense heat. These unfortunates were Peter Peterson, of Fargo; Ora Lynch, an idiot boy from Elk Point; Amen Iversen, of Yankton; Joseph Havelly, of Deadwood, and L. J. Prindle, also of Deadwood.

The new brick structure which had been in process of building was fortunately inhabitable, though unfurnished; its furniture had been received and stored in the burned building and was all destroyed. The superintendent of the hospital was Dr. S. B. McGlumphy, who exerted himself to save the lives of the patients, for there were many who required to be forcibly restrained to prevent them from rushing into the flaming structure. Whether they realized that there was danger in the fire did not appear, and many of the convalescing patients were observed holding the wilder ones from imperilling their lives. A messenger was sent to Yankton as soon as the flames were discovered, and the fire department immediately responded; but they had three miles to traverse before reaching the scene of the fire, and they arrived too late to be of any service, for the flames did their work of destruction in less than half an hour. Doctor McGlumphy lost a fine library and all his surgical instruments, and the employees lost their money which they had left in their trunks, one of them $,100. The loss to the territory was about fifteen thousand eight hundred dollars with $7,800 insurance.

The new building was furnished sufficiently to insure the comfort and safety of the patients from materials procured at Yankton. There were fifty-four insane persons in the hospital at the time of the fire, thirty-five males, and nineteen females.

A coroner's jury was impanelled and an inquest held at the hospital on the 3d, 5th, and 11th days of April following, before Dr. D. Frank Etter, county coroner. The jury found that the five persons who were fatally burned came to their deaths by the accidental burning of the Dakota Hospital for the Insane, on the 2d day of April, 1882, the said deceased persons being then lawful inmates therein. The jurors found that the hospital was destroyed by fire which originated in the west wing, being the male ward; the particular cause of the origin of the fire the jurors were unable to determine. The jurors also found that the fire did not originate, or the deaths of the above named persons did not occur, through the negligence or carelessness of any officer or employee of said institution. On the contrary they find that the available time during which it was possible to render any assistance to the persons whose lives were imperilled, did not exceed five minutes for the male ward and ten minutes for the female ward, and that the entire structure was in flames within thirty minutes from the first discovery of the fire. That during the time the officers and employees exerted themselves with judgment, energy, and courage, toward the rescue of the inmates, and that especial commendation is due to those in charge of the female ward of the institution. Signed by D. Frank Etter, coroner, J. L. Foskett, Robert Burns, I. Piles, jurors.

There was great room for improvement in the proper care of the insane at this time, but it was manifested that this improvement could not be had without the expenditure of the money necessary to pay for it. It was therefore plain that the improvement must begin, or be initiated by the people themselves, and through their influence and support, through the people's representatives who controlled the public purse and were charged with the responsibility of expending the people's money. Improvement would cost money but in this case would be humanely and wisely invested if repaid in the improved condition and more rapid recovery of the patients.

Legislatures should be extremely careful not to make niggardly appropriations for such an institution as an insane hospital. If there is one institution above all others that must be maintained, it is that which cares for the insane, and to no one except the insane patient does this truth have a deeper meaning than to those who are charged with the administration of these hospitals. They feel that they must keep going though the money to meet expenses is scant and insufficient. The result is hurtful economy and this economy must be borne in great part by the patient. It is necessary to reduce the number of attendants—already below the number which the welfare of the patients require—a cheaper and plainer diet is resorted to in order to eke out the year with the small amount on hand, and probably irreparable injury results to many patients who may be on the road to recovery, but are halted in their progress because the care and watchfulness most essential for them cannot be afforded.

The attendants should be young women and men of excellent character and good ability, always. To secure this class of people wages or salaries must be fixed on a liberal scale. By offering this inducement the territory would be able to secure intelligent, and capable young people, and would be further able to retain their services, which is of greater importance as a factor in promoting the well being and hastening the recovery of patients. A constant shifting and change in the ranks of employees is hurtful in many ways, but in none more than that it invites a respectable class who take up the work as a temporary employment, and abandon it within a few months for other fields where wages are more inviting. Under such influences the attendant is acquiring a nomadic character such as is found in many of the mechanical employments, and has no heart in the work, and not much regard for the trust it imposes. The helpless and unfortunate condition of the people entrusted to their charge does not appeal to their sympathies or awaken any realization of the graver responsibilities assumed and the sacred duties devolving upon them. It is thus that the niggardly appropriation works; and when this is understood and realized by the people, they will insist upon a more liberal and consistent support of insane hospitals. Instead of making appropriations barely sufficient to poorly support the institution, they should be ample and if anything more than has been estimated by those in charge of the institution, for the reason that these officials have been so impressed by the legislative reluctance to credit their estimates; by the unreasonable and stubbornly ignorant view taken of the needs of such institutions that they are inclined to pare down their estimates to the danger point. They are made to believe that the value of their services will be measured by the "How cheap can you run the hospital?" and not as it should be: "How well can you conduct it in the interest of the insane people?" Let judgment be passed upon what is accomplished—not solely on what is spent—as though a father, mother, sister or brother's reason and all the hopes and expectations of his family and friends—must be calculated as having a price in dollars. Such a policy is a decided discredit to civilization, much lower than the one of which we proudly boast.

The officer who underestimates the appropriations necessary to maintain his institution, as he knows it should be maintained to enable it to fulfill its high mission, does more harm than good, a hundred fold; and if this could be understood by those having charge of these and kindred institutions, in this and all other territories as well as states, there would be less rivalry to outvie or excel in the economical management of the institutions. Such a basis of management is too sordid—too widely at variance with the Christian civilization of the present age. Waste and extravagance should be carefully guarded against, and the responsibility for this must be left with the superintendent in charge of the institution. And if men of high character are selected for such positions, there will be neither waste or extravagance tolerated. These positions should be entirely disengaged from all political or partisan control or interference. Nothing is more important than this. A man or woman is unworthy such a position who does not demand absolute freedom from such influences in the discharge of official duties and who does not conduct such duties without regard to party affiliations. Partisanship should be as much out of place in church as among those employed to guide and guard insane people. It is inhumanely ludicrous to think of making a party football of the reason of men and women, and the people abhor it as soon as it is brought to their attention.

THE GREAT SIOUX RESERVATION

CHAPTER LXXXVIII

BLACK HILLS PEOPLE DEMAND OPENING OF SIOUX RESERVATION

1882-84

EARLY EFFORTS TO OPEN GREAT SIOUX RESERVATION—WAGON ROADS AND RAILROADS BOTH NEEDED—DELEGATE PETTIGREW'S BILL BEFORE CONGRESS IS PASSED—STATISTICAL INFORMATION REGARDING THE COVETED COUNTRY—AN EXPLORING EXPEDITION ACROSS THE GREAT AMERICAN DESERT—BLACK HILLS MEETING AT RAPID CITY—THE PROPOSED AGREEMENT—A TREATY COMMISSION APPOINTED—GENERAL CONDITIONS AT PINE RIDGE AND ELSEWHERE—COMMISSION SUCCEEDS IN MAKING A TREATY—REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR—THE TREATY—CONGRESS NEGLECTS TO RATIFY THE AGREEMENT—TREATY CONVENTION AT PIERRE—SENATE APPOINTS VISITING COMMITTEE—PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATORIAL VISITORS—SENATE DECIDES ON NEW MEASURE—THE BILLS OF SENATOR DAWES.

OPENING GREAT SIOUX RESERVE

The opening of the Great Sioux Reservation to the public that there might be a free and unmolested, and lawful route of travel across it from the Missouri River was inevitable in the course of time. One great industrial section of the territory, with 50,000, and probably more inhabitants, with its producing mines of the precious metals which the whole civilized world demanded, and its rapidly growing livestock industry practically fenced in from a large part of the eastern agricultural portion. The Indians occupied actually but a fraction of the vast reservation and made no use whatever of the unoccupied portion, as it contained but little game except in the choicest portions where the Indians had their villages and small settlements, and it was not designed to disturb them in the possession and ownership of these.

Every year following the opening of the Black Hills, this obstacle to the development of that region and the economical pursuit of its industries had been growing more burdensome, and there was an unanimous desire of the industrious and enterprising white people of the territory that a large part of it, extending from the Missouri River to its western border or to the hills, practically the same, should be thrown open to settlement—that railways might be constructed connecting the two sections and the intervening country occupied by white people.

The policy of securing the building of railways through Indian reservations elsewhere as well as in Dakota had become a settled feature of the Government's Indian policy. The prejudice of a large majority of the untutored and unenlightened class was always manifested, but the conviction was forced upon them by the "logic of events" that it was important for their well being not to provoke the enmity of the white people by opposing needless obstacles to the progress of civilization, and the extension of the arteries of commerce. It was furthermore wisely recognized that it was better for the Indians to become familiar with all civilizing agencies. As the Indians became growers of grain and live-stock, the railway could furnish them the advantage of a convenient market and would stimulate their industrial efforts. In recent years in all cases where a railroad company had requested permission to pass through an Indian Reservation, the Indian owners of the land were assembled in council where the proposition was laid before them as a business matter, and their consent obtained without coercion on the part of any influence except that wielded within the tribe by powerful chiefs, which was sometimes charged. The Government, however, took care that the Indians, in every instance, should receive a fair price for the land relinquished to the railroad companies. A right-of-way through the Sisseton Reservation was granted to the Milwaukee in 1880 for its Hastings and Dakota Line, the Indians receiving such compensation for the lands taken as the Government required and was satisfactory to the Indians.

RIGHT-OF-WAY FOR WAGON ROADS AND RAILROADS

In June, 1880, the Sioux Indian tribes interested expected to make an agreement with the Government by which they would give the right of occupation, and the right of way for a wagon road to the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad at the place on the Missouri River where the Black Hills freight depots were located. The chiefs representing the tribes interested, some thirty-eight in number, had insisted on making the treaty in the presence of the Great Father in Washington; accordingly the following named dignitaries of the several tribes and bands were furnished with transportation and a purser, and sent to the national capital in a special car.

Son-of-the-Star; Poor Wolf; Peter Beauchamp, and John Smith, Fort Berthold; Two Bears, Big Head, John Grass, Thunder Hawk, and Louis Primeau from Standing Rock; Charger and Bull Eagle, from Cheyenne River Agency; Brother-to-All and James Bowed-Head, from Crow Creek; Spotted Tail, Two Strike, Iron Wing, White Thunder, Black Crow, John Bridgeman, Red Cloud, Red Dog, Little Wound, Red Shirt, American Horse, and Lois Robideau, from Rosebud Agency; Strike-the-Ree, Jumping Thunder, Philip J. Deloria, David Taliajapo, from Yankton Agency; Medicine Bull and Mad Bear, from Lower Brule. There was nothing connected with this business that could not have been arranged without this visit, but the chiefs had learned from experience that a trip to Washington afforded many pleasures and perquisites which would be denied them if they remained at home. They therefore insisted that in a matter of so much importance a council with the Great Father in person was indispensable. And at this time the Indians were apt to be successful in getting nearly everything they wanted if they refrained from the warpath and exhibited a peaceful disposition. It was also considered justifiable because of the opportunity it afforded of impressing the savage with the numbers of the white people, the wonderful improvements they had made, the great extent of the populous country, a kind of education that would tend to discourage the Indians from making war against the Government, therefore the cost of such visits was money wisely expended.

C. M. & ST. P. ACROSS RESERVATION

The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul had declined to negotiate with the Indians at the time the agreement was made with the Northwestern for a section of the reservation near Fort Pierre, preferring to rely upon the provision of the treaty of 1876 which provided for the laying out of "wagon and other roads," across the reservation; but subsequently, and within a few weeks, reconsidered its determination and entered upon an agreement with the Spotted Tail tribe for the right-of-way from a point on the Missouri near the mouth of American Crow Creek to the Black Hills. The particulars of this agreement are substantially as stated in the following paragraph which was written informally at the time of the proceedings:

Upon the order of the secretary of the interior, Col. Robert S. Gardner, United States inspector, delegated to enter into negotiations with the C. M. & St. Paul Railroad Company, and the Indians of the Great Sioux Reservation, reported at Rosebud Agency on the 31st of October, 1880. He there met Gen. John Lawler of the Milwaukee road. On the 1st of November the chiefs of Red Cloud's and Spotted Tail's bands were called together at the quarters of the Rosebud agent, Gen. John Cook. The first day's council led to inquiries and investigations as to the feasibility of the construction of a railroad through the Indian country; after which Spotted Tail and the chiefs concluded to wait until next day before reaching a decision. On the following day a second meeting was held, and after two hours' conference the Indians concluded to accept $110 per mile for a strip of land 200 feet wide and 180 miles long, running through their reservation, and turn the same over to the railroad company for the construction of a railroad. They were also to receive $5.00 per acre for land on the west bank of the Missouri at the mouth of American Crow Creek and $4.00 per acre for depot sites along the line, not exceeding 100 acres at any one point. To this agreement the Indians of the Rosebud and Pine Ridge Agency gave a warm and cordial consent, guaranteeing thorough protection to the employees of the company and their property, from the mouth of American Crow Creek to the western terminus of the line.

This agreement would have given the Milwaukee Company a right-of-way to the hills whenever they were ready to extend their line west from Chamberlain, provided the assent of the other Sioux tribes could be obtained, for at this time the land in the great reservation had not been subdivided among the tribes, and the consent of each tribe was necessary to sanction the disposal of any portion; and a like agreement had been or would be made with the Northwestern.

Accordingly Spotted Tail set out upon a mission for the purpose of winning over the other tribes. He first visited the Yanktonnais at Crow Creek, they being the nearest to his own domicile. He held a council with the Yanktonnais chiefs, who it seems had heard about the railroad and had resolved on a visit to Washington as a prerequisite, and where the agreement could be better made and understood than was the one at Rosebud. The leading Indians of the other tribes as a rule were somewhat envious of Spotted Tail's influence with the Great Father and some of them charged that he had enriched himself by his close relations with the Government, and they desired, it seems, to imitate his example. The council at Crow Creek did not result harmoniously, and Spot was so incensed that he threatened to bring down upon them his 5,000 braves from Rosebud. He said his Indians were better armed than they had ever been before; that they were soldiers, and always would be soldiers, and much more he added. While he was haranguing in his angry mood, the chiefs quietly left him and refused to make any reply. They left him alone in the council room. Spotted Tail then turned to the agent, and said: "Write down this silence; there is more to it than anything they have said." He then left the agency.

In December following a delegation of the upper river chiefs who were supposed to be immune from the Spotted Tail influence, visited Washington, being requested thereto to fix up the Milwaukee Railroad matter satisfactorily. These chiefs were Blue Coat, of the Saus Arc tribe; Little No-Heart and White Swan of the Minneconjeaux; Four Bear and Rattling Rib of the Two Kettles; and a delegation of Cheyennes and Yanktonnais. These chiefs were prepared to surrender their interest in the land needed by the railway company and were friendly to the proposed improvement; but they avowed a mistrust of both Spotted Tail and Red Cloud; they had decided before leaving their Dakota homes to sign the agreement but insisted upon receiving their share of the money or other things of value that would be paid for it.

The Government favored the purpose of the agreements, and they could not be made without its consent. Such an agreement had already been made with the Sisseton tribe for right-of-way to the Milwaukee's Hastings and Dakota line, and similar agreements had been made with other than Sioux tribes in Nebraska and Nevada, the Government holding that the building of railways through the Indian lands would prove a beneficial agent in promoting and accelerating their civilization, by bringing them in contact with civilized methods. That as the Indians advance as farmers and stock growers they would need the services of the railroads which would prove a valuable factor in regulating prices for whatever they might have of a marketable commodity they desired to sell. But the Indians had been led to believe that the right-of-way was necessary and so strongly desired by the railroad companies that they would be willing to pay almost any price rather than fail in securing it. This was not the case. As has been seen in the case of the Milwaukee, Mr. Lawler had said that he would not build a wheelbarrow track across the reservation for all the traffic the company would derive from a large portion of it, and it was conjectured that neither company was governed so much by the inducements of a profitable traffic, but rather by the ambition not to be outdone in enterprise by a rival. The Milwaukee Company proposed to pay $110.00 per mile for a right-of-way 200 feet wide, and the Northwestern offered to pay $5.00 an acre for all the land it would occupy. But the Indians would not agree to accept these propositions though strongly urged to do so by the department, and no agreement was made.

In December, Marvin Hughitt, general manager of the Northwestern, and General Lawler, representing the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul paid a visit to Washington while the Sioux chiefs were there to complete their negotiations for a right-of-way on the line of the surveys which had been made during the summer. These negotiations, the railway companies had supposed had been settled so far as the consent of the Indians to the building of the roads was concerned, but it afterwards appeared that only a portion of the Sioux had been consulted heretofore, and as all had an interest in all the reservation it became necessary to negotiate with and obtain the consent and agreement of all the tribes. The former negotiations were, therefore, of no particular value to the railroad companies, and a new agreement would be necessary. The Crow Creek, Standing Rock and Cheyenne Indians were represented, and the others were known to be in favor of the agreement. The difficulty of agreeing centered on the price of the land which the railroad companies wished to purchase for right-of-way, the Indians demanding 10,000 head of cattle for the privilege and making other rather exorbitant propositions.

The Indian delegations from Cheyenne Agency and Crow Creek met in council with Secretary Schurz and the railway officials at Washington, on December 31, 1880, to consider the sale of a right-of-way over the reservation. At the first session Four Bear, a Cheyenne chief, informed the pale faces that the Indians were willing to sell the land desired for $7,000,000. Schurz told the Indians the railroad companies were willing to pay $4.50 per acre, which was nearly four times what the Government obtained for wild land. The secretary pointed out the many advantages a railroad would be to them; but his wise counsel fell on deaf understanding, for at its conclusion Rattling Rib, a Yanktonais, arose in his place, and without referring to the remarks of the honorable secretary, wanted to know whether they could, or could not get the price asked. Schurz replied that they "could not" and added that he thought "the Indians did not know how much $7,000,000 were, or they would not be so foolish as to ask such a price." Thereupon Rattling Rib remarked: "We must talk it over slow, and we will go home and talk with our people;" and the council then adjourned.

INDIANS GRANT RIGHT-OF-WAY

A tract of the reservation at Fort Pierre was at the time being used as the shipping point for Black Hills freight under the original wagon road provision in the treaty of 1876, but it had become apparent that the place had become infested with a lawless and dangerous element, which endangered the lives as well as the property, then of great value, belonging to Black Hills merchants and miners, and this danger had become so imminent as to threaten the abandonment of the route by shippers. In securing the privileges permitted under this new agreement the Northwestern Railroad people would be able to evict this element and thus insure peace and safety to the legitimate business interests of the community. The agreement was in the following form:

This agreement, made this 12th day of June, A. D. 1886, by and between the Sioux Indians, resident upon the reservation in the Territory of Dakota, represented by their chiefs and headmen, and acting under the supervision and with the approval of the secretary of the interior of the United States; and the Dakota Central Railway Company, a body corporate of said Territory of Dakota.

Witnesseth, That said tribes of Sioux Indians do hereby grant to said railway company the right to occupy one section of land on the western bank of the Missouri River, at or near Fort Pierre, in said territory, for a freight depot and for the residence of its employees, necessarily engaged in the operation of its road and in forwarding freight transported by said company to the Missouri River, and for no other purpose, and to be occupied under such regulations as the secretary of the interior may prescribe for the protection of the Indians. Said section of land to be definitely located by said railway company as soon as the necessary surveys have been made to determine the point at which the road of said company shall strike the Missouri River.

And the said Indians do hereby grant to said railway company the right to construct and operate a wagon road, by the nearest and most practicable route, from the point where said freight depot may be located, to intersect the wagon road running west from Fort Pierre to the Black Hills, said wagon road not to exceed 200 feet in width, and to be used for no other purpose except the passage of freight with teams.

The grants herein contained are made upon the express condition that said railway company shall, before entering upon the possession of said land, pay to said tribes of Indians, in such manner as the secretary of the interior may direct, the sum of $3,200 for the use and occupancy of said section, and the further sum of $5.00 per acre for the land which may be used by said company for the wagon road aforesaid.

And the Dakota Central Railway Company hereby agree to use said section of land and the said wagon road to be constructed as aforesaid, for the sole and exclusive purpose of trade and intercourse by its own officers and employees, as expressed in the foregoing. And further, to exclude all intruders and persons not in the employ of said company, and authorized to go upon and use said land and road; and to all times observe, aid, and assist in the enforcement of the intercourse laws and the rules and regulations prescribed, or to be prescribed from time to time, by the secretary of the interior, for the benefit and protection of the said Indians.

And upon failure on the part of said company to perform in full and in good faith all the requirements of this agreement, it is hereby stipulated by the parties hereto that all rights of said company in and to the said section of land and wagon road shall be forfeited, and shall cease and determine, and the secretary of the interior, at his discretion, may decide and declare the said forfeiture, and upon written notice to the said company may take possession and control of the lands and road aforesaid for the use and benefit of the said Indians.

It is also further stipulated and agreed that the grant of right of way for the said wagon road herein made and accepted, and the use thereof, shall cease and determine on the part of said railroad company, whenever it shall construct and complete a railroad from the Missouri westward through and across the said reservation in Dakota, or so far as to intersect and connect with the road known as the Fort Pierre and Black Hills wagon road in said territory; but the use and enjoyment of the section of land hereinbefore granted shall continue in the said company, subject to the conditions aforesaid as long as the same shall continue to be embraced within the bounds of the Indian reservation.

It is hereby agreed and understood that the foregoing grants, stipulations, and agreements shall include and be binding upon the successors and assigns of the said railway company as fully as though previously named herein.

In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands and seals, at the City of Washington, on the day and date above written.

We certify that the foregoing agreement was read and explained to us, and was fully understood by the above named Indians before signing the same.

These various efforts of the railway companies, led in 1880-81 to an act of Congress incorporated in the Indian appropriation bill, authorizing the secretary of the interior to treat with the Sioux Indians for a portion of their reservation extending across the entire domain from the Missouri River to the Black Hills; and also a bill, introduced by Delegate Pettigrew, of Dakota, providing for the objects but with more definite provisions. Under the operation of these measures, which became laws, Henry M. Teller, the secretary of the interior, appointed ex-Governor Edmunds, ex-Judge Peter C. Shannon, and James H. Teller, of Xenia, Ohio, a commission to visit the Sioux Indians and make with them an agreement for a transfer of a large portion of their reservation, containing all the way from nine to eleven million acres.

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of Mr. Pettigrew, made a report descriptive somewhat of the Indian domain and favored the passage of the bill. The committee said:

The facts in the case are as follows: We find that the Sioux Reservation is situated in the southern part of the Territory of Dakota and extends across the center of the proposed State of Dakota from the 43d degree of latitude on the south to the 46th degree on the north, being over two hundred and twenty miles in length from north to south, and from one hundred and sixty to two hundred and fifty miles in width from east to west, having an area of over thirty-four thousand square miles, and containing over twenty-one million acres of land, being larger than the states of South Carolina, Indiana, West Virginia, respectively, and but a trifle smaller than either Kentucky, Ohio, Louisiana, or Maine. This enormous reservation embraces nearly one-half of the proposed State of Dakota. We find the settlements of the territory within the proposed state to be in the extreme eastern and western portions of it. About twenty-five thousand inhabitants occupy the great mining and agricultural region known as the "Black Hills." This reservation lies between the Black Hills settlement and the other settlements, entirely isolating them from the civilized world, cutting them off from railroad facilities, which can only be supplied by opening the reservation to settlement and occupation.

The portion of the territory lying east of the reservation is already occupied by 150,000 inhabitants, and rapidly augmenting, who have brought into cultivation nearly two million acres of land, organized into districts, townships and counties, liberally dotted with cities and villages, with 1,400 miles of railroad in active operation, penetrating to the very borders of the wilderness embraced in the reservation.

The reservation is occupied by 24,000 Indians, 6,000 males over eighteen; the remainder being women and children. They have under cultivation less than three thousand acres of this vast tract. These Indians are divided into five tribes or bands residing at five different points, owning the lands in common, and are supported by the Government entirely, the country being wholly destitute of game.

The form of the reservation can best be described as an irregular pyramid, with its broad base resting on the southern line of the territory, bounded on the east by the Missouri River, which carries the southeast corner of the pyramid to the 21st degree of longitude west from Washington; bearing thence west of north, making the eastern line an irregular hypotenuse; the western line being an imaginary line on the 26th degree of longitude, excepting a niche where the Cheyenne River is made the boundary for a distance of less than sixty miles.

The lands within this reservation on the Missouri River are rich in alluvial, being well covered with dense timber. Reaching the table lands, on an average of ten miles from the water courses, the finest rolling prairies are found, consisting of deep loams with a fine sub-soil of porous clay, well supplied with lime, alkalis, acids, marl, and the other fertilizers necessary to produce small grains and grasses in their greatest perfection. The native grasses are luxuriant and afford the finest grazing in the world. It is well watered with perennial springs flowing from the Black Hills through regularly distributed streams to the Missouri, and has a climate unsurpassed in the temperate zone.

The reservation is capable of sustaining a dense population, and if put on the market would be rapidly settled by the same class of industrious and worthy people as those now occupying the civilized portion of the territory, and immediately traversed by lines of railroads.

In a letter to the chairman of the Indian Committee, dated June 23, 1882, the secretary of the interior says:

"The quantity of land within the reservation is much greater than is needed for the Indians living thereupon, and in my judgment the reservation should be reduced, and the Indians established on the reserved portion of said reservation best suited to their wants."

In the opinion of your committee the time has come when this vast reservation should be by some amicable and honorable arrangement limited to the reasonable requirements of the Indians. We believe that it is for the interest of the Indians that each tribe or band should be properly located on a separate and distinct parcel of land or reservation of suitable size and location, and that when so located the land should be patented to the tribe and the settlement made permanent and final. The portion of the present reservation not required for the purpose above stated should be purchased and paid for by the Government, the proceeds to be held in trust for the benefit and improvement of the Indians.

Believing that this bill looks to the accomplishment of the above object, we report the same back with amendments and recommend its passage.

The bill passed and was approved some time late in August, and was followed by the appointment of a commission, consisting of Newton Edmunds, ex-governor of Dakota, Peter C. Shannon, ex-chief justice of Dakota, and James H. Teller, of Ohio, to negotiate a treaty with the Sioux Indians for a portion of their reservation lying between the Cheyenne and White rivers, Dakota Territory. This was a portion of the reservation which the Sioux did not occupy, except in very small part. An appropriation of $5,000 was made to defray the expenses of the commission. The purpose of the Government was to open up the country described, provide for more direct communication between the Black Hills settlements and the eastern part of the territory, enable railroads to be constructed, the land occupied, and reduce the size of the reservation, which contained 21,000,000 acres of land. It was estimated that the number of Indians living at several points on the reservation, but only a small fraction inhabiting the country proposed to be opened, was about twenty five thousand, their agencies being at Pine Ridge, Rosebud, Cheyenne, Standing Rock, and Lower Brule in Lyman County.

Information of a reliable character regarding the general character of the land, and its fertility, lying west of the Missouri and embraced in and protected from exploration because of being an Indian reservation, was indefinite and unsatisfactory up to the time when the railway corporations began their efforts to obtain a right-of-way from the Missouri River to the Black Hills, about 1881. There had been the reports of exploring expeditions whose work was almost altogether confined to the mountain districts beyond, which were sent out by the Government; and some information from Black Hills emigrants regarding the country in the immediate vicinity of their line of travel; and also the letter of Bishop Hare protesting against the opening of the Black Hills in 1875 or '76, in which he describes the country as nearly worthless for agricultural purposes, and poorly supplied with fuel; but the region generally had long been claimed under the title of "Bad Lands," and even the maps that were issued by authority, designated it as a Great American Desert, and the legend "Bad Lands" was printed in a number of open spaces on the maps, showing that the general features of the country were not inviting except to the curiosity seeker. No authorized statement regarding the value of the country as an agricultural region had been made, nor could be made, because there had been no exploration of the country and nothing had occurred that demanded it. General Sully crossed the valley of the Little Missouri in 1864, where the genuine Bad Lands abounded. It was then known by the reports of Doctor Hayden, Government geologist, that a similar region existed near the headwaters of White River, and the presumption was that the Bad Land belt extended practically without interruption from the southern boundary of the territory to the Yellowstone. This was an error, as subsequent explorations have shown that the distinctive features of the Bad Lands are found at several localities and are not continuous, but even where Sully crossed them he was able to find abundant feed for his large number of animals, and fixed his camp for one night right in the midst of the Bad Lands on the banks of the Little Missouri, and also in the midst of the wonderful mounds, and peaks, and cliffs and petrifications which he designated as appearing "like hell with the fires put out."

When the business interests of the country began in earnest to consider the building of railroads through this region, it became necessary to discover something of its natural resources and capabilities, and experienced and intelligent frontiersmen were engaged for this purpose. Maj. Fred T. Evans was one of these. He was an early settler at Sioux City; a pioneer of the Black Hills, and an explorer and adventurer by nature. During 1881 he led a small and well equipped company over a large part of the reservation country between the White and Bad rivers.

Starting from the Missouri, opposite Chamberlain, they struck west to the headwaters of Medicine Creek, a large tributary of the Missouri River, and found the Medicine Valley a broad and fertile region that embraced 1,500 square miles. West of the Medicine and White Clay Buttes the country was more rolling, but toward Bad River there were large areas of arable valley lands, covered with the finest of natural grasses, largely buffalo grass, and abundantly watered by creeks coursing toward Bad River. The watershed between White and Bad rivers has its dividing ridge so near the White River that nearly all creeks of importance flow north to Bad River. The party failed to find a square mile where a good farm could not be made according to their report. The party traversed the country to the west coming to the Bad Lands, after a journey of reconnaissance that satisfactorily covered the portion of the reservation between the rivers named, and finally reached a section of the Bad Lands about one hundred and forty miles west of Chamberlain, a most wonderful locality, filled with more novel attractions and majestic objects than any museum in the world. It was so unlike what had been anticipated—nothing forbidding or unattractive about it, but a small world by itself; totally unlike anything they had ever even imagined, and sunk well down in a valley which seemed an appropriate place and setting for the exhibition. They described its peaks and domes towering in "terrible grandeur" and these were visible for a long distance. There were numberless petrifications, monuments of an age long past, and an endless variety highly valued by the scientists. Professor Hayden, who visited this section of the Bad Land region in 1866, with a small company of troops, declared that it was one of the most valuable places in the known world to the geologist, and predicted that the day would come when the famous savans of Europe would regard their stock of information incomplete until they had made a pilgrimage to the Bad Lands of Dakota.

Not much is heard of this wonderful land in recent years, and many of its portable trophies now adorn the most famous scientific cabinets in all continents. The older cities of Dakota contain specimens of its petrified treasures—trunks of trees that are now adding their romantic charm to the well kept lawns of our opulent people, or doing servile duty as hitching posts on the outer curb of the cement walks. The Dakotans may some day establish Bad Land parks as state attractions, and hold these relics of prehistoric ages for the future as well as the present generations to enjoy.

BLACK HILLS CONVENTION AT RAPID CITY

The people of the Black Hills were greatly crippled in their enterprises owing to their isolated location caused by the maintenance of this Indian Reservation fronting their entire eastern border, and practically shutting off railway extension from the Missouri River to the hills, while it also served as a serious impediment to the settlement of the range and stock lands which abounded in vast extent north and south of the mineral belt. The opening of the reservation, or a portion of it, was regarded by the Black Hills people as a matter of vital moment, while the steamboat interest and the railways which had reached the Missouri, joined in the demand for the opening of the country. It should be kept in mind that it was not the design to deprive the Indians of an acre that they could or would utilize, for it was only the central portion of the reserve that the uses of civilization at the time required, leaving for the Indians a large domain—much larger than they could occupy if every individual of all the tribes were given a square mile of it.

During the pendency of the bill in Congress, a public meeting was held at Rapid City for the purpose of considering the proposition, at which the following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, Over one-third of the great Territory of Dakota is rendered valueless and non-productive by reason of the great Sioux Reservation, which covers nearly forty thousand square miles of the fairest portion of the said territory; and,

Whereas, That vast area is set apart for the exclusive use and enjoyment of a comparatively small number of Indians numbering but a very few thousands, constituting what is known as the Great Sioux Nation; and,

Whereas, All the Sioux tribes of said Indians composing the Great Sioux Nation, at the present time and for years past, have been clothed and fed and fully provided for by the general Government, and for said purpose have been collected by governmental authority around a few agencies, situated within the boundaries of the vast reservation, thus reducing the area of land actually occupied and used by said Sioux Indians, to a very small and insignificant portion when compared with the unoccupied portion of the reservation, so that nearly all the land within the reservation is of no practical benefit to said Indians, and seldom ever traversed by them; is of no value to them; and could, therefore, be surrendered by them without real loss and without inconvenience; and believing it to be only a question of time when the Indian title will be extinguished to a greater portion of the reservation, which serves no useful purpose in its present condition either to the Indians or to the country at large; but on the contrary is a clog in the wheels of progress; and,

Whereas, An effort is now being made to secure a monopoly of the reservation for grazing purposes, and asking for authority to make leasehold privileges, for grazing purposes only, to the exclusion of every other interest and of every other use, and thus leaving the reservation of as little practical importance to the country at large as it is in its present state, and tending to perpetuate the existence of the reservation, for the reason that the owners of the leasehold estates would unite with the reversioners, the Indians, in resisting any and all attempts to extinguish the Indian title;

Now, therefore, believing that it is for the best interests of the country at large that the Great Sioux Reservation, when opened for any purposes should be opened for all purposes, and that until it is opened for all purposes railroads will not build into or through it; and further believing that any effort to favor any particular industry to the exclusion of others, or any effort establishing a privileged class, is opposed both to the spirit and letter of our laws; therefore, be it,

Resolved, First—That it is the duty of all good citizens and all true Dakotans to unite in asking and demanding that the Indian title to the Great Sioux Reservation be extinguished by governmental authority, and that vast and fertile region be opened to homestead and pre-emption settlement, and thus be opened for all and every purpose;

Second—That it is the duty of every good citizen and true Dakotan to oppose by all honorable means all efforts and measures to create leasehold privileges within the reservation in the interest of one class of men, and of one industry, to the exclusion of others;

Third—That the creation of leasehold estates within the reservation would delay the building of railroads across the reservation to the Black Hills; would postpone indefinitely the opening of the same for homestead and pre-emption settlement, and would organize and build up a powerful monopoly that would be prompted by interest to resist by organized effort any attempt to divest the Indians of their present title;

Fourth—That we believe it to be a matter of justice, not only to the people of Dakota, but to the people of the whole United States, that the Indian title should be extinguished and the reservation opened for every purpose, as all public domain should be;

Fifth—That since no great object was ever attained except by due and proper concert of action, we therefore favor a conference between the communities or committees of the Black Hills counties at as early a day as can be agreed upon, to the end that a united effort be made in bringing this subject, of so much importance to us, and all of us, to the attention of the proper authorities.

THE PROPOSED PLAN

The plan of the agreement with the Sioux that had been previously arranged, was a proposition to purchase from the Indians about eleven million acres of the central portion of their reservation, which would effect a division of the great reservation. That portion of the reserve remaining south of White River to be subdivided into two reservations, separate and independent of each other, in every way, one of which reserves would be set apart for the permanent home of Red Cloud's Ogalalas, and the other to the Brules of Rosebud. The country north to be divided between the Indians who had their agencies at Standing Rock and at Cheyenne, which included the Upper Yanktonnais, the Uncpapas, the Lower Yanktonnais, the Minneconjoux, the Sans Ares, the Two Kettles, the Blackfeet Sioux, and the Lower Brules. Three reservations, four, including Crow Creek, were to be given to these northern tribes.

These reservations were to be the permanent homes of the tribes for whom they were set apart. It was also a part of the agreement that these reservations were not to be shared among all the tribes, but belonged exclusively to the tribe or tribes inhabiting them, and were to be their permanent home. It was a move in the direction of higher civilization. It began the preparation of the system for breaking up the tribal organization, and the settlement of the individual Indian and his family on a small reservation or farm of 160 to 320 acres, wholly and lawfully his own property, where he could be head chief of a family, and of his fields and pastures, flocks and herds.

Another laudable purpose was to connect eastern and western Dakota with a wide belt of ceded territory that white settlers might occupy and improve, that railways might traverse without lawful hindrance from the Indians, and that would permit the valuable growing interests of the Black Hills and its people, a right-of-way to the eastern part of the territory, and give the eastern inhabitants a direct route to the mining regions.

Great interests were involved in this treaty—the welfare of a partially civilized race of human beings, being the most important, compared with which the cost of the land, or the price per acre was dwarfed into a small matter in the estimation of the better class of citizens.

The commission proceeded to secure the assent of the Indians to the agreement through the chiefs and head men of the several tribes, thus pursuing the same course that was taken by the commissioners that made the Black Hills Treaty in 1876, of which Governor Edmunds, of this commission, was a member

SHANNON'S RED CLOUD LETTER

The commission began its work at the Santee Agency, opposite Springfield, the Santees having some property interest in the Great Sioux Reservation, though they did not inhabit any portion of it and did not desire to, for they were getting along well in their abode in Nebraska, and had already become an orderly, industrious community, boastful of six schools and three churches, and many fine residences and cultivated farms. They signed the agreement with the commissioners with little hesitation, and the treaty-making ambassadors then betook themselves to Red Cloud's Agency at Pine Ridge. It should have been stated that the Santees numbered about eight hundred people.

Rev. S. D. Hinman, of the Indian Bureau, Washington, had joined the commission, as interpreter. Judge Shannon related his impressions of the big tribes and their modes and habits, later, affording an insight into the domestic life of the better class or more civilized class of Indians, when at home. The judge said:

Pine Ridge Agency is in Southwestern Dakota, within the reservation, and about two miles north of the Nebraska State line. There were Oglala Sioux numbering 8,000 people. Our reception was one to be remembered. When we approached the agency we saw in the distance a fine cavalcade of horsemen coming toward us at a slight gallop. They were the mounted Indian police, and a finer company you could hardly picture. They were uniformed in blue, and were officered like any cavalry company. A standard bearer bore the United States flag, and when they came up to us they saluted in true military style, and then turned and escorted us into the agency. Soon after our arrival, a dignified, well dressed Indian approached our headquarters, and I noticed that he carried a cane in a truly civilized way. He was greeted warmly by our interpreter, and then we discovered that the great Red Cloud, of the Sioux, was about to be presented to us. He is a fine specimen of Indian manhood and is as dignified in his deportment as a senator. He was dressed as well as any member of the commission, and lives in a good house built by the Government. We also met Young-Man-Afraid-Of-His-Horses,—which is a misnomer, for the real name is Young-Man-Of-Whose-Horses-You-Are-Afraid,—who is very intelligent, dresses like any white man, and is very powerful with his people.

At this agency we remained eight or nine days and held numerous councils with all the leading chiefs and men of the tribe. We explained to them their rights under the treaty of 1868 and the agreement of 1876, the latter ceding to the Government the Black Hills. Every point that could be suggested by the Government or the Indians was brought up and discussed. We found a unanimous wish among them for a separate reservation for themselves, and a great desire to begin in the way of raising cattle for sale. They have great herds of cattle brought into the agency under contract and paid for by the Government, and they are seized with a desire to raise the cattle themselves, and make money. They want to get land of their own, are disposed to cultivate the soil and begin a civilized life.

We never gave a present nor a feast, but found every council largely attended, and all were conducted with great gravity. The chiefs exhibited full knowledge of their rights. They also seemed to recognize fully that it was to their advantage and the advantage of their people to be employed in some useful and profitable occupation, and hence their anxiety to get to cattle raising. We found there a large Government schoolhouse about finished, which will be filled with pupils on the opening of school. The return of a number of young men and women from the Carlisle School has taught the tribe what is to be gained through the schools, and now they are clamorous for them. They want schools full as much as they do cattle.

From Pine Ridge we went to the Rosebud Agency, where are the Brule Sioux, numbering nearly eight thousand persons. Young Spotted Tail and Swift Bear were found to be the principal men. We were there six days and held councils with all the principal men. We found that they, too, wanted cattle and schools and were anxious to have a separate reservation. They expressed a desire to have their brethren at the Lower Brule Agency join them and come below White River. They were particularly anxious about the schools, and wanted enough of them for all their children. We found Young Spotted Tail residing in an entirely civilized way in a large two story frame building which cost $5,000. He has his horse and buggy, and drives and dresses like any young white man of consequence. We found him with all these evidences of civilization, although he cannot talk a word of English.

Now thus far we have visited about sixteen thousand of the people who go to make up the great Sioux Nation. That number is by far the greater portion of the nation, but we cannot form any conclusion as to what will be done until we have met the chief men of every tribe. We go now to Standing Rock, near Bismarck. Then to Cheyenne Agency, near Pierre, and the Crow Creek and Lower Brule agencies, near Chamberlain.

The commission met with success at Standing Rock, at Cheyenne and Lower Brule, where the proposition was favorably received and agreed to and signed by the chiefs and head men.

The commission did not on that trip secure the necessary signatures at the Crow Creek Agency which was inhabited by Lower Yanktonnais principally, where a peculiar situation governed growing out of the dispute between the Indians and white settlers regarding the ownership of the land, which is fully explained in the chapters from 1885 to 1889, during the administrations of Governors Pierce and Church. The Rev. Mr. Hinman, interpreter, secured them later and in time for the commission to make its official report before the meeting of Congress.

It has been observable that all the tribes had raised an objection to the price, which they deemed much too small, but they agreed to it. The Indians also expressed a strong desire for a large payment in cash—money down. The Government had learned from a century of experience, that money was the article the Indian had the least use for so long as the Government furnished him, as it did, with every material necessity that his creature wants demanded. It had proved an obstacle to his civilization.

REPORT OF EDMUNDS COMMISSION

The report of the Edmunds Sioux Commission was transmitted by the President to the House of Representatives, accompanied by a letter from the secretary of the interior, early in the month of February, 1883. Secretary Teller, in his letter of transmittal, said:

The proposed reservations are located in accordance with the wishes of the Indians, and are of such extent as to give ample territory for the present and future needs of the occupants. The consideration for the land ceded consists principally in cattle for stock raising, for which the country reserved is especially adapted, and the raising of stock is the most natural and effective means by which the Indians can aid in their own support and may also be made an instrument for elevating and improving their condition. The sum required for carrying out this agreement is, therefore, in effect, only an advance of capital to the Indians, the returns on which will eventually relieve the Government of a large annual expenditure for their support. I regard the agreement as favorable alike to the Indians and to the Government, and respectfully recommend the favorable consideration of the commission's report. The land ceded to the Government is estimated at seventeen thousand to eighteen thousand square miles. Its value for stock raising is beyond question, and many parts will doubtless prove equally valuable for farming purposes.

Respectfully submitted,

H. M. TELLER, Secretary of the Interior.

LOCATION OF SEPARATE RESERVATIONS

The agreement had been signed by the chiefs and headmen of about twenty-three thousand Sioux, and there remained to be obtained the signatures of the chiefs and headmen of about one thousand five hundred more at Crow Creek. This commission, in procuring signatures to the agreement had proceeded in accordance with the precedent established in the Black Hills Treaty of 1876, ignoring the article in the Sherman Treaty of 1868 which provided that subsequent treaties or agreements with the Sioux should not be valid unless signed by three-fourths of all the male adult Indians, which treaty was held to be in force so far as this provision was concerned. However, the work that this commission had done was of great value, and Congress was asked to ratify the agreement, there being no question about procuring the remainder of the signatures which were principally those at Crow Creek.

Congress was asked to appropriate $800,000 for the purpose of carrying out its provisions. The treaty provided for the cession of about ten million acres. In the agreement it was declared to be the policy of the Government to provide for the Sioux Indians a permanent home. The various bands were placed on separate reservations. The Indians relinquished all of the Great Sioux Reservation excepting certain portions set apart as separate reservations for themselves. In consideration of this cession on the part of the Indians, the United States agreed that each head of a family might select 320, or not exceeding 400 acres out of this reservation for each of his children living at the ratification of this agreement, under the age of eighteen years. The United States agreed to furnish to the Indians 25,000 cows and 1,000 bulls, to be distributed among the different reservations. The Government was also to deliver to each family one good cow, and one well broken pair of oxen, with yoke and chain. Each reservation was to be furnished with a carpenter, miller, engineer, farmer, and blacksmith for a period of ten years. The sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of each township in each reservation were to be reserved for school purposes.

The Sioux on the Santee Reservation in Nebraska consented to the agreement, reserving all rights in the Santee Reservation in Knox County, Neb., upon which they were living.

The Indians at the Pine Ridge Agency were given a separate reservation, described as follows:

Beginning with the intersection of the 103d meridian of longitude with the northern boundary of Nebraska, thence north along said meridian to the south fork of the Cheyenne River; thence down the said river to a point due west from the intersection of White River with the 102d meridian; thence due east to said point of intersection; and down said White River to a point on longitude 101 degrees and 20 minutes west; thence due south to said boundary line of the State of Nebraska; thence west along said boundary line to the place of beginning.

The Indians receiving rations and annuities at Rosebud Agency, D. T., were given a separate reservation described as follows:

Beginning on the north boundary of the State of Nebraska, at a point in longitude 101—20 west, and running due north to White River; thence down said river to a point in longitude 99—30 west; thence due south to the northern boundary of the State of Nebraska; and thence along said boundary to the place of beginning.

The Indians receiving rations and annuities at Standing Rock Agency, D. T., were given a separate reservation described as follows:

Beginning at a point at low water mark on the east bank of the Missouri River, opposite the mouth of the Cannon Ball River; thence down said east bank along said low water mark to a point opposite the mouth of Grand River; thence westerly to said Grand River and along the middle channel of the same to its intersection with the 102d meridian of longitude; thence north along said meridian to its intersection with the south branch of the Cannon Ball River, also known as Cedar Creek; thence down said south branch of the said Cannon Ball River to its intersection with the main Cannon Ball River; and down said main Cannon Ball River to the Missouri River to the place of beginning.

The Indians receiving rations and annuities at the Cheyenne Agency were given a reservation described as follows:

Beginning at a point at low water mark on the east bank of the Missouri River opposite the mouth of Grand River, said point being the southeasterly corner of the Standing Rock Reservation; thence down said east bank of the Missouri River along said low water mark to a point opposite the mouth of the Cheyenne River; thence west to said Cheyenne River and up the same to its intersection with the 102d meridian of longitude; thence north along said meridian to its intersection with Grand River; thence down said Grand River, along the middle channel thereof, to the Missouri River at the place of beginning.

The Indians were to receive all necessary aid from the Government in the removal to the reservations, and when removed each would receive from the Government the value of all improvements in the buildings or lands owned by him.

The Lower Brule Reserve opposite Crow Creek was not mentioned in the report, it being the intention to locate the Lower Brules on the Rosebud Reserve.

THE TREATY

In his annual report to the President, submitted in December, 1883, the secretary of the interior recites the steps that had been taken by Congress and the Edmunds Commission to effect a purchase of a portion of the reservation, which is here quoted:

The Great Sioux Reservation, including the agencies of Cheyenne River, Lower Brule, Standing Rock, Pine Ridge, and Rosebud, contains, according to the report of the commissioner of Indian affairs, 48,924 square miles, with a population of about twenty-four thousand inhabitants, or about one to two square miles. The total number of acres cultivated on said reservation was 3,484, or about 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ square miles. The land claimed as cultivated consists of small and badly cultivated fields, and the most of it can scarcely be considered as cultivated land.

The Forty-seventh Congress (1882) provided, in an act making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, as follows:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary to enable the secretary of the interior to negotiate with the Sioux Indians for such modification of existing treaties and agreements with said Indians as may be deemed desirable by said Indians and the secretary of the interior, $5,000; but any such agreement shall not take effect until ratified by Congress; Provided, however, that any cession of lands made by said agreement by the Indians shall be upon the express condition that the United States shall only dispose of the same to actual settlers, under the provisions of the homestead laws. (This latter proviso virtually repealed the pre-emption law as to that reservation.)

Approved, August 7, 1882.

Under this provision the commissioners were appointed to confer with the Indians and report to Congress for ratification. On the first of February, 1883, the commission reported, by which it appears that the Indians at the several agencies above mentioned had agreed to cede to the United States about eighteen thousand square miles on the following conditions:

Article 2. The said Indians do hereby relinquish and cede to the United States all of the Great Sioux Reservation, as reserved to them by the treaty of 1868, and modified by the agreement of 1876, not herein specifically reserved and set apart as separate reservations for them. The said bands do severally agree to accept and occupy the separate reservations to which they are herein assigned as their permanent homes, and they do hereby severally relinquish to the other bands respectively occupying the other separate reservations, all right, title, and interest in and to the same, reserving to themselves only the reservation herein set apart for their separate use and occupation.

Article 3. In consideration of the cession of territory and rights, as herein made, and upon compliance with each and every obligation assumed by the said Indians, the United States hereby agrees that each head of a family entitled to select 320 acres of land, under article 6 of the treaty of 1868, may, in the manner and form therein prescribed, select and secure for the purposes of cultivation, in addition to said 320 acres, a tract of land not exceeding eighty acres, within his reservation, for each of his children, living at the ratification of this agreement, under the age of eighteen years, and such child upon arriving at the age of eighteen years shall have such selection certified to him or her in lieu of the selection granted in the second clause of said article 6, but no right of alienation or encumbrance is acquired by such selection and occupation, unless hereafter authorized by act of Congress.

Article 4. The United States further agrees to furnish and deliver to the said Indians 25,000 cows and 1,000 bulls, of which the occupants of each of said separate reservations shall receive such proportion as the number of Indians thereon bears to the whole number of Indians parties to this agreement. All of said cattle and their progeny shall bear the brand of the Indian department, and shall be held subject to the disposal of said department, and shall not be sold or exchanged or slaughtered, except by consent or order of the agent in charge, until such time as this restriction shall be removed by the commissioner of Indian affairs.

Article 5. It is also agreed that the United States will furnish and deliver to each lodge of said Indians or family of persons legally incorporated with them, who shall, in good faith, select land within the reservation to which such lodge or family belongs, and begin the cultivation thereof, one good cow and one well-broken yoke or pair of oxen, with yoke and chain, within reasonable time after making such selection and settlement.

Article 6. The United States will also furnish to each reservation herein made and described, a physician, carpenter, miller, engineer, farmer, and blacksmith, for a period of ten years from the date of this agreement.

Article 7. It is hereby agreed that the 16th and 36th sections of each township in said separate reservations, shall be reserved for school purposes, for the use of the inhabitants of said reservations, as provided in sections 1,946 and 1,947 of the revised statutes of the United States.

Article 8. The provisions of the treaty of 1868, and the agreement of 1877, except as herein modified, shall continue in full force. This agreement shall not be binding upon either party until it shall have received the approval of the President and Congress of the United States.

The foregoing agreement was not signed by a majority of the adults, but by the chiefs and headmen. The Treaty of 1868 required that all treaties thereafter made should be ratified by three-fourths the adults; but the Treaty of 1876, ceding the Black Hills was not executed in accordance with the Treaty of 1868. The commissioners considered this as a precedent, and decided to accept the action of the chiefs and headmen as that of the tribes, which is in strict accordance with Indian law.

The secretary of the interior stated further that Congress had declined to ratify the foregoing agreement, and required that three-fourths the adult Indians should subscribe thereto.

The commissioners had since been at work endeavoring to secure the necessary signatures; but it was alleged that the Indians had very generally concluded that it is not for their interest to dispose of their lands in the way proposed, and much dissatisfaction was said to exist among them. It was claimed that the price to be paid was not sufficient, and the Indians were not informed of the true meaning of the agreement. It was well understood that the Indians had now assumed a negative position toward the Edmunds agreement.

The secretary said, "It is not possible to make a treaty or agreement with the Indians with which he will not be dissatisfied." Almost immediately after the agreement was signed by the chiefs and headmen, certain parties (whites), advised the Indians that they should not treat with the Government for a cession of lands unless they were paid in cash, and every effort was made by interested parties to induce the Indians to retire from the agreement. If one-half the amount proposed to be expended for their benefit was offered them in cash, there would be no question but they would readily agree to the cession. It is difficult to make an Indian comprehend the benefits he will derive from a cession of land, unless he is paid in cash or its equivalent. He does not look forward to the time when he is to be self-supporting, but expects the Government to supply all his wants and pay him in cash or its equivalent for the lands which he values mainly as a means of securing compensation from the Government, and not for use. The treaty agreed upon gave the Indians more land than they would need for stock or farming purposes, being something over one square mile to each Indian, great or small.

OPPOSITION TO THE TREATY

This agreement, proposing as it did a somewhat radical change in the legal status and also in the domicile of the Sioux Indians, enlisted the attention of the country by the prominence given it through the press and the Indian Rights Association, and also by some of the leading missionaries among the Indians. Bishop Hare, in charge of the Episcopal mission among the Sioux, squarely opposed the agreement on the ground that it showed bad faith on the part of the Government, was inequitable, that the method of the division of the land was not just, and the price for the land not sufficient.

These objections were publicly replied to by the Edmunds commission in a statement by J. H. Teller, one of the commissioners, which statement at the time was considered a satisfactory, complete and valid answer to all the objections urged. In concluding the statement, Mr. Teller explains the reasons governing the commission in securing signatures, and in other matters, in the paragraphs following:

In this connection it should be stated that by existing treaties these people are entitled to support until they become self-supporting. A different view of the subject, it is true, is entertained by certain eastern people, who take up the subject in a dilettante, sentimental sort of way, as an agreeable substitute for the work demanded of them at their doors amid the poverty and suffering which are nearer and therefore less agreeable to deal with. They regard the Indian, seen through a haze of romance, and mystery, born of absolute ignorance of the object of their admiration, as a veritable Hiawatha, and would permit him in his ignorance and greed, to be the sole judge of what is good for him. Social position or connection with missionary societies gives to their opinions an influence out of all proportion to their merits, and gains for them the support of those whose greater knowledge ought to lead to more sensible conclusions. It was the interference of these well-meaning but ill informed people that caused the rejection of the agreement by Congress on the ground that it was not properly signed.

It was assumed that the commission had spent months upon an agreement, which had passed the scrutiny of the interior department, without being fully informed as to the number of signatures required to make it effective. The explanation of the matter is very simple. Article 12 of the treaty of 1868 provides that no cession shall thereafter be made, except by consent of three-fourths of the male adults.

In making the agreement of 1877 the same parties—the United States on one side, and the chiefs and headmen of the Sioux on the other—agreed to ignore that provision of the treaty of 1868, as was clearly within their power to do. The agreement thus made by the chiefs and headmen only was ratified by Congress, and thereby article 12 was in effect abrogated. The Indian form of Government is thoroughly representative, the chiefs in such case as this merely executing the orders of the council, and there is no reason for questioning the validity of their acts when thus authorized by their people. The instructions received by the commission, following both precedent and good sense, were that the signatures of the chiefs and headmen would be sufficient, and in accordance with these instructions the agreement was made. It was entirely satisfactory to the Indians, and would still be so had not a persistent effort been made to cause them to think they had been swindled.

The commission was aided materially by those agents who, by experience among Indians, are best qualified to judge of their needs, and by such disinterested men as Bishop Marty and others, who, to a warm interest in the Indians' welfare, add a thorough knowledge of their character and capabilities. The more intelligent and Christian Indians everywhere favored the agreement, while the barbarians, who wished to preserve the status in quo, opposed it.

It is a strange spectacle now presented of these men, who have as missionaries labored among these people to Christianize and civilize them, deserting now their converts and supporters and allying themselves with the non-progressive element in an attack upon the agreement, which, if successful, will result not in improving, but destroying it. No one who has actual knowledge of the situation doubts for a moment that a failure to ratify the pending agreement will defer the opening of the reservation indefinitely. Its opponents among the Indians will be encouraged to reject all plans for a cession, while its friends will be disheartened and cowed, and no understanding can be arrived at for years to come.

Red Cloud, who represents the Indian opposition, now openly declares that no cession must be allowed, and is making strenuous efforts to unite the Indians upon that proposition. The question is one which in its relation to both the Indians and the Government demands careful consideration and wise action, and should be decided not on grounds of sentiment and ill-founded theory, but on considerations approved by experience, attested by reason, and in accord with a definite and just policy.

SIOUX TREATY CONVENTION AT PIERRE

Early in December, 1883, a delegate convention assembled at Pierre, to consider measures for the promotion of the pending treaty, Pierre being, because of its location, vitally interested in the success of the treaty. John R. Brennan, the pioneer of Rapid City, was elected chairman of the convention, and Turney M. Wilkins, formerly secretary of Dakota Territory, then of Miller, Hand County, was elected secretary. The principal business transacted by the convention was the appointment of a permanent committee to continue the agitation of the opening enterprise and do whatever it found necessary to be done to promote it. A memorial to Congress was also framed and approved, which embodies the object, sentiments and proceedings of the convention, and follows:

We, citizens of Southern Dakota, in convention assembled, would respectfully represent that the great Sioux Reservation, containing over forty-eight thousand square miles, is situated west of the Missouri River, and is a body of land extending from the southern boundary line of the territory, a distance of 240 miles northward, and from the Missouri River 200 miles west. The length of Southern Dakota from its eastern to its western boundary is 400 miles, and its whole western half, with the exception of the Black Hills, is given up to 24,000 Indians, who hold but do not occupy the same. In 1876 the country lying in the forks of the Cheyenne River was taken from the reservation by treaty, and, under the name of the Black Hills, has acquired a fame almost world wide on account of its great and wonderfully varied mineral productions and resources. The discovery of gold and silver in the Black Hills led to the extinguishment of the Indian title, and was followed by rapid settlement and partial development. In this development millions of capital became invested. In consequence a great commerce has grown up between the Black Hills and the East. All the Government lands in the eastern part of the territory have been taken up and settled by a thrifty, energetic people.

Southwestern Dakota is a treeless plain, without mines or timber. For its timber and fuel it must go abroad; for its timber it must go beyond the Missouri River; for its coal into Iowa, Illinois, Ohio and Pennsylvania. The Black Hills country is not only rich in gold and silver, but has coal in immense quantities that Eastern Dakota has to bring in at enormous freight charges. Its lumber it must now procure from Wisconsin, consequently the pine forests and coal mines of Western Dakota lie idle and unutilized, while upon the hardy pioneer of Eastern Dakota is laid the heavy burden of freight charges, because lying between these portions of our commonwealth is the great Sioux Reservation, trackless and pathless to commerce, save by wagon roads, over which is annually transported 100,000,000 pounds of freight, at the enormous cost of 2½ cents per pound, or $2,500,000, to the consumers of the Black Hills. Twenty-four thousand Indians thus hold a domain larger than the most populous state in the Union, not using it for any purpose whatever. The great Sioux Reservation is not only useless to the Indians, but it is worse than useless to the white man. Were it sunk in the earth and covered with navigable waters the commerce around its borders would whiten its surface with the sails of a thousand vessels plying to and fro with the products of the West and the merchandise of the East. The Black Hills country, containing 7,000 square miles and one of the richest and most wonderful regions on the globe, has scarcely yet been touched by the hand of development. If the resources of the Black Hills could become available to mankind their productions would afford employment to thousands, and happy homes would spring up to convert a wilderness into a land of thrift and plenty. A million of cattle are pastured on the nutritious grasses of the Black Hills and its foothills, from which 300,000 were sent to eastern markets this year. The natural road to market for these herds is across this reservation, but the Indian refuses his assent, and prefers that the unused grasses shall illuminate the autumnal heavens with prairie fires. Thousands of the citizens of this common country, many of them old soldiers, are waiting to occupy by actual settlement all of the agricultural lands within the boundary covered by the treaty made by the Sioux Commission. On behalf of these thousands of honest, industrious but homeless citizens, whose only capital is willing minds and strong arms, we ask Congress to open to them the rich and fertile plains that now lie dormant and unproductive.

Resolutions were adopted endorsing the treaty made by the Edmunds Sioux Commission, asking Congress to ratify the same as it stood, or with such modifications as to compensation as Congress might deem just, also urging Delegate Raymond to give particular attention to the promotion of the measure before Congress.

This convention, before adjourning appointed a general committee to represent the people in any way whereby the purposes of the convention might be promoted, the enterprise being looked upon as one of decided value to the entire territory. This committee was made up as follows:

L. S. Bullard, chairman; J. A. Ward and H. A. Horner, of Pierre; J. H. King, A. G. Kellam and John Lafabre, of Chamberlain; C. N. Van Hozen, of Miller; C. G. Clark, of St. Lawrence; W. T. Love, A. B. Melville and W. A. Lynch, of Huron; E. O. Parker, of Highmore; E. H. McIntosh, of Plankinton; W. S. Bowen, of Yankton; B. G. Caulfield, of Deadwood; A. J. Simmons, of Rapid City; J. V. Offenbacher, of Custer City; D. T. Potter, of Spearfish; Henry Gregg, of Lead City; P. E. Sparks, of Central City; J. C. Shurtz, of Sturgis.

At the time this Pierre convention was held, the agreement made with the Indians by the Edmunds commission was pending in the Senate. It had not been formally rejected, but it was clear that it was unsatisfactory because of its lack of three-fourths of the adult male signatures, and would not receive the sanction of Congress. Already there was agitation for a new measure and a new commission, which would probably be provided at the session of 1883-4.

CONFIRMATION DELAYED. INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

The treaty which had been made by the Edmunds commission was not confirmed by the Senate, it being alleged that the commission had failed to secure the signatures of two-thirds of the Indians, as required by the Sherman-Laramie treaty of 1868, and the Senate in order to ascertain the causes of this failure, which, however, had been explained in the commissioner's report, and to obtain other needed information of the condition of the Indians in Dakota and Montana, appointed a senatorial commission, composed of Senators Logan, of Illinois; Dawes, of Massachusetts; Angus Cameron, of Wisconsin; Morgan, of Georgia, and Vest, of Missouri, to visit the various Indian agencies during the summer of 1883, and make such an investigation as would disclose the attitude of the Sioux nation toward this treaty, and also elicit information on other matters, both in Dakota and Montana.

The purpose of this senatorial commission appears to have been to ascertain why and for what reason the Edmunds commission had failed to obtain a greater number of signers to their agreement. The senate was not disposed to ratify the treaty without a fuller explanation of this apparent reluctance of the Indians to sign. It was not inclined to act favorably on the explanation of the commissioners that they had sought only to procure the signatures of the chiefs and head men as was the case with the Black Hills treaty which was the latest precedent.

This senatorial commission visited the agencies, during the summer of 1883, which included the Pine Ridge, Rosebud (a son of Spotted Tail now chief), the Cheyenne, Standing Rock and the Crow Creek Agency, taking considerable testimony from Indians and also from white people; and concluding their visits the latter part of July, had adjourned to Omaha, where, by appointment, they met the members of the Edmunds commission, and were also waited on by a delegation of the Black Hills members of the first South Dakota constitutional convention held in July, 1883, at Sioux Falls, which had at that time begun its session.

The senatorial commission had made it a point in their investigation to probe the Indians' view of the agreement, and whether their dissatisfaction with it was due to the lack of signers. And here the Senate commission discovered that the lack of signers was not protested, and the only feature of the agreement with the Edmunds commission that was unsatisfactory was the price the Indians were to receive. This was to be expected. The Indians wanted all they could get, and it was their constant apprehension that they had not reached the limit in the negotiations had. A similar obstacle was met with in the efforts to make the Black Hills agreement under the Allison commission. The Indians were counseled by their pale faced friends, some of whom had linked their fortunes with them, to delay the termination of negotiations with a view of receiving better terms. The procrastination was quite successful.

At this Omaha meeting the day was spent by the senators in hearing the report of the Edmunds commission, the members being present with Mr. Hinman. This report was in substance a relation of the manner and the methods they had employed in the performance of their labors. Charges of deceiving the Indians had been made against the commissioners, and these were explained in a manner that convinced the senators that they were founded on nothing substantial. The senators having so recently been with the Indians and talked with them were the better enabled to understand the flimsy nature of the allegations. They were such as had been alleged following nearly all the treaties that had been made with the Indians. The senators seemed satisfied, after hearing from the commissioners, that they had performed their duties in a proper and commendable manner without deception, and that the Indians had full knowledge of the terms of the treaty.

Following the report of the commissioners to the senators, came a delegation from the Constitutional Convention of Dakota, then about to be assembled at Sioux Falls, consisting of Judge G. C. Moody, B. G. Caulfield, Major Kellam, A. W. Hager, R. C. Lake, and Porter Warner, three of them from the Black Hills, who presented the importance of opening the Sioux Reservation, urging as reasons therefor that until the reservation was opened the people of the Black Hills were practically cut off from intercourse with the civilized world. They had vast mining interests there that could not be profitably operated until railroads were built into the country, and that this would not be done until the reservation was opened for settlement. The people of Southeastern Dakota, also in Northern Nebraska, would be largely benefited by the opening of the reservation, which would give them access to vast deposits of coal, petroleum and salt, contained in the Black Hills, and which, under prevailing conditions, were almost inaccessible and worthless. There were also great forests of pine timber, which could be utilized if a railroad should be constructed across the reservation lands.

The treaty that had been made and was then pending in the Senate, had been postponed because of the representations of a number of "squaw men," the report alleged, who had represented to the Senate committee that the chiefs and head-men had been deceived, and they now made a demand for more money. The proceedings of this meeting dissipated such an impression from the minds of the senators, and it was expected that their report to the Senate the next winter, would result in the ratification of the treaty that had been made by the Edmunds commission.

REPORT OF THE SENATORIAL COMMITTEE

The action of the Senate regarding the Edmunds treaty was looked forward to with great interest by the people of Dakota, and it was known that its action would depend largely upon the report of the senatorial commission appointed to visit and confer with the Indians.

This commission of senators was known as the Dawes commission, and its report was not made until late in February, 1884, when it submitted a report with certain recommendations, requiring the securing of the signature of two-thirds as provided by the treaty of 1868, and other changes.

The Committee on Indian Affairs, of which Mr. Dawes was chairman, reported also a new bill, embracing all the features of the Edmunds agreement and altering certain items in that agreement to meet the wishes of the Indians as expressed to the Senate commissioners during their investigation in 1883. This bill also required that the signatures must be obtained forthwith, and following that event, the reservation would be thrown open by proclamation of the President, which must be made within six months from the date of the passage of the bill; which proviso was of itself sufficient, it was claimed, to defeat the measure. This bill passed the Senate in April, but no action was taken by the House. Another important change made was in giving the Lower Brules a reservation north of White River, whereas the Edmunds agreement located them adjoining the Brule tribe at Rosebud, with a separate reservation in Gregory County.

TREATY INTENTION IN 1884

A delegation of Dakotans spent a large portion of the winter of 1883-84 in Washington urging Congress to take definite action in securing the opening of the reservation. Among these were Col. W. F. Steele, Barney Caultfield, Colonel Moody, John R. Wilson, of Deadwood; Col. John H. King and Edwin Van Cise, of Rapid City; W. S. Wells, of Pierre; Major Kellam, of Chamberlain; Mr. Luce, register of the land office at Deadwood. Delegate Raymond was confident that the Edmunds agreement would be ratified by the Senate, and predicted an early opening of the tract, there being a very favorable sentiment in the House, but the changes made by the Senate in the Dawes bill led many of the House members, who had favored the Edmunds treaty, to oppose a new proposition, especially one that would cost more. The House was democratic, was making a record for the presidential election, then pending, and unusual economy was a marked feature of legislation. And it might be presumed that unless a pressing emergency called for it, the House was not inclined to increase the number of Government officials to be appointed by a republican President at such a critical period in national political affairs.

The reader's attention is directed briefly to the active conditions in the settled portions of Dakota east of the Missouri River, beginning with the lawful opening of the Black Hills, but not assuming remarkable proportions until 1878. The wave of immigration that had its beginning at that time grew in volume for six or seven consecutive years, extending into 1885, bringing in an average of over fifty thousand population a year, or a total of 350,000. The railways came in and were pushed west and north and south during that period. The artesian basin was tapped in thousands of places. The gold fields on the western border yielded munificently, and the crops of the farmer mounted up by prodigious annual leaps covering scores of millions of bushels. And all this time the people were largely engrossed with the most exciting and momentous events, not the least of which was the removal of the territorial capital, the holding of a constitutional convention and the election in 1884 of a democratic President for the first time in twenty-four years.

Early in the session of the Fiftieth Congress, or about the middle of December, 1885, Senator Dawes reintroduced the bill presented by him in 1884, which was lost in the House—not being brought to a vote. The new bill differed only slightly from the former. The senator was a conscientious friend of the Indians, and he desired that they should be well and wisely compensated and provided for, and at the same time he regarded the opening of the reservation as proposed a demand in the interests of good government and the welfare of the white inhabitants of the territory. He was a legislative champion of the movement from its inception and steadfastly promoted it. He had modified the new law by leaving out the coal lands on the Moreau River. The new bill also contained a clause opening a large portion of the Winnebago reserve at Crow Creek, which might better have been entrusted to a separate measure. Delegate Gilford was working in harmony with Senator Dawes.

The Senate committee made a favorable report on this bill, on the 12th of January, 1886, and on the first of February the measure passed the Senate, and was sent to the House where only slight opposition was looked for.

The bill contained some features that were not satisfactory to the people of the territory, one being a reservation for the Lower Brules in the center of the proposed ceded tract facing the Missouri River. It was very similar in most of its provisions to the former bill, but sufficiently changed to demand amendment if it could be had in the House. The House, however, did not report the bill from the committee, believing that it was disrespectful to the President (Mr.

Cleveland had become President), who had recommended a commission of six to first make a preliminary investigation and report its findings to the Government. There does not appear to have been any effort made to raise a commission in response to the President's request.

The bill was pending in the House Committee on Indian Affairs during spring and summer, and while it was supported by the Dakotans who visited the capital, the division and admission projects, which wore an optimistic aspect, absorbed attention. The delegate, Mr. Gifford, pressed it to the best of his ability, and Hon. P. F. McClure, of Pierre, remained at Washington for the purpose of promoting the measure, and worked diligently and intelligently, but all to no purpose.

Concerning this bill, it was further stated by a member of the committee:

There were serious objections against the bill, though there does not appear to be the slightest objection to the clean-cut proposition to open the reservation; but there are collateral features incorporated in this bill that will provoke much discussion and perhaps defeat it. Such are provisions for securing land for railroad purposes. Such matters should be left for the Government of the United States to manage after it has secured title to the country. They do not concern the welfare of the Indian, and seemed out of place in the treaty agreement. The treaty should not endeavor to legislate beyond the simple proposition of a transfer of the land, and the amount and manner of payment, with the incidental agreement on the part of the Indian people that they will in good faith adopt civilizing customs and henceforth pursue an industrial life under the instruction and care of the Government.

The National Indian Defense Association, of which the President's pastor, Doctor Sunderland, was president, had made a vigorous fight against the Dawes bill, and it was stated that they would appeal to the President to veto it should it pass the House. Doctor Sunderland based his opposition on the ground that insufficient compensation was offered the Indians for the land proposed to be taken.

At this time, April, 1886, it was asserted the House would pass the Dawes bill, slightly amended. And this was so confidently expected by the people of the territory that little thought was given to it, all interest being centered on the division and admission questions which were in their zenith. The House committee reported favorably but no further action was taken for two or three weeks when a motion to set apart May 27th for consideration of the bill, had been adopted.

At the same time came the first unfavorable indications contained in a statement that the members of the House in large part were of the opinion that the railway corporations were demanding privileges which the House would decline to grant. These corporations, it was asserted, wanted a 200 foot right-of-way across the ceded territory, with townsites a mile square opposite Chamberlain and Pierre, and stations on the Hills line not over ten miles apart. This gave to the measure an appearance of undue favor to corporations. The public mind at the time was becoming unusually sensitive on the corporation question, and political parties were beginning to point their fingers at each other during election campaigns and arouse the prejudice of the voter toward the party which could be proved to be deepest in corporation mire. In another week it was learned that the friends of the measure were very much discouraged. The time set for considering the bill, May 27th, had passed and not the least notice was given to it. It was said that it would not come before the House during the session. That the chairmen of the various committees of the House had held a meeting for the purpose of laying out the essential work that demanded attention before adjournment, and the treaty bill was not given a place. Hon. P. F. McChure and Mr. McManima, of Pierre, who were at the capital looking after the bill, became satisfied that there was nothing to invite further efforts on their part, and came home. They felt that the House would pass the bill if it could be brought to a vote, and concluded to return to the siege again in December when the second short session would convene and endeavor to have a systematic organization that would give the treaty bill the right of way early in the session. An election for a new Congress would be held in the meantime, and members would feel more at liberty to act upon their judgment as to the merits of the measure after that event had passed.

And there was a decidedly hopeful feeling at the convening of Congress in December, 1866. The delegation from Pierre was there, and were aided by the Hon. Barney Caulfield, of Deadwood, a prominent democrat, and a former member of Congress from Illinois. It was then claimed that the most discouraging feature of the measure was the clause requiring two-thirds of the Indians to sign the agreement. This seemed to many as tantamount to defeat on the start—that Congress was willing to pass the bill but insisted on depriving it of all chance of success by requiring something practically impossible of securing. Representative Wellbourne, chairman of the House Committee of Indian Affairs, informed Delegate Gifford that he would not consent to the passage of the bill with a provision therein granting right of way to a railroad, and that it must be stricken from the bill. He also objected to the provision granting indemnity to the settlers on the Crow Creek Reservation who were ejected by proclamation of President Cleveland. This was quite discouraging to the territorial delegate, and he with other Dakotans in the capital apprehended that the bill would be kept back until near the close of the Congress and then so amended that it would have to be acted on by the Senate again, and probably thrown into a conference committee, where it would be held until the session expired on the 4th of March, 1887. The controversy in the House of Representatives relating to the contracts entered into between the Indians and the railroads for land on the ceded tract, appeared to be the only serious impediment to the passage of the Sioux treaty bill as late as February 1, 1887. Years before it had been stipulated by the Sioux Indians of the first part, and the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad Company, and the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company, parties of the second part, that the two railroad companies should have the right of way through the reservation, the roadway to be 200 feet wide. Ten acres were to be sold for depot and station purposes along the line, and each company was to have a section of land on the west bank of the Missouri River opposite Pierre, and opposite Chamberlain. For all of this the railroad companies had agreed to pay $5.00 an acre. This agreement or contract was at the time approved by the secretary of the interior, but it was subsequently discovered that this was not sufficient to make it legal, and that the approval of Congress would be necessary. Several attempts to obtain congressional sanction had proved fruitless, and now the contract was a part of the treaty bill awaiting the action of the House to make it a law. In the committee this clause had been opposed by LaFollette, then in the House, who thought the two roads should have only 100 feet of roadbed between stations, and a tract of 200 by 3,000 feet at every station for side track purposes. Finally Senator Dawes went to LaFollette and told him that he was certain the Indians would not give their consent to the bill as required, unless their agreement with the railroads was ratified by Congress. He explained that the bill gave the Indians but fifty cents per acre for all the lands taken up, under it, while if the railroad clause is retained the Indians will get $5.00 an acre from the roads for all lands the companies take. The Indians regarded this difference as greatly to their advantage, and would look at a refusal to ratify their agreement with the roads as a plan to rob them, and would not agree to the treaty and would refuse to sign it. LaFollette, being a practical man, yielded, and withdrew his objections. But Wellbourne, chairman of the committee, was disposed to insist on an amendment that would give the roads only 100 feet right of way for their roadbeds, with station grounds as agreed. There was some opposition on the part of certain citizens of Chamberlain and of Pierre to the clause giving the roads a section of land opposite their towns, apprehensive that the roads would use the lands for building up rival cities.

Congress would adjourn finally on the 4th of March, and the Sioux treaty bill was the last measure that was pressed for enactment. If it could be brought up it was sure of being passed, its friends claimed. Congress was in session all night. Springer was working for the bill, assisted by many democratic leaders. But one objection to taking a vote would prevent it. There was much excitement, and when 5 o'clock of the morning of March 4th came, the friends of the measure, who had listened to a great number of brief speeches urging the measure became anxious and cries of "vote, vote," came from all parts of the hall. The speaker (Carlisle) then said, "The gentlemen from North Carolina ask unanimous consent to suspend the rules and pass the bill. Is there objection?" Then Holman, of Indiana, arose and said: "I think it's too late to attempt to discuss this." A number of members labored with him to get him to withdraw, and he appeared finally to yield, but when he did the House was again in a turmoil, everything was objected to, nothing could get consideration, and the speaker soon announced that the session of the Fiftieth Congress had come to an end by operation of law, and announced the final adjournment. Holman was held responsible for defeating the treaty bill.

At the opening of Congress in December, 1887, Senator Jones, of Arkansas, a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, introduced a bill to provide for the opening of a portion of the Great Sioux Indian Reservation. The preparation of the bill was accredited to Hon. John H. King, of Chamberlain, who had taken great interest in the project from the beginning, and who saw decided advantages to accrue to Chamberlain as the result of a favorable outcome.

There was no bill before either House of Congress at this time for the purpose of authorizing a treaty for the reservation.

This Jones bill, as it was called, followed the general plan of former bills. It was claimed that it disfranchised all Indians from voting on its acceptance, who had been engaged in hostilities against the Government since the making of the Sherman treaty of 1868, which would rule out Red Cloud, Sitting Bull and that class. It retained the provision authorizing the payment of 50 cents an acre for the land. There were a large number of Dakotans in Washington during this session, endeavoring to promote the passage of the Division and Admission bills pertaining to Dakota, and early in January, 1888, a sub-committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, Messrs. Dawes, Jones and Morgan, held a meeting to which they invited the Dakotans for the purpose of obtaining their views regarding the Jones bill and reservation matters generally. The Dakotans who attended this meeting were ex-Delegate Pettigrew, Col. G. C. Moody, John H. King, Delegate Gifford, ex-Congressman Kleiner, formerly of Indiana, then of Pierre, M. H. Day and E. A. Sherman, of Sioux Falls. Mr. Day attended as a representative of the Black Hills. Nearly all these gentlemen addressed the committee of the Senate, Messrs. King, Day, Pettigrew and Kleiner, especially; and Delegate Gifford advocated an amendment providing for reserving sections 16 and 36, for common school purposes. It was a harmonious meeting, there were no serious differences of opinion, and about one month later, about the 16th of February, Chairman Dawes, of the committee, reported the Jones bill with a number of amendments, which made it conform quite closely to the Dawes bill which was lost in the House at the previous session. The school sections were provided for, and only 50 cents an acre allowed for the land taken. It required the signatures of two-thirds of the adults, and no allusion was made to disfranchising those who had broken the terms of the Sherman treaty by turning their guns against the Government.

A similar bill was reported to the House about the same time, by Representative Peel, from the committee on Indian Affairs. In this bill the railroad clause of former bills was modified, virtually placing the amount of land that the railroad companies could secure for right of way at the discretion of the secretary of the interior, but providing a maximum limit. This bill was known as the Gifford bill. The House, it will be remembered, had already defeated two Senate bills for this reservation opening, by dilatory tactics, and Delegate Gifford was now trying a new plan which would look to securing the action of the House on a House bill, early in the session. He had discovered that a majority of the members of the House were in favor of passing the measure if a vote could be reached. Mr. Peel explained, in submitting his report, that :

A few minor changes had been made since the committee had decided to adopt the bill, which, however, would not affect its general purpose. The provision relating to the railroad right-of-way grants had been somewhat modified. After giving the companies right-of-way through the reservation in accordance with agreements already made, the bill left to the secretary of the interior the amount of lands which the roads should receive. The railroads must be constructed over the said lands and right-of-way within two years after the passage of the act.

Speaking generally, Mr. Peel said :

Notwithstanding the warlike habits demonstrated from time to time by the Sioux, culminating in the Minnesota New Ulm massacre, the Government has, for over twenty years, been dealing with them with a lavish hand, supporting them in idleness and keeping them in a great wilderness away from civilization on a reservation the extent of which is almost as great as Kentucky. The time has come when it is an imperative necessity, as an economical measure on the part of the Government, as well as for the prosperity of the Indians, that there should be a change. The Government is paying for the support of these Indians $1,500,000 annually, and since the treaty of 1868 $29,403,642 has been expended in their support. This support being supplied to them, there is little inclination on their part to support themselves or make an effort to take up lands in severalty. The country now occupied by these Sioux comprises 37,000 square miles, upon which the entire Indian population does not exceed 22,487, or one Indian to every 134 miles. The reservations proposed to be staked out by this bill possess the following dimensions in square miles: Pine Ridge, 3,832; Rosebud, 3,843; Standing Rock, 3,957; Cheyenne River, 4,536; Lower Brule, 745; Crow Creek, 446.

A careful estimate of the number of acres required of all lands to each of the Indians shows that it would not require one-fifth of the land reserved to make up the amount required. The Rosebud Reservation has the largest number of Indians. It takes about five hundred thousand acres to give them lands in severalty, while the entire reservation contains 4,252,800 acres of choice land.

The report, recapitulating the terms of the Edmunds Treaty of 1882, showed that it was signed by 416 chiefs and head men, besides about forty chiefs and head men at Crow Creek. The last item was recommended by the interior department, and passed the lower house of Congress in 1883, but was not brought to a vote in the Senate. In support of his recommendation for the ratification of this agreement of 1882, Mr. Peel said :

This agreement was signed by the chiefs and head men representing the tribes. It followed the agreement of 1876, when both the Indians and the commission were guided in making it by the precedent established by the act of Congress, approved by the President, in making the agreement of 1876, which construed and followed the treaty of 1868. The Indians have received and the Government has paid over sixteen million dollars under this construction, and on the basis of these acts these poor Indians are now entirely dependent upon the Government for support. We think it unwise to declare the precedents established invalid by adopting a different theory or rule from that already established and accepted by the Indians, and while it would be better for Congress to legislate for these people, yet these Indians, having offered this agreement, it is, we think, best to accept and approve it with the safeguards and additional provisions and compensations provided for in the bill reported. By the passage of this bill reported from the committee the Government not only allows the compensation fixed in the agreement, but provides an additional 50 cents an acre to be paid on all lands thrown open to settlement under the homestead law, which will make a fund of nearly seven million dollars. The boundaries fixed by this bill are those of the agreement of 1882, except as to the Lower Brule Reservation and a small strip of country contiguous up to Beguers Creek occupied by only a few Indians. The Indians are given their choice between accepting this tract for their reserve, or the one above, including the Big Bend, which, it was understood, they prefer. The committee found that an agreement was already in existence between the two railroad companies mentioned, by which the companies are to pay $100 per mile for each mile of right-of-way, and $4 and $5 an acre for land to be used by them in the construction of their lines and stations.

To fail to ratify this agreement of 1882 would be to deprive the Indians of several thousands of dollars of money, for on the opening of the reservation the railroads would be entitled to right-of-way for nothing from the Government under the general law, free of cost. Inasmuch as the opening of the reservation will render the Black Hills Region accessible to commerce, the committee recommends very early action on the bill.

Near the close of February, 1888, a large number of chiefs and prominent head men at Cheyenne Agency requested permission to visit Washington. They had probably learned of the pendency of the above bill or of the one in the Senate, which was a counterpart. The commissioner of Indian affairs refused to grant the permission. He did not want the Indians in Washington during the pendency of this legislation. Although the Cheyennes were reported to be in favor of the treaty for dividing the reservation, the Indian office at Washington had evidence to the contrary. They were under the Sitting Bull influence which was uncompromisingly opposed to the treaty in any form, and if they were in Washington the enemies of the bill would use them to defeat it. It was understood that the pending bill, both in House and Senate, would contain a clause providing that it should only be necessary to secure the assent of those Indians who had been faithful to the Government since the treaty of 1868, which would exclude Sitting Bull, Red Cloud, Gall, and nearly all the old chiefs and their followers. The commissioner explained that the whole opposition to the opening of the reservation now comes from the "squaw men," or whites with Indian wives, who have settled on the reservation and had become quite wealthy. It was to their interest to keep the reservation intact, and they have raised $2,000 to pay the expenses of this Cheyenne party to Washington. Ex-Congressman Kleiner, of Pierre, in a speech to the Senate committee about this same time, referred in strong terms to the marriage of Douglas Carlin, son of an army colonel, to a full-blooded squaw, a daughter of a Cheyenne or Two-Kettle chief, who had 10,000 head of cattle pastured on the reservation. Kleiner told the senators that many such marriages had taken place, and it was that class of white men who were retarding progress among the Sioux, and fighting the allotment act and the division of the reservation.

That the Dakota Indians had no justifiable cause for apprehension regarding an abundance of land, the following statistics giving the number of acres in each of their reservations will show: Crow Creek, 203,307; Devil's Lake, 230,400; Fort Berthold, 1,912,000; Lake Traverse, 913,786; Old Winnelago, 416,915; Ponca, 90,000; Turtle Mountain, 46,000; Yanktons, 430,405; Great Sioux Reserve, 21,593,138, making a total of nearly twenty-seven million acres, or more than one-fourth of the entire area of the territory.

The House passed the Gifford bill on the 8th of March, and then the Senate considered it and passed it March 21st. It was then returned to the House for concurrence in the Senate amendments, and by some painful misunderstanding word was given out that the bill had passed, and on this slight but erroneous information, this statement was immediately telegraphed to Pierre, and also to Chamberlain. At Pierre the people were evidently waiting for the news, for they were all prepared for a celebration when the message came at 5 o'clock in the evening. A cheer went up that echoed through the length and breadth of the city, which was followed by the booming of cannon, then bands appeared upon the streets playing national airs, followed by cheering crowds. As the shades of evening fell bonfires were kindled on the summits of the sentinel hills that guard the exposed front of the city, and fireworks were now added to the joyful occasion, Chinese lanterns decorating every tree and many buildings. The firemen turned out in uniform bearing banners upon which were inscribed such legends as "There's a home over there," pointing across the river to the reservation. Another, "Daves, Gifford, and the entire House and Senate fought our battles." The mayor of the city, Mr. Johnson, sent a congratulatory telegram to Senator Dawes at Washington, bearing this message:

Pierre citizens send sincerest congratulations on the passage of the Sioux Bill, regarding you as one of the chief benefactors of Dakota Territory.

Chamberlain was electrified by a similar announcement from Hon. John H. King, who was in Washington. The dispatch did not reach there until 8 o'clock in the evening, but the news "spread like wild-fire," according to the view of a large number of citizens. The bells were rung, and men, women and children, who had been waiting for years for this opportunity to celebrate, all with one accord rushed from their homes into the streets and to other homes, to shake and be shaken. Fireworks, bonfires, bands of music were soon lending their charm to the general rejoicing. Fourth of July orators thundered forth their eloquence, among whom Col. W. V. Lucas, J. M. Greene, and Doctor Duncan were deserving of honorable mention.

As stated, the bill had been returned to the House for concurrence in the Senate amendments, which the House refused, and a conference was ordered. This conference had considerable difficulty in coming to an agreement, consuming the remainder of the month of March and until about April 15th, in arriving at a settlement.

It was finally agreed to, and then doubts arose as to the position of the President, who had informed Senator Allison, who called upon him in reference to his action, that he "was considerable of a crank on Indian affairs," and gave him no definite assurance. The bill was not finally engrossed and sent to the President until the 19th of April. He sent it to the commissioner of Indian affairs for examination. It was finally approved late in April, though evidently with considerable reluctance.

This law was the second Congress had passed on this subject, the first being the Pettigrew bill of 1882. Two bills, known as the Dawes bills, had passed the Senate, as previously related, but had not been acted upon by the House. The law of 1882 was similar to a pioneer enterprise that had not been tested even experimentally, and left the partitioning of the reservation among the different bands, as well as nearly all the details, to the discretion of the commissioners. The first agreement by the Edmunds-Teller-Shannon commission, however, formed substantially the basis of the present law.

The Great Sioux Reservation was divided on nearly the plan provided in the Edmunds agreement of 1882, the Indians relinquishing nearly all the land embraced between the White River on the south and the Big Cheyenne on the north. The portion retained by the Indians was divided into five separate reservations, and these reservations were to be the permanent home of the Indians or tribes inhabiting them. A feature of the bill required the Indians of each of these separate reservations to relinquish all right of ownership or interest in the lands contained in each of the other reservations, thus making practically five distinct and separate reservations, each reservation belonging to the tribe or tribes named in the law. The law required that three-fourths of the male adult Indians, eighteen years old and upward, should sign the agreement.

President Cleveland, in July, 1888, appointed the following named commissioners to make the agreement with the Indians:

Judge Wright, of Tennessee, chairman of the Northwest Indian commission; Capt. R. H. Pratt, U. S. A., of the Carlisle Indian School, Carlisle, Pa.; Dr. Chas. H. Hepburn, of Carlisle Indian School; Rev. Wm. J. Cleveland, Madison, D. T. (second cousin of the President); Robert A. McFadden, of Amherst, Mass., secretary; Gny L. R. Stevick, Carlisle, assistant secretary.

The act of Congress divided that portion of the domain that was to be reserved to the Indians into five reservations, named respectively the Upper Brule, or Rosebud Reservation; the Ogalala, or Pine Ridge Reservation; the Lower Brule Reservation; the Cheyenne River Reservation, and the Standing Rock Reservation. A reservation was also made of the old Crow Creek and Winnebago reserves on the east side of the Missouri River, opposite the Lower Brule reservation, while the Yankton Reservation was left undisturbed, but the Yanktons and Santees being members of the Sioux Nation, it was deemed necessary to get their consent to this agreement in order to avoid further complications. The Crow Creek and Yankton reserves were never a part of the Great Sioux Reservation, while the Yankton Reservation was left undisturbed under the treaty by the Yanktons in 1858. The Santees and Winnebagos who had been exiled from Minnesota during the Little Crow war of 1862 and were located at Crow Creek by Supt. Clark W. Thompson, but there is no record that it was ever withdrawn from market. That portion of the reservation south of White River was apportioned to the Ogalalas, under Red Cloud, and the Brules under a son of Spotted Tail, who had succeeded to the chieftainship held by his father. Each of these tribes numbered about six thousand. The boundaries of the new reservations will be found in the adjoining chapter under the Crook treaty.

The commission entered the Indian country by way of Bismarck, and began work at Standing Rock Agency on the 20th of July. From the information that had been received, unofficially, from the various agencies, there was a general apprehension that the Indians were averse to signing any agreement under the new law. The situation at Standing Rock, as the commissioners found it, was summed up in the following account sent from the agency, July 10th:

There is great excitement on the reservation and among the five or six thousand now encamped around the agency there are none who favor the treaty. Some of them say they are willing to listen to what the white chiefs have to say, and it is possible, but not at all probable, that the commission may be able to change the sentiment by explaining the details of the law. The law takes from the Indians about one-half their lands, or 11,000,000 acres, which is to be sold to settlers at 50 cents an acre. The fund, which it is estimated will soon be two or three millions of dollars, is to be placed at interest for the benefit of the Indians. Besides this one million is to be expended for farm machinery, etc., for the Indians who are to take land in severalty and live like white men. This feature is what Indians dislike. Some say they want to live like white men, but the majority say they want a hunting ground and they have been driven far enough by the whites. Some of the most noted chiefs of the Sioux Nation are now here to confer with the commission, among them Gall, Mad Bear, Big Head, Running Antelope and John Grass. Sitting Bull is out on a hunt, and as he has already expressed his opposition to the treaty, it is likely that his presence here tomorrow will not tend to lighten the task of the commission. The conference with the Indians will take place tomorrow. The Indians have selected several orators to talk, and will have their own interpreter also. They say they cannot always trust white men, and that all treaties heretofore have been broken.

The commissioners on the following morning explained to the Indians the treaty. They presented two papers for the Indians to sign. One was to be signed in black ink, and the other in red ink. The Indians soon learned to designate them as the "black paper" and the "red paper." The black ink was for those signatures that favored the treaty, and the red ink for those who opposed, but these Indians refused to sign either one. Nearly three weeks were spent at this agency holding councils nearly every day, and it was nearly the last of August before the commission concluded that they were not to accomplish anything at this agency. The Indians refused to sign either paper, fearing there was some kind of a trick to be played upon them. From here the commission had intended to go to the Cheyenne Agency, as it was the next on the route, but at the last moment changed their decision. They had learned that the sentiment at Cheyenne was hostile also, and that the feeling at Crow Creek was more friendly, so they resolved to tackle Crow Creek before venturing into another hostile camp.

As indicating the conditions at Standing Rock, after the commissioners had been holding councils for ten days or two weeks, a correspondent of the Tribune, at Bismarck, who was on the ground, relates this incident, which reflects the implacable nature of the hostility of the Indians to the proposition of the Government.

It was at a council of the Indians held during one night and lasted nearly all night.

Every one of their number over eighteen years of age was present, and speeches more earnest and fiery than ever were made by the chiefs. Gall, Mad Bear, John Grass, and other prominent spellbinders spoke, after which a vote was taken on the proposed acceptance of the treaty, and every dusky warrior shouted "No." Not satisfied with this, the most solemn scene of the week was enacted by every Indian taking an oath to the Great Spirit that he would sign no paper relative to the treaty—that he would sign neither the black paper, which meant "Yes," nor the red paper, which meant "No." The commissioners did not know of this when they opened the conference hopefully the following morning. All the Indians were present, including Sitting Bull. He was sullen and reticent, but he informed an interpreter that he would never consent to the signing of the treaty by any of his friends, and that he thought the proposition was all in favor of the white man.

After opening the conference, Chairman Pratt introduced Governor Church, governor of Dakota Territory, who arrived at the agency the evening before. The governor spoke to the Indians for thirty minutes, and delivered what was considered a very convincing and effective speech. He tried his best to convince the Indians that the treaty was for their best interests, and evidently made quite an impression upon their minds. Agent McLaughlin and President Wright then spoke, but their pleadings appeared to fall on deaf ears.

John Grass was the first Indian to make reply. He said, "Why do you want our lands? Have you not enough land for the white people? Look across the river (pointing to the opposite side of the Missouri). You will see a house here and there miles apart. Why do you white people not take that land and let us alone? You are not paying us enough for our land. Fifty cents an acre is not enough. Our land must be worth much to the white men, for when they first come here they are very poor, and after they have been here some time they are (pointing to the commissioners and the governor) dressed very well. I will not sign another paper."

Mad Bear spoke next, opposing the treaty forcibly. Among other utterances was this, which was regarded as significant: "I do not believe the Great Father's heart will be sad if we do not sign, and I will not sign." Sitting Bull made no speech, but said outside that he would not consent to opening the reservation. Red Cloud, the great chief at the Pine Ridge Agency, was industriously at work among the tribes, stirring up opposition and he could not be suppressed. Sitting Bull and Red Cloud were leading a movement to have a large delegation visit Washington and present their side of the case to the Great Father in person.

It was evident that there was concert of action among the Sioux tribes at the various agencies on this land selling proposition, which may have been instigated by white men. Red Cloud, though over two hundred miles away from Standing Rock, was regularly informed of the proceedings; their Indian couriers, on fleet ponies, were passing across the reservation to the various agencies quite frequently. If the commissioners knew of this they had not given it the weight it was entitled to. It was not that the Indians did not appreciate the advantages which the new agreement offered, that they opposed it, but they felt satisfied that they could obtain a much better price for their land, if they held their customer off until he increased the price, but the commissioners had no discretion in the matter of price. The Indians had set their mark at $1.25 an acre, and the Great Father had offered but 50 cents.

Chief John Grass gave these reasons for his refusal:

The new act offers 50 cents an acre for all land to be relinquished by our ratification of the agreement, and this 50 cents per acre is made contingent upon the land being taken by homesteaders. From the character of the land, being chiefly adapted for grazing, it is doubtful if ever more than one-third of it could be taken under the homestead laws. As there is no provision for land not thus taken the few homesteaders would have the benefit of the large grazing ranges without cost, and the Indians would thus receive nothing. Furthermore, $1.00 per acre clear of all expenses would be but a nominal price. Our treaty of 1868, by which we ceded large tracts, provides for a yoke of oxen and a cow for every family who locates upon land and commences farming, as well as $100 worth of agricultural implements the first year, and $25 a year for three succeeding years. We are nearly all located now and entitled to this, but the Government has not yet made any surveys to enable us to take out our certificates of allotment.

Nothing was accomplished at Standing Rock and the commission adjourned to Crow Creek. The commissioners were greatly delayed and did not open the council at Crow Creek until about the 30th of August. The Crow Creek Indians were all at home, and eager to meet the commissioners, who opened the council with much ceremony. Rev. Mr. Cleveland, one of the commissioners, offering prayer, and at the request of White Ghost, prayer was also offered by an Indian minister, Davis Renville. Mr. Cleveland then explained the law to the Indians, using a large new map to illustrate his subject. He occupied several hours and assured the Indians that the present agreement was the best that had ever been presented to them and under it each individual Indian would acquire a larger individual tract of land than could probably be had under any other agreement.

On the third day, the Indians in the meanwhile having held several councils, the papers for signatures were brought out and the Indians requested to sign. Very strong appeals had predated the presentation of the papers for signatures. Major Anderson, the agent, informed the Indians that the time for signing had arrived, and a great many were anxious to sign and return to their homes. White Ghost, a leading chief, here sprang to his feet and declared "he was not ready to sign, and would not do so." He was followed by a number of others who made similar declarations. Here an Indian named Bowed Head, dramatically sprang into the circle and delivered an urgent appeal to the Indians, substantially in these words:

You are my friends, and what I am going to say may hurt you, nevertheless I am going to speak. My friends, I am on a different path from some of the rest of you. I am not one of the chiefs sitting there, but I am a member of the tribe, and I want to make a plea for the children. I am not a bit afraid of you, because you are but men. The only man I am afraid of is the God in whom I believe. I want to save the young generation of this tribe. He that believes in the Great Spirit, and sweats for him, I believe in him. I am going to say a few words to you Indians. I am not going to act for my own personal good, I have no children, but I have grandchildren, I do not wish to impose on the rights of you chiefs who are sitting in front. No, my friends, I only look at it for myself, individually. You know my allotment. There is large, fine timber on it, four stacks of wheat and I have a self-binder. I feel that I am at liberty to say what I want to. If anybody is a friend of the Great Father, I thought you chiefs were his friends. Now, you chiefs have spoken of our forefathers and their graves upon the hill, and then I thought to myself like this: When our forefathers died, what had they accomplished for us? What did they do for us? I will tell you what works they left behind them. An old camp fire, where even now the grass does not grow, and old buffalo lanes that we can see on the prairies. That is all that is left of that work. We can see the old stones that they worshipped still piled up. Young men, do you wish your children to go in this way? You chiefs, my brothers, my cousins, my relatives, I pray you to have mercy on the young people who are beginning life and have no property to start with. I do not say these words because I speak to gain honor for myself. I do not say them because I expect the Great Father to remember me hereafter for it. Come forward, you chiefs, and set us an example. ("How," from the Indians.) We are waiting for you because you are chiefs (How) but if you do not come forward, we will go forward regardless of you. (How.) White Ghost, you are in poor health, and death is waiting for you every day. But I have something deeper than that to say to you. My friends, you may hate me, but I will tell you what is good. I know it is good. You may not think it is good, but I know that it is good. I have finished.

A young Indian named Williams then walked into the circle, and placing his hat gently on the ground, said that in the presence of older men he uncovered his head. He then made the most feeling and effective speech that had yet been delivered by the Indians, calling on them, if they loved their children, and wished them to become educated, made happy and prosperous, to come forward and sign the paper, and he then walked bravely up to the table, and regardless of all threats placed his name upon the paper. At this action the entire multitude of Indians sprang to their feet. For a moment a fearful silence prevailed. Then the friends of the bill, including the two chiefs, gathered about the table and those opposed quietly withdrew from the council. About sixty names were enrolled at this council, and about thirty more later on at the rooms of the commissioners. The commissioners were quite encouraged, and thought they would have little difficulty in completing their number. Two or three days later the commissioners went across the Missouri to the Lower Brule Agency, leaving their papers for signing with the agent at Crow Creek.

At Lower Brule a number of councils were held, and much opposition was discovered. Indian speeches were made and nearly all charged that the Government had never lived up to its treaty obligations. Among the Indian listeners was one called "Spotted Horse," who was a member of the Indian police force, a shrewd detective, and quite popular with the tribe. In replying to the charges that the Government had not fulfilled its treaty obligations, Spotted Horse said:

Now, we have been grumbling that the Great Father has not fulfilled former treaties. Well, now suppose the Government will sum up all the damage the Sioux Indians have done since the adoption of the Treaty of 1868. Why, it would take all that has been promised us to pay it up. All our personal property, yes, and our heads, too, would scarcely pay for the mischief we have done. It makes me ashamed to think of it. Why should the Government be so kind to us? What benefits are we to the whites that they should have fed and provided for us all these years? Now look at it fair and square. They don't ask us to pay the damage we have done, they don't even mention it to us, but instead they come to us with a better bill than ever, offering to feed, give us horses, cattle, homes and schools. If one of you had done the damage to me that we have done to the Government, and I had property of yours in my hands, of course I would hold it to make good the damage done. We have violated more of our obligations than the Government has, and now that the Great Father extends his hand and offers all these things, we should take it.

There was no rush toward the table by the Indians who were ready to sign, but there was a large number who signed and more were confidently expected. A hopeful spirit prevailed among the commissioners, who had concluded to move on to Cheyenne Agency at an early day, but the Washington authorities had concluded upon a change of plan.

Orders were received by the commissioners from the secretary of the interior to remain at Brule Agency, where a grand council was to be held on Saturday, the 22d of September, consisting of the Indian commission, all the Indian agents of the several Sioux tribes, and seven Indians from each agency. The purpose of the council was to influence the future course of the commission, and it was mentioned as a probability that the representative chiefs from each band of the various Sioux tribes would be permitted to visit Washington to confer with the powers at headquarters, though it was not plain how any change could be made in the law either at Washington or elsewhere, but the visit of the Indians was something that the leading chiefs had been for some months working for and it seems to have been deemed good policy to gratify them.

The grand conference was held at Lower Brule beginning on the 22d and lasting nearly a week, and while there was much oratory and explaining done, it transpired that the insuperable objection to the pending law and agreement was the price which the Government had fixed in the law, at 50 cents an acre, as payment for the land. This the commission had no authority to change. The Indians, however, practically admitted that the law otherwise was quite acceptable. They saw the advantage of having the reservation divided, and the partition of lands in severalty appealed to them, but the price was insignificant, and they finally made a straight proposition, offering to accept $1.25 an acre for their land, and with that conceded, would sign the agreement. This much was gained by this council, which was attended by representatives from every band of the nation.

As nothing further could be accomplished under the present law, the Lower Brule having answered for all the nation, the commissioners returned to Washington and the Indians returned to their respective agencies. As Congress was then in session, it was thought by the members of the commission that the law might be modified to meet the Indians' objections, before it adjourned, and the agreement consummated during 1888.

The number of Indians who had signed at Standing Rock, Crow Creek and Lower Brule was 282. An understanding was had at the council that a certain large number of Sioux chiefs from each agency were to be permitted to visit Washington, and were to start forthwith in order to reach there while Congress was still in session. The Indians did not neglect to observe this item of the agreement, and reached Washington very soon after the commissioners, for on the 12th of October, Rev. Mr. Cleveland and Captain Pratt, members of the commission, had an interview with the commissioner of Indian affairs to arrange for a conference between the secretary of the interior and the Sioux chiefs, seventy-two of whom had arrived in Washington the evening before. The Indians were also anxious to see the Great Father in person, but President Cleveland had not expressed a reciprocal desire to meet his red children. Congress was getting ready to adjourn, and such occasions put an extra burden of labor on the President. There were sixty-one extemporaneous orators among the seventy-two Indian chiefs, and every one of them had already entered his name for a speech before the Great Father, and Mr. Cleveland may have been informed of their intention.

The secretary of the interior, Mr. Vilas, represented the Government in these Indian affairs. He was not a stranger to Dakota, having been employed as counsel for the Capitol Commission and again by Governor Ordway in the case of his indictment for alleged wrongdoing in county seat matters. The President had turned the Sioux chiefs over to Vilas. They were having a pleasant visit at the capital and the Government was footing the bills. In the meantime it was discovered that the Indians were not agreed among themselves. The Pine Ridge and Rosebud element headed by American Horse and Swift Bear were opposed to making any treaty whatever at this time. They wanted further time to study the new law. But Sitting Bull and John Grass of Standing Rock were satisfied with the law excepting the price, which they demanded must be much advanced.

Their first official visit was to Secretary Vilas, October 16th. As the secretary took his seat, Sitting Bull stepped forward, and after shaking hands with the secretary and members of the commission, said:

My friends, I have but a few words to say. I call you my friends because I am one of your people. I belong to this Government. As we have our own views on this new law, we wish to speak to you as man to man. I hope everything will be done in a quiet manner. This is all I have to say.

John Grass, also of Standing Rock, sometimes called the premier of the Sioux Nation, was the next to speak, then followed Mad Bear, White Ghost and Drifting Goose, hero of the James River panic in 1870. The secretary then called a halt, and told them that their several speeches had been faithfully written down, and would be laid before the President, who would give careful consideration to the matter, and his answer might be looked for the following Wednesday. He hoped the Indians would be prepared at that time to say whether they would or would not accept of the decision, which would then be made known.

At the time set by the secretary the chiefs assembled at his apartments, and he gave them the President's answer, which consisted of a number of changes in the law, including an increase in the price from 50 cents an acre to $1.00 an acre for all land sold within three years; 75 cents an acre for all land sold within two years after that, and 50 cents for all remaining. These changes would have to be made in the law, and the secretary required that the Indians should promise to ratify the agreement when such changes were made. The Indians were not ready to answer. The changes met their objections, substantially, except that instead of $1.25 an acre they were to receive $1.00. The Indians asked for time to go home and consult with their people, but the secretary said, "No, no; we must make some progress toward a settlement here. You must either signify your assent or we will end the whole negotiation. If you consent, the commissioners will go back with you and complete the securing of the signatures. We will have no boy's play."

The Indians held a council, they did not entirely agree, but they definitely decided not to accept of the proposition made by Secretary Vilas. This ended all efforts to secure the opening under the Dawes-Gifford bill, as the act of 1888 was called.

It was considered too late to make any further effort to open the reserve under a new law, providing Congress could be induced to pass one, but those who were presumed to know the temper of the law-making body predicted that the next law would probably be framed in such a way that the reservation could be declared open without securing the two-thirds of the adult Indians to assent thereto.

REPORT OF INDIAN COMMISSION

The commission reported at length to the Washington authorities in December, after a half year spent in a vain effort to secure the consent of the required number of the Indians to a treaty. Their failure was complete, and they virtually acknowledged complete discouragement, and a wholesome loss of confidence in the Indians, materially, morally and intellectually. A brief extract from their report will best show their bent of mind toward the Indian, and their opinion as to whether he was capable of being improved by efforts to civilize him. Summarizing their report which embodied a comprehensive history of the Government's efforts to promote civilization among them, the report proceeds:

Stern and vigorous measures are from this on absolutely essential to a solution of the Indian problem. The first question to be settled is that of making these people self-supporting. A continuation of the practice of feeding and supporting these people in idleness, at the expense of millions of dollars per annum, will prove a needless burden upon the taxpayers of the country, and the ruin of the Indians themselves.

The Indians have willfully refused to comply with their treaty obligations, and the Government has, through considerations of humanity, continued to furnish them with rations, which it is not bound to furnish. The treaty terms allow the substitution of bacon and pork for beef, and in the interest of good health and decency, as well as to do away with the horrors which surround a beef-killing day at the agencies, it would be well to make the substitution. Pork and bacon would encourage the consumption of vegetables which sanitary conditions among the Indians demand should be fed to them.

The growth of Dakota and the increase of its population, which would entitle the territory to four representatives in Congress, were the territory admitted as states, demands an early settlement of the question. This reservation, larger than the State of Indiana, containing 24,000,000 acres, occupied by 23,000 Indians, stands in the way of advancement, of progress and of civilization. The Indians stubbornly refuse to give their consent to the opening of their lands, and believe they can continue to block up the way of civilization, at the same time feeding off the Government.

Under these circumstances the commission recommends that to facilitate the civilization of the redman and his progeny, the reservation should at once be surveyed, the Indians required under their treaty stipulations to take their lands by allotment and go to work upon them, the surplus land being sold off. That they should be compelled to send their children to school. That rations and annuities should be firmly withheld from those who willfully refuse to comply with these requirements. That all Indians complying should be given annuities and necessary rations and implements promptly. That all dealings between the Government, its agents, and the Indians, should be with them as individuals, and chiefs, as such, should in no wise be recognized.

The reservation should be opened to settlement so that railroads and other public improvements may be encouraged and the civilizing influences of the whites be felt.

After a full consideration of the question in all its lights, the commission is of the opinion that the consent of three-fourths of the Indians to the opening of the reservation can never be obtained, whatever the inducement held out. More than a fourth of them will always hold out against it. The advance of civilization demands that this great barrier be swept away, and the question is left with Congress as to whether arbitrary, but humane, steps shall be taken, and the problem solved.

Nothing further was done under this law.

WESTERN DAKOTA, SIOUX TREATY

One-half of the proposed State of South Dakota was to be directly and materially benefitted by the opening of the Great Sioux Reservation, while the entire territory, north as well as south, would derive much permanent advantage. It brought the Black Hills and its vast fields of valuable minerals in direct connection with the eastern part of the territory, relieving that section of its social and commercial isolation from its kindred, and from the many public institutions in which they had acquired a large proprietary interest through the revenues they had poured into the public treasury, and affording to the enterprise of that western Eldorado a promise of bountiful reward for their efforts to make the advantages of their country known to the world, and secure for the superior natural attractions a wider acquaintance with the American people. It was claimed that Western South Dakota was less known than any other important section of the United States. People generally had a vague idea that it was a gold-mining country. The success of the treaty awakened a progressive optimistic sentiment and men began to speak more freely of the resources and many natural advantages of the heretofore underestimated region—men who had become acquainted with these through many years of domicile and much journeying through that section. It was learned from such sources, which claimed some knowledge of the soil, climate and water, that the soil was equal, if not superior, to the country east of the Missouri. The abundance of springs and creeks tributary to the many principal rivers, which had their source in the hills to a great extent, assured an abundant supply of water in case the natural rainfall should prove insufficient, while the climate was more salubrious. For the production of the finest grades of live stock, in quantity, it had proven an ideal region. Wheat, oats, potatoes, domestic fowl, an abundance of edible fish of the trout family, and all hardy fruits, including the varieties of berries which grow in great profusion and are indigenous. Apples are also cultivated and sold at a profit. In fact, it would seem that the western half of the territory would be able to supply nearly all its own wants, and will never lack money to purchase the few staples needed. But possibly its source of greatest and most permanent source of natural wealth was in its pine forests. There was enough of this to supply the wants of the mines for perhaps a generation. It is used somewhat wastefully in timbering the mines as they are developed, the lumber consumed at home is made from it and shipments have been made to Eastern Dakota in small quantities. This traffic, it was said, would grow as soon as the railroads across the ceded portion of the reservation were completed. But the pine area should be replanted, as the ground is denuded of its trees, which will insure a perpetual crop and supply that will grow more valuable commercially as time passes.

A description of the pine land covered in 1889 stated that the pine belt commenced at the junction of the south fork of White River with the main stream. There was enough at that point to supply the demand, while the great forests were just beyond in the hills—township after township, nothing but merchantable pine. The laws of the United States permitted the cutting of the pine by any of the inhabitants of the territory, but only for home consumption—for agricultural or mining purposes. The pine lands were supposed to be mineral lands, and were not subject to the pre-emption or homestead laws. No person can cut any more than he can use for building, fencing and other necessary improvements on his farm or in his town improvements, but there is no provision for replanting, and this should be provided.

The mining industry, yet in its infancy, and the agricultural and pastoral wealth of Western Dakota must contribute their full share toward making the Dakotas the greatest states in the Missouri Valley.

The failure of the Wright commission and its disconsolate report served to stimulate instead of discourage the advocates for the opening of the reservation. They claimed that Congress could now see that it was useless to expect to get the consent of two-thirds of the Indians to any agreement, and therefore proposed to advocate the passage of a measure, just to the Indians, but declaring the portion of the reservation desired to be opened released from its Indian title upon the passage of the bill. Very soon after the report of the commission had been submitted to Congress, or about the 10th of December, 1888, duplicate bills were introduced, one in each House, providing for opening the reservation. The provisions of the bills were similar to those already approved by one or both Houses, except that the price of the land was increased to $1 an acre for a term of years, and then reduced to 50 cents. And a clause was inserted declaring "that upon the passage and approval of this act, all title and interest on the part of the Indians to the land described shall be released and extinguished."

A change of administration would occur in March proximo (Harrison having been elected), and the democratic leaders were anxious to get important pending legislation completed before the change occurred. The statehood omnibus bill was before Congress at the same session. The prospects for passing a new Sioux treaty bill, however, were looked upon as favorable. Chairman Dawes, of the Senate committee, would oppose the clause regarding the opening of the reserve without the consent of the Indians, but he was strongly in favor of the bill otherwise. The Wright commission, in its report, had declared that it was practically impossible to secure the assent of two-thirds, but this did not deter Mr. Dawes from insisting upon it, and he therefore introduced a bill in the Senate, a duplicate nearly of his former measures, declaring also that "upon the acceptance of this act by the Indians, all title and interest to the tract relinquished shall be extinguished." The Dawes bill further required that the bill should be accepted separately by each band instead of by the entire nation.

On February 15, 1886, the Gifford bill, as the House bill was called, passed that body, containing the clause declaring the act in force upon its passage and approval, but as the increased price for the land amounted to many millions in the aggregate, it was held that the Indians would be satisfied. That had been their only objection to former measures.

The House bill reached the Senate February 18th, and was referred, and reported to the Senate with many amendments February 24th. The amended House bill passed the Senate, and was returned to the House February 25th, and Senators Dawes, Platt and Jones named as conferees on the part of the Senate. The House refused to concur in the Senate amendments, and appointed conferees. The conference committee was not long in reaching a harmonious agreement, though Mr. Dawes had his way regarding the acceptance of the act by the Indians. The bill was reported to each House on the 28th of February, passed and sent to the President on the 2d of March, two days before the close of the session and of Mr. Cleveland's term as President. The bill was approved, and Congress had had its last experience with a Sioux treaty bill.

GIFFORD'S AMENDMENT TO THE TREATY

Early in December, 1888, Delegate Gifford introduced a bill for an amendment to the Sioux treaty law, proposing that the reservation be opened without the consent of the Indians, who should be given $1 an acre for all lands taken within the first two years, 75 cents an acre for the land taken during the next two years and 50 cents an acre for the land remaining and not taken at the end of the first four years. It further provided that the Government make a deposit of $2,000,000, instead of $1,000,000, as a permanent fund, to draw 5 per cent interest, for the benefit of the Indians, and an appropriation of $200,000 also made for surveying the land to be opened for settlement. The amendment failed of adoption.

CHAPTER XC

NINE MILLION ACRES CEDED TO THE UNITED STATES

1889

(Great Sioux Reservation—Concluded)

APPOINTMENT OF THE GENERAL CROOK COMMISSION—AT THE ROSEBUD AGENCY—INDIAN ORATORS—SUCCESS AT ROSEBUD—PINE RIDGE THE NEXT—RED CLOUD OPPOSED—CONSIDERABLE DIFFICULTY AT THE AGENCY—RED CLOUD AND SITTING BULL IN OPPOSITION TO THE TREATY—ALL THE OTHER AGENCIES VISITED—FINAL RESULT SUCCESSFUL—FULL QUOTA OF SIGNERS SECURED—ALL OCCASIONS STRIKINGLY INTERESTING—RESERVATION OPENED BY PROCLAMATION OF PRESIDENT HARRISON—REVIEW OF THE GOVERNMENT'S EFFORTS TO MAKE THE TREATY—THE TEXT OF THE TREATY.

Gen. George Crook, U. S. A.; William Warner, of Missouri, a member of Congress and a prominent G. A. R. man, and the famous Charles Foster, of Ohio, were appointed commissioners to negotiate the treaty with the Indians for a portion of the Great Sioux Reservation under the act. The appointments were made in April, 1889, by President Harrison, and as this matter of a treaty had been pending for nearly ten years and had been the subject of more congressional action and more diplomacy, and had already cost in expenses an ample fortune for an ordinarily ambitious man, it was the intention of the Government that there should be no failure this, the third, time. The selection of General Crook was therefore quite fortunate, for he possessed the confidence of the Sioux Indians in a remarkable degree, and though he had been compelled to punish them severely in war, he had always treated them well and even magnanimously when they quit fighting and sued for peace and clemency. Crook, at first, was not inclined to accept the place, alleging that the duties promised to require such action on his part as would jeopardize his standing and influence among the red people, which he valued highly; but considering the probability that there would be no more Indian wars of any magnitude, he concluded to take the place and use his efforts for the benefit of both his country and the aboriginal inhabitants of it. This third effort was finally successful.

If any evidence was needed to confirm the progress the Sioux Indians were making in civilization and the ways of the white man it was furnished quite satisfactorily by the experience of the Government in its negotiations with Red Cloud, Sitting Bull and a host of others equal to them in trading ability. The Government realized that the Indians would be required to release the land, but their welfare and the interests of the white people who would settle on this tract in proximity to the remaining reservations was best subserved by permitting the Indians to feel that they had had abundant opportunity to make the best bargain possible; and the Government was moved to allowing a liberal price from the fact that it would have had to furnish the Indians, in any event, with subsistence, clothing and farm implements and instructors and scores of expensive details during their probationary years while they were acquiring the rudiments of a self-supporting industry, so that whatever it agreed to give the Indians for this tract was not, relatively, an important item. The main purpose was to induce the Indians to the transfer of the land, and have them understand at the same time that they had the best of the bargain, which in fact was the case.

Congress had authorized this agreement, or some agreement for the purchase of the land, in 1882, nine years before. The difficulty had been to get the written consent of two-thirds of the adult Indians. This was a requirement which formed an important provision in the Sherman treaty of 1868, but it had been ignored in 1876, when the Black Hills were purchased, and the chiefs and headmen were the only signers; but that agreement was made, it was said, practically at the point of the bayonet, and while the echoes of the battle on the Little Big Horn and the awful slaughter of Custer were reverberating over the Sioux Nation, the Indians realized this, and rather welcomed the occasion when they could do something to placate the revengeful feeling which that terrible tragedy had aroused throughout the country.

The letter of the law was to be observed in this later treaty, and the Indians knew the treaty provisions would be fulfilled, and made the most of the advantage which this important requirement gave them.

The Government aimed to do what was best for the Indians. The tract which the Government sought to purchase and which was needed to accommodate the growing needs of the country was one the Indians had never occupied or used for any purpose. It was not regarded as the choicest portion of the reservation by the white people; but the railway development of the territory demanded access from the Missouri River to the Black Hills, which could be had at the time only across this tract, and that portion not needed for wagon thoroughfares and railway villages would relieve the pressure of immigration.

It would be a grievous error if we should assume that the Indians did not understand the law under which this treaty was made, and that they were not well acquainted with its provisions. In all its principal and important features it had been before them for at least seven years, and through their principal men, called their chiefs and headmen, had been solemnly agreed and assented to by them. It had during the intervening years been the subject of much conference and again presented by a commission with such modifications as they had demanded for the purpose of securing the requisite number of signatures. During all this time the Indians had discussed it in their councils, and sent their delegations to Washington and rehearsed it with the Government officials, and had succeeded in having its provisions made to agree with their demands as far as it was practicable and as far as the welfare of the Indians would permit. Had the Indians themselves been capable of drawing the treaty they could not have improved it in their own substantial interests. It was with this belief that the Crook commission entered upon their mission of procuring the assent of the Indians to the document, backed by a determination to succeed.

This commission inaugurated its work at the Rosebud Agency, where rations were furnished to about eight thousand Sioux. It was the most populous of the Sioux agencies, and probably the one where the least opposition might be expected, but it was important that the first effort should be successful because of the beneficial effect it would have upon the Indians of the other agencies who would be visited later.

On the 4th of June the negotiations were opened at Rosebud in a formal manner by the reading of the law to the Indians, who received it through interpreters that were satisfactory to them and usually of their own choosing. After hearing the law the Indians asked for time to consider it, which was conceded. They called a numerous council, which was not held until the 6th and which lasted all day. Over thirty chiefs and headmen made speeches at this council, which proved to be a warmly contested affair and from which white men and newspaper reporters were excluded. The newspaper reporters went everywhere, and being excluded did not prevent them from obtaining a substantial account of whatever transpired. From the Associated Press correspondent, who was favored with authentic reports, it was learned that:

The leading orator for the bill was Crow Dog, the chief who killed the great chief, Spotted Tail, and who was convicted of murder in 1881 at Deadwood, but was afterwards released by a decision of the Supreme Court, the incidents of which are fully related in another chapter of this work. Crow Dog's speech, according to the opinion of the intelligent half-breeds and Indians who talked of it, was the most powerful argument ever delivered by any Indian on the reservation, and had great weight.

On the side against the bill was Yellow Hair, a natural born orator. It was this Indian, in the great council in October, 1878, who tried to depose Spotted Tail from being head chief of the nation, and assume the place himself, but was defeated by a vote of 100 for himself to 201 for the able and crafty "Old Spot." The council was far from being a harmonious one. There was an opinion that the letters of Mr. Bland, editor of the Council Fire—the organ of the Indian Defense Association—to all the squaw-men, half-breeds and leading Indians, appealing to them, under no condition, to sign the bill, particularly explaining and mis-representing the school clause had much to do with the disagreement among the Indians. Bland had contended that in the treaty of 1868, the Sherman treaty, schools were guaranteed in any case, while, in the present bill, schools and other things were to be paid for out of the money realized on the present sale of lands, leaving about four million dollars, instead of the entire sum.

Doctor Bland represented an association called the Indian Defense Association and was quite officious in opposing the treaty, alleging that it did not treat the Indians justly. There was another association called the Indian Rights Association that favored the treaty, which was headed by William Welch and others, and by nearly all the missionaries. Bland proved quite a disturber. Secretary Noble, who was at the head of the Interior Department, spoke of him after this fashion:

I am sorry any notice has been taken of Bland or his kind. I don't have to treat with these men. The President has named honorable men to treat with the Indians, and I would far rather stake my country's honor and integrity with such men as General Crook, Mr. Foster, and Mr. Warner, than with the men who set themselves up as guardians of the Indians' rights like the men who are now undertaking to thwart the settlement of an important question. This Mr. Bland came into my room when I had been in office only ten days, and demanded my Indian policy. He began asking questions, but I shut him off quickly, telling him I did not recognize his right to catechize me, and as for my position on public matters, I would declare that to the proper people at the proper time. Since then he and his associates have been pitching into me, but I don't pay any attention to them.

There had been a council of the mixed breeds and white men who had married Indian women, the commission having decided that white men incorporated in the Indian tribes up to the present time would have the right to vote, and this council at Rosebud was almost a unit in favor of signing the bill.

The commission gave the Indians a big feast on the 7th, of twenty beeves, knowing that they were never so good natured as when their stomachs were full. It was one prolonged picnic to a majority of the red people, and the throng here was daily treated to Omaha and squaw dances, feasts and races, the younger preferring to enjoy themselves and leave the quarreling to their elders.

In the big council held the third day the leading chiefs who spoke against the bill were Yellow Hair, who thought the Government had broken the treaties of 1868 and 1876, but he said that he believed General Crook to be a friend. Two Strike, High Hawk and Little Dog also spoke in opposition, declaring that they were not getting enough for their land, and it would not be best to curtail their reservation, as they had now plenty of room to range their stock.

The leading chiefs who spoke in favor of the bill, some of them being particularly eloquent and original, were Swift Bear, He Dog, Standing Bear, High Pipe, Good Eagle, High Lance, Hollow Horn Bear, Crow Dog, William Spotted Tail, Bear In The Woods, Red Rose and Fast Bear. Several of these were opposed in the former council, so the tide was turning.

At the conclusion of this council it was agreed to meet the next day, and all those in favor of signing the bill should begin to do so, and those not in favor should meet in a separate council. The most convincing speech made during the day had been that of C. P. Jordan, the licensed trader at the agency, who was a brother of Col. H. W. Jordan, of the Ninth Infantry, and a cousin of the late Gen. George A. Custer. He had been chief clerk and acting agent at Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies since 1874, and though comparatively young, he had more influence with the Indians than any other white man on the reservation. He had exerted himself in efforts to secure a successful issue of this negotiation. Here follows the substance of his speech:

My friends and relatives, you are now in a position to place yourselves in a good condition, and secure for yourself and children the protection of the Government in your land allotted to you under this act. Four of my children were born here, and I could not look you in the face if I advised you to your disadvantage. Three Stars (General Crook) will allow you ample time, and I see not a reason for not accepting. These gentlemen would not bring this bill here if they did not think it for your interests, and in accordance with what your representatives asked in Washington last winter. The white people will not regard you for rejecting this bill, when the price was fixed by yourselves. Next year there will be eight more in the council of the Great Father, and I fear they will make laws which will not allow you as liberal terms, and besides you will lose the friendship of these people and those in the East who have been your friends, for they cannot know why you reject this bill. In this country there is only power by votes, and when a people can vote they can help make laws and thus protect themselves. When you take lands in severalty, you take the first step towards securing this power to protect yourselves by vote. I want you to seriously consider this matter, and not allow this commission to leave without your signatures. You are not supposed to be more intelligent than the mixed bloods and men intermarried among you. They accept this bill and want you to do so also.

The Indians began signing the agreement about the 8th or 10th, and on the 12th 1,028 signatures had been secured, and as 1,040 would be absolutely required from Rosebud, success was assured. The number to be obtained at the different agencies to ratify and confirm the treaty, in addition to the 1,040 at Rosebud, was 946 at Pine Ridge, 825 at Standing Rock, 563 at Cheyenne River, 230 at Lower Brule and 212 at Crow Creek. On the 14th the number required at Rosebud was completed, and the most difficult part of the work was thought to be over. The proceedings at Rosebud had been regularly reported daily by Indian runners to Red Cloud's people at Pine Ridge and to the tribes at Cheyenne and Standing Rock.

One of the difficulties at Rosebud was the estrangement that existed between the older generation of Indians and the young men. This was something new, the young Indians as a rule holding the opinions of their elders in great respect and veneration, and largely deferring to them. But on this occasion the young warrior class decided to take the lead, and they favored signing the bill, while the elder class were in an undecided state of mind and still urged delay. General Crook, who knew the Indian character quite well, took advantage of this situation and kept the petition open for signatures after he had started it, and the ranks of those waiting to sign were practically well filled with signers until more than the requisite number was obtained. The other members of the commission gave Crook great credit for the skillful manner in which he handled his part in the affair. Chairman Foster, speaking of the success they had met with, said of Crook:

That is a wonderful man. It is my opinion that a better man than he to deal with the red men could not have been found on the globe. We never know what move he is to make next, but when he gets ready to do anything, success always attends his efforts.

The commission went from Rosebud to the Pine Ridge Agency, the second largest, where Red Cloud presided, who was spoken of as the most famous, together with Sitting Bull, of the entire Sioux Nation. Just what position Red Cloud would take was not known, as he had kept his own counsel for some time, but it was known that he would have a powerful influence with his people. Red Cloud was a man of superior intelligence, and had he been a white man and among white men he would have been known as an excellent politician.

Red Cloud had visited Rosebud while the commission was there and had had an interview with General Crook and with no one else, and whatever transpired between them was kept from the people.

At Pine Ridge the commission found Red Cloud in a surly mood and opposed to the treaty, and the feeling among the Indians quite discouraging. The Indians held a number of councils, ostensibly to agree upon a more favorable attitude, but without accomplishing anything, though as the days passed the commission went forward with about the same program of procedure followed at Rosebud, and succeeded in securing about three hundred signatures the first week. A band of the Cheyennes were at Pine Ridge and expressed a wish to sign, which was permitted. About the 25th of June Governor Foster was sent over to the Santee Agency to procure the signatures of those Indians, they having sent word that they were all agreed for the bill. General Crook and Warner remained at Pine Ridge, satisfied that the sentiment of hostility led by Red Cloud could be largely overcome. The big councils were discontinued, they having become of a fault-finding character, where the hostile feeling was fanned by talks of the violation of former treaties and bad faith of the Government. They were controlled by Red Cloud largely, notwithstanding some chiefs took issue with him, Young Man Afraid Of His Horses, who possessed influence, Little Wound and High Wolf came over to the side of the commission, which indicated success if the commission persisted, and this General Crook was prepared for. Red Cloud's influence was recognized. He had lost none of it, but it could be overcome by quietly working among the people and explaining the advantages of the terms offered by the Government. The Indians were urged to think and act for their own interest, and not be governed by any past transactions.

There were about fifteen chiefs at Pine Ridge, including Red Cloud, who openly opposed the bill. American Horse and No Flash were in favor of signing, the latter saying he should sign no matter who objected, and if anyone tried to prevent him he would make them cry. Old Man Afraid Of His Horse, former great chief, said he was too old to control his young men, whom he wanted to think for themselves.

The commissioners were agreed that Red Cloud and Sitting Bull at Standing Rock were working together to defeat the treaty, and realized that success at Pine Ridge was important not alone for that agency, but also for its beneficial effect at Standing Rock and Cheyenne, and hence they gave frequent "big feasts" and kept the Indians in good humor.

After long counseling among themselves the Indians held a general council, to which they invited the commissioners. American Horse, No Flesh, High Wolf and Swords, captain of police, were the principal speakers. American Horse opened the council by a number of questions to the commissioners, in which he said:

My friends, I don't understand some things in this bill. I wish you to tell us in plain words about them, so we can understand. How long will the $3,000,000 deposited to our credit bear interest before the principal is to be distributed?

General Crook: "It is to remain fifty years, and the bill provides that in addition to the 10 per cent the Great Father may spend 10 per cent of the principal to purchase goods for the Indians after a time. This is to be spent in buying teams, implements, and things to allow you to go on farming."

American Horse: "Will everyone have equal rights, or will there be any specified amount for each to receive?"

General Crook: "The entire amount will be divided by the whole people, in fifty years."

American Horse: "After all our lands are surveyed and each Indian has taken his land in severalty, will the balance belong to us in common or will other Indians own the surplus?"

General Crook: "The surplus will be owned by all the Indians on the reservation in common, as it is now owned by you here."

American Horse: "I ask the question for the reason that there are two classes of Santees, and they may be brought in here and given our land. We owe them nothing and they have no right here. They have sold their land and have no right to ours. Will they be entitled to pay?"

General Crook: "The Santees have no right to your land, but they have a share in the permanent fund. They must take their allotment in Nebraska in their present reservation."

American Horse then repeated that the Santees had no right there, but as they had traded their land and become poor, the Great Father had taken pity on them. He then asked the commission to strongly recommend that their educated children and halfbreeds be given the places on the agency which draw a salary, and that anyone incorporated in the tribe be allowed to trade and not let the rich men come in and rob them.

The traders and others furnish everything and we have no market, so we sometimes grow discouraged. When we take our land in severalty we can raise everything to supply the agency. Will the Government give us a market to sell our goods?

American Horse and the others were then informed that the bill pledged in the allotment law to assist in finding a market for their crops, and there was no reason why the grain and beef should not be raised by the Indians and sold to the Government.

Several complaints were then made that hay had been purchased of white men instead of Indians, and the inferior beef received. The annuities and the bad condition of the clothes sent them were so put together that it made it almost impossible to wear them. Said one:

The farmers sent do not know their duties, and it seems as if some of them had never seen a plow, and if we complain they ill-treat us. We want them taken away and the places given to our practical half-breed farmers who can teach us how to farm right. I believe the bill is right and will start us on the road to prosperity, but there are other chiefs above me and I want them to sign first, so I will not belittle them by signing before them.

The commission promised to recommend to the Government that the changes asked for be granted.

Afraid Of Bear then addressed the commission at some length. He said there was one road to prosperity, and another to misery. He favored the bill because it was the prosperous road, but was afraid it might turn into the road to misery if the promises made turn out like those of the past, particularly of 1876.

Crook then said:

We now come to you with a bill that all your people can read. I have been with the Indians all my life, and no one knows better than I the wrongs they have had to suffer, and I do not blame you for your distrust in the past. But this bill you can all read and fully understand.

This council had a good result, and after it adjourned a number of the people signed, bringing the total number of signatures up to more than five hundred. But this was about all that could be obtained from the Indians at the agency. There were 250 absent with the Buffalo Bill shows who would nearly all sign if present, and the commission concluded, a day or two later, to leave Pine Ridge as soon as their special car was returned from Niobrara, where it had gone to take Colonel Foster to the Santees. It had been hoped to break the strong combination against the bill, but it had been discovered that a possible secret and powerful influence had been exercised upon the Pine Ridge bands. General Crook frankly acknowledged that it was one of the most puzzling and unsatisfactory cases in his Indian experience. It had been ascertained that on his return from Washington, previous to the arrival of the commissioners, Red Cloud had called a secret council of the leaders and succeeded in having them pledge themselves in the most solemn manner to work against the bill. He also wanted to leave $12,000 out of the $28,000 he was to receive from the Government for his confiscated ponies to give to Doctor Bland of the Council Fire, as his share for helping to get the pony bill through Congress, and also to pay for efforts to defeat the treaty bill, which were not successful, however. He also wanted to pay $14,000 to W. J. Pollock to become attorney for all the Sioux, wanted two couriers with petitions to be sent at once to the different agencies to obtain the signatures of the headmen to such an agreement. But Red Cloud's band had objected to his proposed disposition of the pony money on the ground that the other Indians had not lost their ponies. The money belonged to them and it had nothing to do with the land. Pollock, former Indian inspector, was working with Red Cloud. He was not present, but in a letter to Red Cloud he had stated that as their attorney he would keep their reservation intact.

In the meantime the Indians at Lower Brule, Standing Rock and Cheyenne, and also at Crow Creek, were rather anxiously awaiting the coming of the commission to their respective agencies, some of them with a determination to oppose and others just as earnest in support of the treaty. Not much opposition was expected at Crow Creek or Lower Brule, and the condition at Pine Ridge growing monotonous and painfully slow to a man of General Crook's active temperament, it was decided, about the 28th of June, to place the bill for signatures in the hands of the agent, who was to continue the work of proselyting from the ranks of the opposition, while the commission journeyed to the Missouri River agencies, designing to return to Pine Ridge if necessary. They accordingly broke camp and reached Chamberlain, nearly opposite the Lower Brule Agency, and within easy reach of Crow Creek, July 1st. The Lower Brule Reservation was situated on the west side of the Missouri River from a point a few miles above Chamberlain up to the mouth of Medicine Creek, a few miles below Fort Pierre.

Governor Foster found affairs in excellent shape at the Santee Agency. The Indians held a council immediately after his arrival, and the governor explained the particulars of the bill as it related to the Santees. Two or three of the chiefs present made remarks, all in the most friendly spirit, praising the Government for its generosity and considerate regard for their welfare. About one hundred and fifty signatures were obtained the first day and the remainder, about one hundred, would be obtained as soon as the Indians could be seen. The Poncas had been ordered to report to the Santee Agency, and they had not then put in an appearance. The Poncas were not Sioux, but they had a reservation at the mouth of the Niobrara, covering about fifteen townships, and they were provided for in this bill.

The agent, Mr. Hill, was quite favorable to the treaty, and Commissioner Foster, anxious to join the remainder of the commission who were on their way to the Lower Brule Agency, left the procuring of the remainder of the Santees to the agent and rejoined General Crook and Colonel Warner, and the party reached Chamberlain, on the Missouri, July 1st, and lost no time in crossing over to the Lower Brule Agency, where they found the Indians in a friendly mood, but not united in favor of the bill. A council was held July 3d, at which the Indians and the commissioners were present.

Iron Nation spoke and said he was head chief and leader of the tribe, and that he would sign the bill and his people would follow, but he would like the commissioners to read the bill again so that all could understand it.

This was done, and then General Crook said:

Now that you are willing to sign, you had better sign this afternoon. Tomorrow will be the Fourth of July, and the fact that the Indians of Lower Brule have signed will be telegraphed all over the country. All their friends would hear the news and be pleased.

After a few questions had been asked regarding the agreement, Iron Nation again addressed General Crook, and said:

Three Stars, I am going to sign because you tell me this is a good bill, but before I do I want your promise to be a good friend to the Indians here. We want to remain on the White River, and wish you to tell the Great Father.

Left Hand Thunder endeavored to check the movement, but was unsuccessful. Iron Nation signed first and was followed in the order of rank by the other chiefs. The conversion of Iron Nation, Little Pheasant, Dead Band and Surrounded, the leaders of last year's opposition, was a triumph hardly equaled in the record of Indian negotiations. The result was the commissioners secured 260 of the 300 male adult Indians. They had now from the different agencies visited, not including the Santees, who would all sign, at Rosebud, 1,125; at Pine Ridge, 530; Lower Brule, 260; in all about 1,915 out of the 4,100 required.

From Lower Brule the commission again crossed the Missouri and halted at the Crow Creek Agency, where they were required to get 212 signatures. They reached the agency July 8th, and the same afternoon held a long council with the Indians, which disclosed considerable opposition, the principal ground of dissatisfaction being that the Lower Brules would get nearly double the quantity of land per capita than would be given to them at Crow Creek, their allowance being about two hundred and sixty acres per head, owing to the limited size of their reservation. This objection was regarded as quite a serious matter. There was much disappointment at the sentiment encountered at this agency, which had been represented as not only friendly but anxious to sign. This was not the case, and after a couple of days spent in counseling General Crook expressed himself as not hopeful of success. He said to a friend in his party:

There is too much of the usual Government Indian policy in this treaty. Out of seventy-nine townships of land held by these Indians, they are asked to concede all but twelve townships, and these are not the very best in quality. Should these Indians elect to take up their lands as grazing lands, there would not be enough to give the allotted number of acres to each. This is not justice to these Indians, for their near neighbors, the Brule Indians, under the same agent, have a much greater number of acres set apart for them, and after allotment in severalty will have a large surplus left in common. The case is the same with the Rosebud and Pine Ridge Indians. The Indian's character is so constituted as to yield readily to all evil influences, rather than good. Another peculiarity of the Indian nature is that when you ask him to do something for you, he should be paid for so doing because you request it. It is this peculiarity with which we have to contend, though there was some other very powerful influence at Pine Ridge, which we were unable to discover. At Pine Ridge the talk was made as against the boundary line question, while the real objection lay beyond and outside this question entirely. During all my talks with Young-Man-Afraid-Of-His-Horses and Little Wound, both of whom have done much, they would tell me that they thought the bill good for their people, but when asked why they would not sign, they were silent. One thing may be written as a maxim of the Indian public councils, and that is that the complaints made there do not touch upon the real matter at issue at all. These Indians have been tampered with by the Doctor Bland's Indian Defense Association, and they listen to him rather than to those who they should know as their truest friends. I have an intimate acquaintance with some of the members of the Indian Rights Association, and I know that they have the best interests of the Indians at heart, giving time and money for their good, yet the Indians will listen to Doctor Bland and his rival society rather than the Boston society.

Another council with the Crow Creek people was held in the afternoon of the 8th, but there was no attempt to put the work of signing before them. The principal speaker, White Ghost, talked, mentioning the Santees at Flandrau, whom the Crow Creek Indians believe have no rights under the treaty. The speaker informed the commission that he had many full-blooded Indians who could both read and write, so he wanted a couple of copies of the bill, promising to study the same, but they were asked to make their investigation as brief as possible, for time was precious. Governor Foster made some very pleasant remarks, complimenting the Indians on the condition of their farms, which he told them spoke eloquently for their rapid advance in that civilized industry. General Crook then capped the climax of all oratory by promising the Indians a feast of beef and coffee, and the council adjourned for the day. The commissioners and their assistants spent the time intervening before the next council in personal persuasion, talking to the individual Indians and pointing out the advantages that would accrue to them under the treaty.

The following day the agreement was produced for signatures, and 127 names obtained out of the 300 required, and as this seemed to be all that present indications promised, the commissioners concluded to leave the agreement with Major Anderson, the agent, and visit the Cheyenne Agency, where a large number had assembled awaiting their arrival and whom it was very important to see and talk with.

The Government commissioners reached Cheyenne Agency in the evening of the 10th, but held their first formal council the day following, when the provisions of the bill were explained, and the Indians were given until the 18th to consider the measure, and were also given a feast. On the 18th the parties engaged earnestly in the business which had called them together. The Indians asked to have certain provisions of the bill explained. These related to taking lands in severalty and the method of extending the permanent fund. Governor Foster carefully explained all these provisions.

White Swan then addressed the commission, complaining that the Poncas and Santees would unjustly profit by the proposed sale of lands. This idea appeared to be held at all the agencies and was a source of grievous complaint. White Swan said that the Indians could not take lands in severalty and make a living, as crops were so frequently a failure. The Government, in the past, had also invariably failed to fulfil their treaty obligations with his people. For that reason he should refuse to sign. Crow Eagle, Little-Know-Heart, Rattling Rib, Spotted and some others, representing four bands at the agency, also spoke, all complaining of nonfulfillment of former treaties, and purposely evading the provisions of the present treaty. Each concluded by stating that he would not sign. They had also intimated that they had not been treated fairly in the Black Hills treaty.

General Crook followed, and sternly reminded the Indians that they had not been cheated in the Black Hills purchase. He said that it took $2 to produce every dollar's worth of ore taken out of those hills, and there would be a great amount of worthless ground. Under the present bill, he said, the Indians were getting more than the land was worth. The Indians, he said, had actually received much more than was promised under the treaty of 1868. He warned the Indians that they would certainly never get a better offer than the one now presented. Instead of complaining of the past they had better think of the future.

While the sentiments expressed by the chiefs were not such as to promise success, the commissioners did not appear to be discouraged, but redoubled their efforts among the masses, and secured a fair list to build upon.

In Governor Foster's remarks he told the Indians:

If the Sioux Reservation was divided equally among all the Sioux they would have 907 acres each. The Government now asks you to sell a portion, marked on this map (showing map, in yellow), about nine million acres. If you sell this land under this bill, which gives you Indians at this agency a separate reservation, you people would have 672 acres each, or sixty-five more acres each in your separate reservation than you would have if the whole reservation was divided among all the Sioux Indians. This yellow portion on the map the Government proposes to sell to actual settlers at $1.25 per acre.

This explanation was quite a revelation to the Indians and appeared to strike a responsive chord in their hearts, for their faces all wore a more cheerful appearance, as though they had already concluded not to let that sixty-five extra acres get beyond their reach.

The governor went further into the details of the bill with reference to the permanent fund and the methods in which the interest was to be expended, and also with reference to the schools and industries, explaining that at their request their schools, provided under the treaty of 1868, were continued without cost to them for twenty years. That the purpose of the industrial schools was to enable their children to become teachers, or mechanics, or farmers, the whole intent of the bill being to advance the Indians in civilization and ways of the white man in order that all may become self-supporting.

The council adjourned after the usual announcement that beef cattle would be issued, and it was evident at the close that the feeling of the red men was more favorable than at any time before. The commissioners expressed themselves as quite well satisfied that tomorrow would show a substantial gain for the treaty.

The rolls for signers were opened on the morning of July 20th. No sooner were the papers opened and spread upon the table than two young Indians, painted and wearing only the customary breech-clout, arose and threatened to brain anyone who first touched the pen. An Indian policeman took charge of the belligerents and led them away. The incident aroused the ire of General Crook, who declared with much indignation and emphasis:

I want it very distinctly understood that no painted, breech-clouted Indian will be allowed to interfere in any way with the signing of this treaty. If there are not enough police here to protect every signer, I will bring enough soldiers to do so, and bear this in mind, that if I do bring soldiers here, I will make it warm for you.

The commission left Cheyenne Agency for Standing Rock on the 24th of July. Hump, an unruly and hostile chief, had broken up an important council the evening before, and the Indians generally were in a disturbed condition, but there was a strong sentiment favorable to the bill among them, and the plan was to let this feeling spread, aided by the Indians themselves. Major Randall would remain there and would take the signatures of the people as they presented themselves. Two hundred and seventy-five had been secured before the commission left, and information had been received from Crow Creek that the number enrolled there had increased to 265, which completed its quota.

At Standing Rock it was expected to meet with determined opposition from Sitting Bull, Galla, nephew of Sitting Bull, and John Grass, reputed to be the ablest man among them and a famous orator. These had all along been opposed to any treaty for the relinquishment of any part of the reservation. They advised the Indians to stand firm and keep the lands. At this agency there were 1,138 male adult Indians, and it would be necessary to secure 825 signatures. After presenting the bill to a council of the Indians, including their headmen and chiefs, Sitting Bull not attending, the provisions of the bill were explained, and then an adjournment was taken to give the Indians an opportunity to discuss the provisions of the bill. A big feast had also been prepared for all the Indians, friends and foes alike, General Crook being particularly partial to this feature of the negotiations, which never failed to put the Indians in good humor and disposed to listen. If they could secure the serious and unprejudiced attention of the people the commissioners felt that they would win. It was also found, much to the gratification of the commissioners, that they had been given prejudiced reports from Standing Rock, and that the hostile feeling was no different and no more intense than at other agencies. Intelligence from the Cheyenne Agency was encouraging. Nearly a hundred had signed since the commissioners departed and the prospects were bright for securing the number needed and probably more. White Swan, Crow Eagle, Yellow Hawk and Little Bear had signed, and Mr. Hump had promised to, and finally touched the pen and surrendered before the signature roll was closed.

The commissioners had been highly gratified at the progress made, though amid many difficulties that they had no authority to remove, as they were entrenched in some feature of the law, though of no material importance, and they concluded to rest at Standing Rock and wear out the opposition. They had made up their minds they were going to win without the consent of Sitting Bull, who still prided himself that he had never signed a treaty and never would. But many of the Indians had lost confidence in Sitting Bull's leadership.

An important and interesting council was held at Standing Rock near the last day in July. There were present, beside the commissioners, about twenty-five chiefs and four hundred of the common people. Sitting in the front row were Sitting Bull, Chief Gall, John Grass, Mad Bear and Running Antelope. The council was opened by Governor Foster, who extended an invitation to the Indians to occupy the time in a statement of their views, and in asking such questions as they desired to. John Grass, the statesman of the tribes, then arose and spoke as follows:

We have asked for a newspaper reporter of our own, but we cannot have the one we wished. When the agent finds another we will be ready to talk.

This objection was accommodated by the agent, Major McLaughlin, who promised to look over the notes of the stenographer. As Grass proceeded his first words were spoken in the English language. His talk displayed ability to get down to the heart of his subject and institute a comparison between the present treaty and former treaties. He spoke as follows:

Well, my friends, this is a nice day, but it is not nice on our account, but because the Great Spirit so wishes it to be. I am very thankful to you for saying that, no matter what may be our conclusion, we will talk as friends. You are chosen to show us the straight road, and are of renown among your own people. To whatever terms we may come, these people here will uphold me in my position. Last summer we went to Washington with some of our friends here. At that time we did not like to see the complicated manner in which the Great Father stated our views. We said then, no matter how good or how poor the land might be, we wanted $.25 per acre for it, and the money deposited in the treasury at 5 per cent interest, for our benefit. We did not want cows, or horses, or implements, but all the money deposited to our credit. Neither did we want the Santees in the bill, but they are there now. In the treaty of 1868, it does not seem to say it gives twenty years of school, counting from now. I cannot so understand it. Where the money comes from to pay for these schools I do not know. Who pays the expenses of this commission in coming out here? Is the money simply loaned to you, and will be refunded from Indians' money? I am afraid this will touch upon our reserve fund. You also say that when this bill is ratified you will pay Red Cloud for his ponies. If he is entitled to pay for his horses why not pay him anyway? We might accuse you of something. Does the money come from the sale of our lands? You also say, when this bill is ratified, moneys coming from other treaties will come to us. Everything seems to depend upon this treaty. If there is anything coming, why not pay us now? I think those who have signed first, are those who do not understand. For myself, individually, I see nothing in this bill that will induce me to put my name to the treaty. We have considered this matter as well as we could, and it is the conclusion of all you see around here, that there is not much more in this bill than last year, and we cannot accept it.

Governor Foster replied to several questions from Grass, as did Major Warner. They did not attempt to make any speeches, but gave clear and distinct answers to each question. Major Warner, particularly, sought to impress upon the Indians the truth of the matter. His capacity for reaching the hearts and minds of his hearers was brought in full play, and he was listened to with close attention and intelligent interest. The closing words of Governor Foster were:

I ask John Grass and Gall not to come here simply as lawyers, but to commune with the Great Spirit, and be fair, candid, and thoughtful in this matter.

The quality of the opposition at Standing Rock was conceded to be much superior to that met with at the other agencies, being more intelligent and more approachable through the reason, and not through appeals to instinct. The Indians appeared to be in an undecided state of mind.

General Crook replied briefly to Grass, and concluded by telling the Indians that one thing was certain, and that was that Congress would not give any better terms at another time, nor as good. He referred pointedly to the Oklahoma case. Sitting Bull said not a word, but appeared to be an interested listener. A portion of the remarks of John Grass were quite offensive to the general, particularly where, by implication, he intimated the commissioners were paid by Indians' money.

On the 4th of August the bill for signatures was first submitted to the Indians, and John Grass, the hostile speaker, was the first to sign. His change of mind astonished everyone except himself and the commissioners; and Sitting Bull and his party were so indignant that they attempted a stampede in order to break up the council, but General Crook and the agent, McLaughlin, and the Indian police prevented it. Two hundred and eighty signatures were obtained, and the prospects for obtaining the remainder were promising. It was already felt that the treaty fight was almost as good as won.

The full measure of signatures required was secured on Tuesday, the 6th of August, at Standing Rock. While the signing of John Grass had served to turn the scale, the real rush for a place at the clerk's desk where they could touch the pen did not occur until Chief Gall signed. This brought the Blackfeet and Upper and Lower Yanktonnais in, and testified to the influence of this chief. Before nightfall the news had been transmitted to Washington that the treaty had been agreed to by the Indians.

While this gratifying result was in process of being reached there was a scene of discord and confusion and almost a battle caused by the intense rage of Sitting Bull over the turn affairs had taken. It appeared that much valuable work had been done in the numerous Indian camps and bands of a quiet kind. Politicians would call it "on the gum shoe order." One council had been held which proved of the first importance, at which John Grass advised the recognition of the inevitable, and counseled submission and adoption of the treaty, as the best bill likely to be offered.

In direct opposition to Grass was non-progressive Sitting Bull. He went charging through the camps the night of the council, calling upon his people to resist the white man to the last, appealing to them in the name of every memory most dear to the Indian. It was a convincing proof of his declining influence, that the majority of the Indians were no longer heeding his counsel. At the final council on the 6th, just as the signing was about to commence, Sitting Bull and his band mounted on horses, surrounded the council, the angry old chief talking at the top of his voice. Finally he took his place in the center of the circle of chiefs, when Chief Grass arose and said:

I and my friends at the other agencies promised each other not to sign this bill, but as they have now broken their promise, though the price is not enough, I am now willing.

He was followed by Mad Bear and Wolf Necklace to the same effect. Major Warner then told the Indians what the commission would recommend to the Government, as had been done at other agencies.

General Crook followed in a short talk in which he explained that he was in favor of paying the Indians here for their ponies that had been taken from them by the Government, and should not only recommend it but would use his personal influence to bring it about. The ponies were those which the Indians surrendered from time to time when they quit the war path, and were taken from them and sold by the Government and the proceeds applied to their benefit, though they may not have known this. The taking of them with the disarming of them was a peace measure.

After the speeches, the tables were prepared and signatures invited, but before any names were taken, Sitting Bull entered the circle and wanted to talk, but was not allowed to do so, General Crook telling him he came too late. Upon this Bull retired in sullen anger. John Grass then came forward and touched the pen, after which Mad Bear and Big Head signed. Just at this point came the most startling occurrence of the entire summer among the Indians. Sitting Bull made a determined effort to break up the council by ordering his young men to surround the circle of Indians, in the center of which sat or stood the chiefs favorable to the bill. His band, mounted on their ponies, made a dash at the crowd, scattering them right and left. Quite a panic ensued among the whites, many of whom had assembled upon the upper platform.

Father Croft of the Catholic mission then interposed and called on the young men of the St. Joseph societies to sign the agreement. He touched the pen as a signal and they quickly followed and began to sign. He then called on Sitting Bull's party to leave him and join in signing, and 200 signed at once. Failing in permanently dispersing the Indians who wanted to sign the bill, the hostile band went to the rear of the long warehouse, in front of which the signing took place, and through which the Indians passed after signing. It was evident that their intention was to maltreat those who had signed, but a strong force of police was soon stationed there, upon which Sitting Bull and his entire band departed, convinced that his influence was no longer a power among his people. After this Bear Face, Dear Heart, Fire Heart, with their bands to the number of about four hundred, came forward and touched the pen.

Chief John Grass, one of the friendly leaders at Standing Rock, said that he did not think the Indians were getting enough for their land, but when they found out that the Indians at the other agencies had signed, he advised his people to do the same. Speaking of Sitting Bull's influence, Grass said:

There is one big log in our way, and that is Sitting Bull. He is utterly worthless to us and keeps us back more than he helps us on. He is of no consequence to us, and if the whites think so much of him they had better come and get him. He never was a chief, and is always noisy and making trouble. He has gathered around him a band of bad men having no idea of civilization, and all he seems to want is notoriety. He has not only opposed the present treaty, but always has opposed civilization, and always will be a troublesome man to get along with. I think the Government ought to take him way off and keep him in prison away from these Indians. His influence is very bad. The Government should at once remove him from the reservation. We will not be able to make any progress towards civilization while he is permitted to stay here. It is better to send one man away than that the whole nation should suffer by being kept back.

The commissioners' labors in procuring signers came to a successful conclusion at Standing Rock, and when that work was concluded each member of the commission made an appropriate speech to the Indians and assured them that they had done wisely. General Crook made the most timely of these addresses. He said to the Indians:

Since you have left the war path and joined the procession, you must keep up with it. Every step makes the next one easier. You must keep on step by step until the color line disappears and we are all one people. Struggle, strive, and work, and when in doubt ask advice of some one whom you know to be your friend. I know no one better fitted to give you advice than your present agent, whom you know will give you good advice only for your best good. Listen always to his words. I may never meet you again, but I shall always think of you kindly.

Sitting Bull left for his camp on Grand River and did not sign. He had never signed a treaty and had resolved he never would. He was faithful to this determination to the last.

The treaty was now almost as good as made. There would be no further action by Congress required. The commission would make up their report which would be submitted to the President, and he was authorized, if he found it complied with the law of Congress, to issue his proclamation declaring the ceded portion of the reservation opened to settlement by homesteaders.

The homestead, pre-emption and timber culture laws were not applicable to the lands embraced in this cession but a modified homestead law only. There is but one form of entry, that of homestead, permitted, and the law requires the settler to occupy his 160 acre claim five years when he will be permitted to prove up on it and pay the Government $1.25 an acre for it. The land had not been surveyed but would be immediately following the President's proclamation.

The domain opened to settlement embraced that part of Hettinger County lying southwest of the Cannon Ball River, all of the counties of Martin, Choteau, Wagner, Rinehart, Delano, Scobey, Stanley and Nowlin. All of the counties of Presho and Pyatt, lying north of White River, and a line drawn from the mouth of Pass Creek to the mouth of Rapid Creek, all of Ziebach County north of a line drawn from the mouth of Pass Creek to the mouth of Rapid Creek, all of the County of Sterling lying south of Cheyenne River, all of Lyman County but about three townships in the southwest corner, all of the triangular strip lying between the Missouri and Niobrara rivers east of the 99th meridian of longitude excepting the old Ponca Reservation. This is made upon the probability that the Lower Brules will select land south of White River. If they should not their reservation will occupy the north half of Presho County and the southeast corner of Stanley County. The tract ceded, in round numbers was estimated at nine million acres.

The commission then made their report to the President, and his proclamation opening the reserve follows:

OPENING THE RESERVE

President Harrison issued his proclamation, declaring that portion of the Big Sioux Reservation which had been treated for, opened to settlement forthwith, under the provisions of the treaty or agreement, which he explained at some length, as follows:

Executive Mansion, Washington, D. C., Feb. 10, 1880.

Now, therefore, I, Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States, by virtue of the power invested in me, do hereby make known and proclaim the acceptance of said act by the different bands of the Sioux Nation of Indians, and the consent thereto by them, as required by the said act, and said act is hereby declared to be in full force and effect, subject to all provisions, conditions, limitations and restrictions therein contained. All persons will take notice of the provisions of said act and the provisions, limitations and restrictions therein contained, and be governed accordingly.

I furthermore notify all persons to particularly observe that by said act certain tracts or portions of the great reservation of the Sioux Nation in the Territory of Dakota, are set apart as separate and permanent reservations for Indians receiving rations and annuities at the respective agencies therein named.

That any Indian receiving and entitled to rations and annuities at any of the agencies mentioned in this act at the time the same shall take effect, but residing upon any portion of said great reservation not included in either of the separate reservations herein established, may, at his option, within one year from the time when this act shall take effect, and within one year after having been notified of his said right of option in such manner as the secretary of the interior shall direct, by recording his election with the proper agent at the agency to which he belongs, have an allotment to which he would be otherwise entitled, on one of the said separate reservations upon the land where such Indians may then reside.

That each member of the Ponca tribe of Indians, now occupying a part of the old Ponca Reservation, shall be entitled to allotment upon said old Ponca Reservation, in the quantity herein set forth, and when allotments to the Ponca tribe of Indians, and to such other Indians as allotments are provided for by this act, shall have been made upon that portion of the reservation which is described in the act entitled "An act to extend the northern boundary of the State of Nebraska," approved March 28, 1882, the President shall, in pursuance of said act, declare the Indian title extinguished to all lands described in said act not so allotted hereunder, and thereupon all of said land not so allotted and included in said act of March 28, 1882, shall be open to settlement as provided in this act.

Protection is guaranteed to such Indians as may have taken allotments either within or without said separate reservations under the provisions of the treaty with the great Sioux Nation, concluded April 20, 1868, and provision is made in said act for the release of all title on the part of said Indians receiving rations and annuities on each separate reservation, to the lands described in each of the other separate reservations, and to confirm in the Indians entitled to receive rations at each separate reservation respectively their separate and exclusive use and benefit to all title and interest of every name and nature secured to the different bands of the Sioux Nation by said treaty of April 20, 1868, and said release shall not affect the title of any individual Indian to his separate reservation, nor any agreement heretofore made with the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company, or Dakota Central Railroad Company.

It is therein provided that if any land in the said great Sioux Reservation is occupied and used by any religious society at the date of said act for the purpose of missionary or educational work among the same, not exceeding 160 acres in the tract, shall be granted to said society, subject to the conditions and limitations of said act.

It is therein provided that all lands in the great Sioux Reservation described in the said act, except the American Island, Farm Island, and Niobrara, regarding which islands special provisions are made, and sections 16 and 36 in each township thereof (which are reserved for school purposes), shall be disposed of by the United States, upon the terms, at the price, and in the manner therein set forth, to actual settlers only, under the provisions of the homestead law (except section 2301 thereof), and under the law relating to townsites.

Persons who, in good faith, and being legally entitled to do so, entered upon or made settlements with the intent to enter the same under the homestead or preemption laws of the United States upon the Crow Creek or Winnebago reservations under the President's proclamation of February 27, 1885, shall, for a period of ninety days after the proclamation of the President, have a right to reenter upon said claims and procure title thereto under the homestead or pre-emption laws of the United States, and complete the same as required therein, and said claims shall for such time have preference over later entries. Provided, that the pre-emption claimants shall reside on their lands the same length of time before procuring title as the homestead claimants, under the act. The price to be paid for town-site entries shall be such as is required by law in other cases, and shall be paid into the general fund provided for by the act.

The proclamation of the President further draws attention to the "preservation from entry or settlement of the land occupied by the agency and school buildings at Lower Brule and Cheyenne River agencies, and also a tract of land situated in Nebraska, beginning at a point on the boundary line between Nebraska and Dakota where the range line between ranges 44 and 45, west of the 6th principal meridian in Dakota, intersects the boundary line; thence east along said boundary line five miles; thence due south five miles; thence due west ten miles; thence due north to said boundary line; thence due east along said boundary line to the place of beginning. The same is continued in a state of reservation so long as it may be needed for the use and protection of Indians receiving rations and annuities at Pine Ridge Agency."

The conclusion of the proclamation is in these words:

Warning is also hereby expressly given to all persons, not to enter or make settlement upon any tracts of land especially reserved by the terms of said act, or by this proclamation, or any portion of any tract of land to which any individual member, either of the bands of the great Sioux Nation or the Ponca tribe, shall have preference right under the provisions of said act; and further, to in no wise interfere with the occupancy of any of said tracts by any of the said Indians, or in any manner to disturb, molest or prevent, a peaceful possession of said tracts by them. The surveys required to be made of the lands restored to the public domain under the provisions of said act, and in this proclamation set forth, will be commenced and executed as early as possible.

For some time prior to the promulgation of the President's proclamation, troops had been stationed at Fort Pierre and opposite Chamberlain to maintain order and preserve the peace among the large number of people who had gathered on the border line of the reservation awaiting the signal to enter. The troops at Fort Pierre found much active employment, the most reckless of the proposed settlers being in that quarter, while at Chamberlain a more orderly quality of citizenship was observed. Finally the word came to the military authorities that the proclamation opening the old reserve to occupation and settlement, had been issued, the word went forth, and as the waters break through a crevasse in the lower Mississippi levees in times of flood, so poured across the Missouri and spread abroad upon the prairies, the thousands, many of whom had been waiting for months for this privilege. Selections of a location had been made previously by many hundreds who carried their plats with them and went direct to their claim. The soldiers quietly withdrew and while the inpouring of the waiting settlers might be called a rush, it was attended by fewer lawless incidents than occur at similar occasions elsewhere, and aside from its general confusion and novelty was attended by no vicious conduct or lawlessness. Thus was this, the last formidable citadel of barbarism and savagery, in the vast Dakota domain as established by Congress in 1861, peacefully relinquished by its presumed aboriginal occupants and owners by right of the prevailing wise law of civilized nations, and passed into the possession of a nation conceded to be in the forefront of modern civilization and the leader in all the laudable pursuits which characterize the humane, but aggressive ambition of the American people.

A possible mistake was made when the Senate declined to ratify the earliest agreement on the ground that the signatures of three-fourths of the adult males had not been secured as required by the treaty of 1868. That treaty had been practically superceded and annulled by the agreement under which the Black Hills had been secured in 1876. In that agreement no effort was made to secure the signatures of any of the people of the various tribes except the chiefs and headmen. This precedent the Edmunds commission was governed by. At the time it was satisfactory to the Indians, and fully guarded their interests. It was an honest agreement, with the welfare of the Indians its first purpose.

The delay, caused by the failure to ratify by the Senate, gave an opportunity to stir up a feeling of discontent and dissatisfaction among the Indians, which was improved by white people with poor judgment but with good intentions, and white people with selfish motives. The Indians were shown that they were not receiving as much for their land as they should receive—that the Government proposed to buy for 50 cents an acre, and sell for $1.25 an acre, and as this was easily stated and as easily proven, the Indians were easily convinced they were being cheated and then began the difficulty of arranging satisfactory terms with them, which terms, according to the position taken by the Senate, must be agreed to and signed by three-fourths of all the adult male Indians of the Sioux nation except the Yanktons and Sissetons.

Nearly eight years were passed in futile efforts to reach another agreement, and in the end the Indians received no more substantial help practically, than would have been theirs under the first; eight years of valuable time during which the Indians would have made some progress in their industrial pursuits upon which they were prepared to enter in earnest. They would have advanced some steps forward in civilization during this time, and enjoyed the helpful terms of the new treaty which would have been a great boon to their young and middle-aged men and women, as well as to the children.

Eight years is about one-fourth of the best of the active life of the great majority of civilized peoples, and pupils of our common schools obtain the most valuable portion of their education during that period. The money value of the land was a very unimportant matter, in the making of this agreement, to the Government and to the white people. The object primarily was to benefit the Indians by clearing away the obstacles to their advancement in civilization. The sale of the land at four-fold the price allowed, with a stipulation that the actual money should be paid to the Indians, which was the contention of many, would have led to the greatest calamity that ever befell these benighted people. They would have squandered the money and would have had nothing to show for it except a worse moral and industrial condition than when they received it, hence it had long been the policy of the Government to provide that payments should be principally in such articles as would assist the savage to a more rational mode of living.

The history of Indian treaty-making will show that the Government has not purchased land from the Indians at a certain price per acre, nor has even stipulated how many acres there were to be in the grant of land secured. The tract proposed to be ceded was described by metes and bounds, with reference to permanent natural objects for boundaries, while the consideration therefor would be stated in round numbers at so many million dollars, to be paid in certain food supplies, goods, wares and merchandise, and a small moiety in cash to each Indian annually. In later treaties, and particularly in the one now contemplated, the Government designed that the payment should be composed of a kind and character that would promote the civilization of the Indian, and turn him altogether away from his barbarous customs and pursuits. If he conformed in good faith to the spirit and letter of his agreement, the Government, as a matter of duty and good policy, would always stand ready to foster and encourage him in his efforts, not taking particular account whether it was expending just the amount it had agreed to pay, so that it was certain to be enough and a little more than the compact demanded. It was not a wise step, in this instance, for the Government to abandon its old-time policy, and resort to the civilized method of buying the land at a stipulated price per acre. The Indian was then easily convinced that he had in the past made some very simple-minded bargains, and that the Great Father had taken an unfair advantage of his benighted and unsophisticated ward. But possibly civilization itself should be charged with the responsibility for the changed and more enlightened attitude of the red man.

Ordinarily a measure relating to an Indian treaty would have passed Congress almost unobserved, or rather attracting little attention except from the Indian committees, but this Sioux treaty proposition had now been before the congressional bodies for over seven years, and all the attempts at securing an agreement with the Indians under the laws enacted, had resulted in failure. As a result, too, the members of Congress had become acquainted with many of the details, which before they had treated with indifference, and there had come to be a general interest felt in the matter, and quite a diversity of opinion. The reader is presumed to be aware that there was never wanting an influential lobby influence in Washington, which regarded the interests of the Indians as of a semi-sacred character, needing the watchful guardianship of disinterested friends to secure to the Indians their rights, and thus far the various measures proposed had not met the approval of these people. Some were opposed to any treaty whatever, and others insisted that the Indians had not been offered enough for their lands. (This was also the Indian view.) With the accession of Mr. Cleveland the Indian Rights Association appeared to have gained a reinforcement, and it was said that there was an increasing sentiment which opposed taking any more land from the aboriginal races. That because of their customs and mode of life, they needed a large body of land to roam over and secure game to supplement the scanty rations supplied by the Government.

The Indians had watched the course of the Government, and they had concluded that they could get a better price for their land than any that had been offered, and they were not disposed to act toward the Government with any benevolent motives. The alternative, should they refuse a reasonable offer, that was most dreaded by them was that the Government should enact a law to take the land needed as a matter of necessity, and pay the Indians, or rather indemnify the Indians by granting them reasonable payment for it in such articles of use as was considered conducive to their welfare and needs, and this procedure was not lacking in advocates. The points of difference had been on the part of the Indians, connected with their compensation for their lands, and it must be apparent to the reader that the Sioux had made remarkable progress as bargainers and financiers since the reader first met them on the North Platte in 1855. It was worth a great deal to the Government to know that its Indian wards were advancing on some of the lines of civilization they had been instructed in.

The agreement that was finally successful was the bill known as the Dawes-Gifford bill, though evidently produced from the suggestions of all the interested parties, including the Indians. It was a composite measure. It contained the important provisions of the Pettigrew bill of 1881-2; but as the projected treaty remained in suspense so long a time and met with repeated failures from various causes, its friends were able to discover the places that needed strengthening, and realized the wisdom and advantage of adding some entirely new features. The result was a measure that embodied every important point needed for the protection of the principal beneficiaries, the Indians, with provision for his needs for a half century to come. Also protection and restriction of railway interests, protection of the whites, and protection of the Government from designing persons. It was undoubtedly a measure of equal importance to South Dakota with statehood which came as its companion. The law has met every requirement and has fulfilled all reasonable expectations, and is given in full herewith. Its important provisions extend into the future for half a century:

THE TREATY

An Act to divide a portion of the Reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota, into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Section 1. That the following tract of land, being a part of the great reservation of the Sioux Nation, in the Territory of Dakota, is hereby set apart as a permanent reservation for the Indians receiving rations and annuities at the Pine Ridge Agency, in the Territory of Dakota, namely: Beginning at the intersection of the 103d meridian of longitude with the northern boundary of the State of Nebraska; thence north on said meridian to the south fork of Cheyenne River, and down said stream to the mouth of Battle Creek; thence due east to White River; thence down White River to Black Pipe Creek on White River; thence due south to the said north line of the State of Nebraska; thence west on said north line to the place of beginning. Also the following tract of land situate in the State of Nebraska, namely: Beginning at a point on the boundary line between the State of Nebraska and the Territory of Dakota where the range line between ranges 44 and 45 west of the 6th principal meridian, in the Territory of Dakota, intersects said boundary line; thence east along said boundary line five miles; thence due south five miles; thence due west ten miles; thence due north to said boundary line; thence due east along said boundary line to the place of beginning. Provided, that the said tract of land in the State of Nebraska shall be reserved, by Executive order only so long as it may be needed for the use and protection of the Indians receiving rations and annuities at the Pine Ridge Agency.

Sec. 2. That the following tract of land, being a part of the said great reservation of the Sioux Nation, in the Territory of Dakota, is hereby set apart for a permanent reservation for the Indians receiving rations and annuities at the Rosebud Agency, in said Territory of Dakota, namely: Commencing in the middle channel of the main channel of the Missouri River at the intersection of the south line of Brule County; thence down said middle of the main channel of said river to the intersection of the 90th degree of west longitude from Greenwich; thence due south to the 43d parallel of latitude; thence west along said parallel to a point due south from the mouth of Black Pipe Creek; thence due north to the mouth of Black Pipe Creek; thence down White River to a point intersecting the west line of Gregory County extended north; thence south on said extended west line of Gregory County to the intersection of the south line of Brule County extended west; thence due east on said south line of Brule County extended to the point of beginning in the Missouri River, including entirely within said reservation, all islands, if any, in said river.

Sec. 3. That the following tract of land, being a part of the said reservation of the Sioux Nation, in the Territory of Dakota, is hereby set apart as a permanent reservation for the Indians receiving rations and annuities at the Standing Rock Agency, in the said Territory of Dakota, namely: Beginning at a point in the center of the main channel of the Missouri River opposite the mouth of Cannon Ball River; thence down said center of the main channel to a point ten miles north of the mouth of the Moreau River, including also within said reservation, all islands, if any, in said river; thence due west to the 102d degree of west longitude from Greenwich; thence north along said meridian to its intersection with the south branch of Cannon Ball River, also known as Cedar Creek; thence down said south branch of Cannon Ball River to its intersection with the main Cannon Ball River; and down said main Cannon Ball River to the center of the main channel of the Missouri River at the place of beginning.

Sec. 4. That the following tract of land, being a part of the great Sioux Reservation of the Sioux Nation, in the Territory of Dakota, is hereby set apart as a permanent reservation for the Indians receiving rations and annuities at the Cheyenne River Agency, in the said Territory of Dakota, namely: Beginning at a point in the center of the main channel of the Missouri River ten miles north of the Moreau River, said point being the southeasterly corner of the Standing Rock Reservation; thence down the said center of the main channel of the Missouri River, including also entirely within said reservation all islands, if any, in said river, to a point opposite the mouth of the Cheyenne River; thence west to the Cheyenne River, and up the same to its intersection with the 102d meridian of longitude, thence north along said meridian to its intersection with a line due west from a point in the Missouri River ten miles north of the mouth of the Moreau River; thence due west to the place of beginning.

Sec. 5. The following tract of land, being a part of the said great reservation of the Sioux Nation, in the Territory of Dakota, is hereby set apart for a permanent reservation for the Indians receiving rations and annuities at the Lower Brule Agency, in the Territory of Dakota, namely: Beginning on the Missouri River at Old Fort George, thence running due west to the western boundary of Presho County; thence running south on said western boundary to the 44th degree of latitude; thence on said 44th degree of latitude to the western boundary of township No. 72; thence south on said township western line to an intersecting line running due west from Fort Lookout; thence eastwardly on said line to the center of the main channel of the Missouri River at Fort Lookout; thence north in the center of the main channel of the said river to the original starting point.

Sec. 6. That the following tract of land, being a part of the great Sioux Reservation, in the Territory of Dakota, is hereby set apart as a permanent reservation for the Indians receiving rations and annuities at the Crow Creek Agency, in the Territory of Dakota, namely: The whole of township 106, range 70; township 107, range 71; township 108, range 71; township 108, range 72; township 109, range 72; and the south half of township 109, range 71; and all except sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 9, 10, 11 and 12, of township 107, range 70, and such parts as lie on the east or west banks of the Missouri River, of the following townships, to-wit: Township 106, range 71; township 107, range 72; township 108, range 73; township 108, range 74; township 108, range 75; township 108, range 76; township 109, range 73; township 109, range 74; south half of township 109, range 75; and township 107, range 73; and also the west half of township 106, range 69; and sections 10, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32 and 33 of township 107, range 60.

Sec. 7. Each member of the Santee Sioux tribe of Indians, now occupying a reservation in the State of Nebraska, shall be entitled to allotments upon said reserve in Nebraska, as follows: To each head of a family one quarter of a section; to each single person over eighteen years of age, one-eighth of a section; to each orphan child under eighteen years, one-eighth of a section; to each other person under eighteen years of age now living, one-sixteenth of a section, with title thereto, in accordance with the provisions of article 6 of the treaty concluded April 20, 1868, and the agreement with said Santee Sioux approved February 28, 1877, and rights under the same in all other respects conforming to this act. And said Santee Sioux shall be entitled to all benefits under this act in the same manner and with the same conditions as if they were residents upon the said Sioux Reservation, receiving rations at one of the agencies herein named. Provided, that all allotments heretofore made to said Santee Sioux in Nebraska are hereby ratified and confirmed; and each member of the Flandreau band of Sioux Indians is hereby authorized to take allotments on the Great Sioux Reservation, or in lieu thereof shall be paid at the rate of $1.00 an acre for the land to which they would be entitled, to be paid out of the proceeds of lands relinquished under this act, which shall be used under the direction of the secretary of the interior; and said Flandreau band of Sioux Indians is in all other respects entitled to the benefits of this act the same as if receiving rations and annuities at any of the agencies aforesaid.

Sec. 8. That the President is hereby authorized and required, whenever in his opinion any reservation of such Indians, or any part thereof is advantageous for agricultural or grazing purposes, and the progress in civilization of the Indians receiving rations on either or any of said reservations shall be such as to encourage the belief that an allotment in severalty to such Indians, or any of them, would be for the best interests of such Indians, to cause such reservation, or so much thereof as is necessary, to be surveyed, or re-surveyed, and to allot the lands in such reservation in severalty, to the Indians located thereon as aforesaid, in quantities, as follows: To each head of a family, 320 acres; to each single person over eighteen years of age, one-fourth of a section; to each orphan child under eighteen years of age, one-fourth of a section; and to each other person under eighteen years now living, or who may be born prior to the date of the order of the President directing an allotment of the lands embraced in any reservation, one-eighth of a section. In case there is not sufficient land in either of said reservations to allot lands to each individual of the classes above named in quantities as above provided, the lands embraced in such reservation or reservations shall be allotted to each individual of each of said classes pro rata in accordance with the provision of this act. Provided, that where the lands on any reservation are mainly valuable for grazing purposes, an additional allotment of such grazing lands, in quantities as above provided, shall be made to each individual, or in case any two or more Indians who may be entitled to allotments, shall so agree, the President may assign the grazing lands, to which they may be entitled, to them in one tract, and to be held and used in common.

Sec. 9. That all allotments set apart under the provisions of this act shall be selected by the Indians, heads of families selecting for their minor children, and the agents shall select for each orphan child, and in such manner as to embrace the improvements of the Indians making the selection. Where the improvements of two or more Indians have been made on the same legal subdivision of land, unless they shall otherwise agree, a provisional line may be run dividing said lands between them, and the amount to which each is entitled shall be equalized in the assignment of the remainder of the land to which they are entitled under the provisions of this act. Provided, that if anyone entitled to an allotment shall fail to make a selection within five years after the President shall direct that allotments may be made on a particular reservation, the secretary of the interior may direct the agent of such tribe or band, if such there be, and if there be no agent, then a special agent appointed for that purpose, to make a selection for such Indian, which selection shall be allotted as in cases where selections are made by the Indians, and patents shall issue in like manner. Provided, that these sections as to the allotment shall not be compulsory without the consent of the majority of the adult members of the tribe, except that the allotments shall be made as provided for the orphans.

Sec. 10. That the allotments provided for in this act shall be made by special agents appointed by the President for such purpose, and the agents in charge of the respective reservations on which the allotments are directed to be made, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may from time to time prescribe, and shall be certified by such agents to the commissioner of Indian affairs, in duplicate, one copy to be retained in the Indian office and the other to be transmitted to the secretary of the interior for his action, and to be deposited in the general land office.

Sec. 11. That upon the approval of the allotments provided for in this act, by the secretary of the interior, he shall cause patents to issue therefor in the name of the allottees, which patents shall be of the legal effect, and declare that the United States does and will hold the land thus allotted, for the period of twenty-five years, in trust for the sole use and benefit of the Indian to whom such allotment shall have been made or, in case of his decease, to his heirs according to the laws of the state or territory where such land is located, and that at the expiration of such period, the United States will convey the same by patent to said Indian, or his heirs as aforesaid, in fee, discharged of said trust and free of all charge or incumbrance whatsoever, and patents shall issue accordingly. And each and every allottee under this act shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges and be subject to all the provisions of section 6 of the act approved February 8, 1887, entitled, "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the territories over the Indians, and for other purposes," provided, that the President of the United States may, in any case, in his discretion, extend the period by a term not exceeding ten years; and if any lease or conveyance shall be made of the lands set apart and allotted as herein provided, or any contract made touching the same, before the expiration of the time above mentioned, such lease, or conveyance, or contract shall be absolutely null and void; provided further, that the law of descent and partition in force in the state or territory where the lands may be situated shall apply thereto after patents therefor have been executed and delivered. Each of the patents aforesaid shall be recorded in the general land office and afterwards delivered, free of charge, to the allottee entitled thereto.

Sec. 12. That at any time after lands have been allotted to all the Indians of any tribe as herein provided, or sooner, if in the opinion of the President it shall be for the best interests of said tribe, it shall be lawful for the secretary of the interior to negotiate with such Indian tribe for the purchase and release by said tribe, in conformity with the treaty or statute under which such reservation is held, of such portions of its reservation not allotted as such tribe shall, from time to time, consent to sell, on such terms and conditions as shall be considered just and equitable between the United States and said tribe of Indians, which purchase shall not be complete until ratified by Congress; provided, however, that all lands adapted to agriculture, with or without irrigation, so sold or released to the United States by any Indian tribe shall be held by the United States for the sole purpose of securing homes to actual settlers, and shall be disposed of by the United States to actual and bona fide settlers only in tracts, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres to any one person, on such terms as Congress shall prescribe, subject to grants which Congress may make in aid of education; and provided further, that no patents shall issue therefor except to the person so taking the same as and for a homestead, or his heirs, and after the expiration of five years occupancy thereof as such homestead; and any conveyance of said lands so taken as a homestead, or any contract touching the same, or lien thereon, created prior to the date of such patent, shall be null and void. And the sums agreed to be paid by the United States as purchase money for any portion of any such reservation shall be held in the Treasury of the United States for the sole use of the tribe or tribes of Indians to whom such reservation belonged; and the same, with interest thereon at five per centum per annum, shall be at all times subject to appropriation by Congress for the education and civilization of such tribe or tribes of Indians or the members thereof. The patents aforesaid shall be recorded in the general land office, and afterward delivered, free of charge, to the allottee entitled thereto.

Sec. 13. That any Indian receiving and entitled to rations and annuities at either of the agencies mentioned in this act at the time the same shall take effect, but residing upon any portion of said great Sioux reservation not included in either of the separate reservations herein established, may, at his option, within one year from the time when this act shall take effect, and within one year after he has been notified of his right of said option in such manner as the secretary of the interior shall direct, by recording his election with the proper agent at the agency to which he belongs, having the allotment to which he would be otherwise entitled on one of said separate reservations upon the land where such Indians may then reside, such allotment in all other respects to conform to the allotments hereinbefore provided.

Each member of the Ponca tribe of Indians now occupying a part of the old Ponca reservation, within the limits of the Great Sioux reservation, shall be entitled to allotments upon said old Ponca reservation as follows: To each head of a family, 320 acres; to each single person over eighteen years of age, one-fourth of a section; to each orphan child under eighteen years of age, one-fourth of a section; and to each other person under eighteen years of age, now living, one-eighth of a section, with title thereto and rights under the same in all other respects conforming to this act. And said Poncas shall be entitled to all other benefits under this act in the same manner and with the same conditions as if they were a part of the Sioux Nation receiving rations at one of the agencies herein named.

When the allotments to the Ponca tribe of Indians and to such other Indians as allotments are provided for by this act shall have been made upon that portion of said reservation which is described in the act entitled, "An act to extend the northern boundary of the State of Nebraska," approved March 28, 1882, the President shall, in pursuance of said act, declare that the Indian title is extinguished to all lands described in said act not so allotted hereunder, and thereupon all of said land not so allotted and included in said act of March 28, 1882, shall be open to settlement as provided in this act, provided, that the allotments to Poncas and other Indians authorized by this act to be made upon the land described in the said act entitled, "An act to extend the northern boundary of the State of Nebraska," shall be made within six months from the time this act shall take effect.

Sec. 14. That in cases where the use of water for irrigation is necessary to render the lands within any Indian reservation available for agricultural purposes, the secretary of the interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary to secure a just and equal distribution thereof among the Indians residing upon any such reservation, and no other appropriation or grant of water by any riparian proprietor shall be authorized or permitted to the damage of any other riparian proprietor.

Sec. 15. That if any Indian has, under and in conformity with the provisions of the treaty with the Great Sioux Nation concluded April 29, 1868, and proclaimed by the President February 24, 1869, or an existing law, taken allotments of land within or without the limits of any of the separate reservations established by this act, such allotments are hereby ratified and made valid, and such Indian is entitled to a patent therefor in conformity with the provisions of said treaty and existing law and of the provisions of this act in relation to patents for individual allotments.

Sec. 16. That the acceptance of this act by the Indians in manner and form as required by the said treaty concluded between the different bands of the Sioux Nation of Indians and the United States, April 29, 1868, and proclaimed by the President February 24, 1869, as hereinafter provided, shall be taken and held to be a release of all title on the part of the Indians receiving rations and annuities on each of the said separate reservations to the lands described in each of the other separate reservations so created, and shall be held to confirm in the Indians entitled to receive rations at each of said separate reservations respectively, to their separate and exclusive use and benefit, all the title and interest of every name and nature secured therein to the different bands of the Sioux Nation by said treaty of April 29, 1868. This release shall not affect the title of any individual Indian to his separate allotment on land not included in any of said separate reservations provided for in this act, which title is hereby confirmed, nor any agreement heretofore made with the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company or the Dakota Central Railroad Company for a right of way through said reservation, and for any lands acquired by any such agreement to be used in connection therewith, except as hereinafter provided; but the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company and the Dakota Central Railroad Company shall, respectively, have the right to take and use, prior to any white person, and to any corporation, the right of way provided for in any such agreements, with not to exceed twenty acres of land in addition to the right of way, for stations for every ten miles of road; and said companies shall also, respectively, have the right to take and use for right of way, sidetrack, depot, and station privileges, machine shop, freight house, roundhouse, and yard facilities, prior to any white person, and to any corporation or association, so much of the two separate sections of land embraced in said agreements; also, the former company so much of the 188 acres, and the latter company so much of the seventy-five acres, on the east side of the Missouri River, likewise embraced in said agreements, as the secretary of the interior shall decide to have been agreed upon and paid for by said railroad, and to be reasonably necessary upon each side of said river for the approaches to the bridge of each of said companies to be constructed across the river, for right of way, sidetrack, depot and station privileges, machine shop, freight house, roundhouse and yard facilities, and no more; provided, that the said railway companies shall have made the payments according to the terms of said agreements for each mile of right of way and each acre of land for railway purposes which said companies take and use under the provisions of this act, and shall satisfy the secretary of the interior to that effect; provided further, that no part of the lands herein authorized to be taken shall be sold or conveyed except by way of sale or mortgage of the railway itself. Nor shall any of said lands be used directly or indirectly for townsite purposes, it being the intention hereof that said lands shall be held for general railway uses and purposes only, including stock-yards, warehouses, elevators, terminal and other facilities of and for said railways; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any such railroad company from building upon such lands houses for the accommodation or residence of their employes, or leasing grounds contiguous to its tracks for warehouse or elevator purposes connected with said railways; and provided further, that said payments shall be made and said conditions performed within six months after this act shall take effect; and provided further, that said railway companies and each of them shall, within nine months after this act takes effect, definitely locate their said lines of road, including all station grounds and terminals across and upon the land of said reservation designated in said agreements, and shall also, within the said period of nine months, file with the secretary of the interior a map of such definite location, specifying clearly the line of the road, the several station grounds, and the amount of land required for railway purposes, as herein specified, of the said separate sections of land and said tracts of 188 acres and seventy-five acres, and the secretary of the interior shall, within three months after the filing of such map, designate the particular portions of said sections and of said tracts of land which the said railway companies respectively may take and hold under the provisions of this act for railway purposes. And the said railway companies and each of them shall, within three years after this act takes effect, construct, complete and put in operation their said lines of road; and in case the said lines of road are not definitely located and maps of location filed within the periods heretofore provided, or in case the said lines of road are not constructed, completed and put in operation within the time herein provided, then, and in either case, the lands granted for right of way, station grounds or other railway purposes, as in this act provided, shall, without any further act or ceremony, be declared by proclamation of the President forfeited, and shall, without entry or further action on the part of the United States, revert to the United States and be subject to entry under the other provisions of this act; and whenever such forfeiture occurs the secretary of the interior shall ascertain the fact and give due notice thereof to the local land officers, and thereupon the lands so forfeited shall be open to homestead entry under the provisions of this act.

Sec. 17. That it is hereby enacted that the seventh article of the said treaty of April 29, 1868, securing to said Indians the benefits of education, subject to such modifications as Congress shall deem most effective to secure to said Indians equivalent benefits of such education, shall continue in force for twenty years from and after the time that this act shall take effect; and the secretary of the interior is hereby authorized and directed to purchase, from time to time, for the use of said Indians such and so many American breeding cows of good quality, not exceeding twenty-five thousand in number, and bulls of like quality, not exceeding one thousand in number, as in his judgment can be, under regulations furnished by him, cared for and preserved, with their increase, by said Indians; provided, that each head of a family or single person over the age of eighteen years, who shall have or may hereafter take his or her allotment of land in severalty, shall be provided with two milk cows, one pair of oxen, with yoke and chain, or two mares and one set of harness in lieu of said oxen, yoke and chain, as the secretary of the interior may deem advisable, and they shall also receive one plow, one wagon, one harrow, one hoe, one axe, and one pitchfork, all suitable to the work they may have to do, and also $50 in cash, to be expended under the direction of the secretary of the interior in aiding such Indians to erect a house and other buildings suitable for a residence or the improvement of his allotment; no sales, barter, or bargains shall be made by any person other than said Indians with each other, or of any of the personal property heretofore provided for, and any violation of this provision shall be deemed a misdemeanor and punished by fine not exceeding one hundred dollars or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both in the discretion of the court. That for two years the necessary seeds shall be provided to plant five acres of ground into different crops, if so much can be used, and provided that in the purchase of such seed preference shall be given to Indians who may have raised the same for sale, and so much money as shall be necessary for this purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated; and in addition thereto there shall be set apart, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000,000, which said sum shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Sioux Nation of Indians as a permanent fund, the interest of which, at five per centum per annum, shall be appropriated, under the direction of the secretary of the interior, to the use of the Indians receiving rations and annuities upon the reservations created by this act in proportion to the numbers that shall so receive rations and annuities at the time this act takes effect, as follows: One-half of said interest shall be so expended for the promotion of industrial and other suitable education among said Indians, and the other half thereof in such manner and for such purposes, including reasonable cash payments per capita, as in the judgment of said secretary shall, from time to time, most contribute to the advancement of said Indians in civilization and self-support; and the Santee Sioux the Flandreau Sioux and the Ponca Indians shall be included in the benefits of said permanent fund, as provided in sections 7 and 13 of this act; provided, that after the Government has been reimbursed for the money expended for said Indians under the provisions of this act, the secretary of the interior may, in his discretion, expend, in addition to the interest of the permanent fund, not to exceed ten per centum per annum of the principal of said fund in the employment of farmers and in the purchase of agricultural implements, teams, seeds, including reasonable cash payments per capita, and other articles necessary to assist them in agricultural pursuits, and he shall report to Congress in detail each year his doings hereunder. And at the end of fifty years for the passage of this act said fund shall be expended for the purpose of promoting education, civilization and self-support among said Indians, or otherwise distributed among them as Congress shall from time to time hereafter determine.

Sec. 18. That if any land in said great Sioux reservation is now occupied and used by any religious society for the purpose of missionary or educational work among said Indians, whether situate outside of or within the lines of any reservation constituted by this act, or if any such land is so occupied upon the Santee Sioux reservation, in Nebraska, the exclusive occupation and use of said land, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres in any one tract, is hereby, with the approval of the secretary of the interior, granted to any such regularly incorporated society so long as the same shall be occupied and used by such society for educational and missionary work among said Indians, and the secretary of the interior is hereby authorized and directed to give to such religious society a patent of such tract of land to the legal effect aforesaid, and for the purpose of such educational or missionary work, any such society may purchase, upon any of the reservations herein created, any land not exceeding in any one tract one hundred and sixty acres, not interfering with the title in severalty of any Indian and with the approval of and upon such terms, not exceeding one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre, as shall be prescribed by the secretary of the interior. And the Santee Normal Training School may, in like manner, purchase for such educational or missionary work on the Santee reservation, in addition to the foregoing, in such location and quantity, not exceeding three hundred and twenty acres, as shall be approved by the secretary of the interior.

Sec. 19. That all the provisions of the said treaty with the different bands of the Sioux Nation of Indians, concluded April 29, 1868, and the agreement with the same approved February 28, 1877, not in conflict with the provisions and requirements of this act, are hereby continued in force according to their tenor and limitation, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sec. 20. That the secretary of the interior shall cause to be erected not less than thirty schoolhouses, and more if found necessary, on the different reservations at such points as he shall think for the best interest of the Indians, but at such distance only as will enable as many as possible attending school to return home nights as white children do attending district schools; and provided, that any white children residing in the neighborhood are entitled to attend the said school on such terms as the secretary of the interior may prescribe.

Sec. 21. That all the lands in the great Sioux reservation outside of the separate reservations herein described are hereby restored to the public domain, except American Island, Farm Island and Niobrara Island, and shall be disposed of by the United States to actual settlers only under the provisions of the homestead law (except section 2301 thereof), and under the law relating to townsites; provided, that each settler, under and in accordance with the provisions of said homestead acts, shall pay to the United States for the land so taken by him, in addition to the fees provided by law, the sum of $1.25 per acre for all lands disposed of within the first three years after the taking effect of this act, and the sum of 75 cents per acre for all lands disposed of within the next two years following thereafter, and 50 cents per acre for the residue of the lands then undisposed of, and shall be entitled to a patent therefor according to said homestead laws, and after the full payment of said sums; but the rights of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors in the late Civil war as defined and described in sections 2304 and 2305 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not be abridged, except as to said sum; provided, that all lands herein opened to settlement under this act, remaining undisposed of at the end of ten years from the taking effect of this act shall be taken and accepted by the United States and paid for by said United States at 50 cents per acre, which amount shall be added to and credited to said Indians as part of their permanent fund, and said lands shall thereafter be part of the public domain of the United States to be disposed of under the homestead laws of the United States and the provisions of this act; and any conveyance of said lands so taken as a homestead, or any contract touching the same, or lien thereon, created prior to the date of final entry, shall be null and void; provided, that there shall be reserved public highways four rods wide around every section of land allotted or opened to settlement under this act, the section lines being the center of said highways; but no deduction shall be made in the amount to be paid for each quarter section of land by reason of such reservation. But if the said highway shall be vacated by any competent authority the title of the respective strips shall inure to the then owner of the tract of which it formed a part by the original survey; and provided further, that nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to affect the right of Congress or of the government of Dakota to establish public highways, or to grant to railroad companies the right of way through said lands, or to exclude the said lands, or any thereof, from the operation of the general laws of the United States now in force granting to railway companies the right of way and depot grounds over and upon the public lands.

American Island, an island in the Missouri River near Chamberlain, in the Territory of Dakota, and now a part of the Sioux reservation, is hereby donated to the said City of Chamberlain; provided further, that the said City of Chamberlain shall formally accept the same within one year from the passage of this act upon the express condition that the same shall be preserved and used for all time as a public park, and for no other purpose, to which all persons shall have free access, and said city shall have authority to adopt all proper rules and regulations for the improvement and care of said park, and upon the failure of any of said conditions the said island shall revert to the United States to be disposed of by future legislation only.

Farm Island, an island in the Missouri River near Pierre, in the Territory of Dakota, and now a part of the Sioux reservation, is hereby donated to the said City of Pierre; provided further, that said City of Pierre shall formally accept the same within one year from the passage of this act upon the express condition that the same shall be preserved and used for all time entire as a public park, and for no other purpose, to which all persons shall have free access, and said city shall have authority to adopt all proper rules and regulations for the improvement and care of said park, and upon the failure of any of said conditions the said island shall revert to the United States to be disposed of by future legislation only.

Niobrara Island, an island in the Niobrara River near Niobrara, and now a part of the Sioux reservation, is hereby donated to the said City of Niobrara; provided further, that the said City of Niobrara shall formally accept the same within one year from the passage of this act upon the expressed condition that the same shall be preserved and used for all time entire as a public park, and for no other purpose, to which all persons shall have free access, and said city shall have full authority to adopt all proper rules and regulations for the improvement and care of said park, and upon the failure of any of said conditions the said island shall revert to the United States to be disposed of by future legislation only.

And Provided Further, That if any full or mixed blood Indian of the Sioux Nation shall have located upon Farm Island, American Island, or Niobrara Island before the date of the passage of this act, it shall be the duty of the secretary of the interior within three months from the time this act shall have taken effect to cause all improvements made by any such Indian so located upon either of said islands and all damage that may accrue to him by a removal therefrom to be appraised, and upon the payment of the sum so determined within six months after notice thereof by the city to which the island is herein donated to such Indian, said Indian shall be required to move from said island and shall be entitled to select instead of such location, his allotment according to the provisions of this act, upon any of the reservations herein established or upon any land opened to settlement by this act not already located upon.

Sec. 22. That all money accruing from the disposal of lands in conformity with this act shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and be applied solely as follows: First, to the reimbursement of the United States for all necessary actual expenditures contemplated and provided for under the provisions of this act, and the creation of the permanent fund hereinbefore provided, and after such reimbursement to the increase of said permanent fund for the purposes hereinbefore provided.

Sec. 23. That all persons who, between the 27th day of February, 1885, in good faith, entered upon or made settlements with intent to enter the same under the homestead or preemption laws of the United States upon any part of the great Sioux reservation lying east of the Missouri River and known as the Crow Creek and Winnebago reservation, which by the President's proclamation of date February 27, 1885, was declared to be opened to settlement, and not included in the new reservation established by section 6 of this act, and who, being otherwise legally entitled to make such entries, located or attempted to locate thereon homestead, preemption or townsite claims, by actual settlement and improvement of any portion of such lands, shall, for a period of ninety days after the proclamation of the President required to be made by this act, have a right to reenter upon such claims and procure title thereto under the preemption or homestead laws of the United States, and complete the same as required therein, and their said claim shall, for such time, have a preference over later entries, and when they shall have in other respects shown themselves entitled, and shall have complied with the law regulating such entries, and as to homesteads with the special provisions of this act, they shall be entitled to have said lands, and patents therefor shall be issued as in like cases; provided, that preemption claimants shall reside on their lands the same length of time before procuring title as homestead claimants under this act. The price to be paid for townsite entries shall be such as is required by law in other cases, and shall be paid into the general fund provided for by this act.

Sec. 24. That sections 16 and 36 of each township of the lands open to settlement under the provisions of this act, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, are hereby reserved for the use and benefit of the public schools, as provided by the act organizing the Territory of Dakota; and whether surveyed or unsurveyed said sections shall not be subject to claim, settlement, or entry under the provisions of this act or any of the land laws of the United States; provided, however, that the United States shall pay to said Indians, out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1.25 per acre for all lands reserved under the provisions of this section.

Sec. 25. That there is hereby appropriated the sum of $100,000, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be applied and used towards surveying the lands herein described as being opened for settlement, said sum to be immediately available; which sum shall not be deducted from the proceeds of lands disposed of under this act.

Sec. 26. That all expenses for the surveying, platting, and disposal of the lands opened to settlement under this act shall be borne by the United States and not deducted from the proceeds of said lands.

Sec. 27. That the sum of $28,200 or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and hereby is, appropriated out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the secretary of the interior to pay to such individual Indians of the Red Cloud and Red Leaf bands of Sioux, as he shall ascertain to have been deprived by the authority of the United States, of ponies, in the year 1876, at the rate of $40.00 for each pony; and he is hereby authorized to employ such agent or agents as he may deem necessary in ascertaining such facts as will enable him to carry out this provision, and to pay them therefor such sums as shall be deemed by him fair and just compensation; provided, that the sum paid to each individual Indian under this provision shall be taken and accepted by such Indian full compensation for all loss sustained by such Indian in consequence of the taking from him of ponies as aforesaid; and provided further, that if any Indian entitled to such compensation shall have deceased, the sum to which the said Indian would be entitled shall be paid to his heirs at law, according to the laws of the Territory of Dakota.

Sec. 28. That this act shall take effect only upon the acceptance thereof and consent thereto by the different bands of the Sioux Nation of Indians, in manner and form prescribed by the twelfth article of the said treaty between the United States and said Indians, concluded April 29, 1868, which said acceptance and consent shall be made known by proclamation thereof by the President of the United States, upon satisfactory proof presented to him that the same has been obtained in the manner and form required by said twelfth article of said treaty, which proof shall be so presented to him within one year from the passage of this act; and upon failure of such proof and proclamation this act becomes of no effect, and null and void.

Sec. 29. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, which sum shall be expended under the direction of the secretary of the interior for procuring the assent of the Sioux Indians to this act, provided in section 27.

Sec. 30. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Approved, March 2, 1889.

The foregoing treaty was signed and assented to by 1,455 adult Indians at Rosebud Agency, and the first man to sign was Crow Dog, the slayer of the famous chief, Spotted Tail. Crow Dog's Indian name in the Sioux language was Con-Gee Shon-Cah. William Spotted Tail, son and successor of the renowned chief, was sixth to sign. His Indian name is "Sin-Ta-Ga-La-She-Cah." At Pine Ridge Agency where the population was about six thousand, only 684 signatures were obtained. "Red Cloud," the most influential of the Pine Ridge people (Ogalalas), did not sign. There were 222 of the Santees at Santee Agency, who signed, which was nearly all the adult male population, and nearly all wrote their names, showing that they had taken a long step toward civilization and education. There were sixty-eight Santees at Flandreau who signed, and nearly all were able to write their names. The Yankton Sioux had nothing to do with the Great Sioux Reservation, and hence did not sign the treaty. At the Lower Brule Agency, near Crow Creek but on the west bank of the Missouri, 297 signatures were obtained. At the Crow Creek Agency, inhabited by the Lower Yanktonnais tribe, 248 names were secured. At Cheyenne River Agency, headquarters for the Sans Arcs, Minneconjeaux, Two Kettles, and Blackfeet, the number of names secured was 642; while at Standing Rock Agency, where the active and almost violent opposition of Sitting Bull was encountered, the number who signed was 803. The tribes at this point were the Unepapas, the Upper Yanktonnais mainly, with a few individuals from other tribes. With the completion of the work at Standing Rock the commissioners were gratified to find that they had received the necessary number of signatures to ratify the treaty on the part of the Indians, and all that remained was their official report to be made out and the official proclamation of the President declaring the treaty completed and the Sioux Reservation, in part, opened.

The Indian signature was a cross, X, written, in signing the treaty or law, thus: "Wi-Ci-Ye-La, Yankton, His X Mark." "Wi-Ci-Ye-La Pa-Han-Ska, Long Nose Yankton, His X Mark."

Some had adopted an English given name, as William Spotted Tail, William American Horse, Thomas American Horse, which may have been in recognition of their esteem for the great white chief, William Tecumseh Sherman, who with others made the treaty of 1868.

There does not appear to have been even one full-blood Indian among the tribes west of the Missouri, who signed the treaty, sufficiently educated so that he was able to write his name. There were a few half-bloods in every tribe that were able to affix an autograph. These names were of French origin. Among the Santees east of the Missouri nearly all were able to write their names.

It will be observed that this treaty met with considerable opposition from such influential sources as Sitting Bull, Red Cloud and others, notably the cattle kings who had married into the nation and were in a position to control many votes. Great credit is due the commissioners who were entrusted with the work, General Crook, General Foster, and Mr. Warner. They were not only aggressive but tactful, and they probably convinced the great majority of the barbarous nation that the proposition of the Government was not only fair and just, but that it presented such advantages that the Indians could not afford to reject it. The gain was all on their side. It assured a competency to every individual of the generation then living, and gave to their posterity wealth and advantages of far greater value.

Though the consummation of this treaty was long delayed, covering a period of nine years, it will be observed that the agreement as made by the first commission, known as the Edmunds Commission, appointed under the Pettigrew bill, was substantially the one finally adopted, with some changes made in the price paid for the land ceded—but the separate reservation plan and their boundaries, the method and kind of payments, the establishment of schools, and many other important details, were all provided in this first agreement, and had this commission been supplied with an adequate appropriation to have justified the incurring of the large expense, it would probably have been able to have secured the necessary signatures, but, as has been stated, this was not deemed essential in view of the precedent established in 1876, in making the treaty for the Black Hills.

THE YEAR 1883 FREIGHTED WITH IMPORTANT EVENTS—AVERAGE INCREASE OF POPULATION OVER A THOUSAND A WEEK, OR 60,000 FOR THE YEAR—THE LEGISLATURE—THE LAST SESSION HELD AT YANKTON—GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE—THE REMOVAL OF THE CAPITAL FROM YANKTON TO BISMARCK—A BILL TO LOCATE THE CAPITAL AT HURON—A CAPITAL COMMISSION FORMED WHICH LOCATES THE SEAT OF GOVERNMENT AT BISMARCK—REV. JOSEPH WARD'S SUNDAY SERMON—GOVERNOR'S APPOINTMENTS—NEWSPAPER COMMENT—TO AUTHORIZE DIVISION—THE NEW DAKOTA PENITENTIARY FORMALLY PRESENTED—THE BISMARCK PENITENTIARY PROVIDED FOR—ORDWAY AND TELLER CORRESPONDENCE.

The good year of 1883 witnessed great activity in the Territory of Dakota. This was not confined to matters usually termed political, though in that field there was manifested unwonted and intelligent industry, due to the promise of statehood, the division of the territory, and kindred affairs.

Immigration continued brisk to all sections, but more largely to the vacant lands, and hundreds of thousands of acres of these were occupied. As bearing upon the future as well as present welfare of the territory, this feature of the year's activities was of the first importance. The farmers were the most industrious of our population; the season's weather favored a bountiful harvest, and a largely increased acreage was sown and planted.

A People's Constitutional Convention was called and held for that part of the territory lying south of the 46th parallel. This convention was preceded by a Delegate Convention called by the executive committee of the non-partisan citizens' organization of 1882 of which Rev. Mr. Whitfield was chairman. Its purpose, as announced in the call, was to consider the calling of a Constitutional Convention, the governor having practically vetoed the bill enacted by the Legislature of 1883 for that purpose. This was favorably acted upon by a non-partisan convention held at Huron in June, attended by about four hundred delegates, and a Constitutional Convention called to meet at Sioux Falls on the 12th of September.

The proceedings of the Huron preliminary convention and the proceedings of the convention which framed the first state constitution, will be found in the chapters entitled "Statehood."

The fifteenth session of the Legislative Assembly assembled at Yankton, the capital, on Tuesday, January 9, 1883, at 12 o'clock M. There were twelve members of the Council, and twenty-four members of the House of Representatives.

The Legislature of 1881 had made a new apportionment demanded by the increase of settlement and the organization of new counties; but Congress had not increased the membership which remained at a less number than at any time since the territory was organized.

The first proceeding in the organization of the Council was the calling of the roll of members as furnished by the secretary of the territory to whom the legislative returns were made. The following named persons responded to their names: First District, Union and Clay counties—F. N. Burdick, Clay County.

Second District, Lincoln, Turner and McCook counties—H. A. Jerauld, Lincoln County. Third District, Minnehaha County—John R. Jackson, Valley Springs, Minnehaha County. Fourth District, Yankton County—William Pitt Dewey, Yankton. Fifth District, Bon Homme, Hutchinson, Douglass and Charles Mix counties—Frank M. Ziebach, Scotland, Bon Homme County. Sixth District, Moody, Lake and Brookings counties—J. O'B. Scobey, Brookings. Seventh District, Hamlin, Deuel, Grant, Codington, Clark, Spink, Day, Brown, Campbell, McPherson, Walworth, Edmunds, Potter and Faulk counties—Wm. H. Donaldson, of Codington, was admitted, and Elias McAuley entered notice of contest. Eighth District, Hanson, Davison, Aurora, Brule, Buffalo, Hughes, Sully, Hyde, Hand, Beadle, Kingsbury and Miner counties—C. H. McIntosh, Plankinton, Aurora County. Ninth District, Pennington and Custer counties—No councilman. Tenth District, Lawrence and Mandan counties—Frank J. Washabaugh, Deadwood. Eleventh District, Pembina, Cavalier and Rolette counties—No councilman. Twelfth District, Grand Forks, Traill and Walsh counties—George H. Walsh, Grand Forks. Thirteenth District, Cass and Richland counties—S. G. Roberts, Fargo. Fourteenth District, Barnes, Ransom, LaMoure, Stutsman, Griggs, Foster, Gingras, Kidder, Burleigh, Sheridan, Stevens, Renville, Mountrail, Waugette, Howard, Williams, Mercer, Morton, Stark, Billings, Emmons, Logan and Ramsey counties—Johnson C. Nickeus, Jamestown, Stutsman County.

The Council then made a temporary organization by electing Wm. P. Dewey chairman.

Chief Justice Edgerton then administered the oath of office to the councilmen, and on motion a permanent organization was effected, as follows:

President of the Council, J. O'B. Scobey; chief clerk, E. A. Henderson, Grand Forks; assistant clerk, J. M. Quinn, Cass County; enrolling clerk, C. F. Mallahan, Union County; sergeant-at-arms, Jacob Brauch, Yankton; messenger, M. C. Lyons, Minnehaha; fireman, Randall Peters, Lincoln County; chaplain, Rev. R. H. Dolliver, Yankton.

The Council then adjourned to the following day, after the appointment of the usual committees to notify the House and the governor that the body was duly organized and ready for business.

The House was called to order by D. M. Inman, member from Clay County, who appointed Ira Ellis, of Union County, temporary chairman, the appointment was confirmed by vote of the House.

T. A. Kingsbury, of Codington County, was elected temporary clerk. The members-elect then presented their certificates of election to the temporary clerk, by which officer the roll of members was made up and called, as follows: First District, Clay and Union counties—Ira Ellis, Union County; D. M. Inman, Clay County. Second District, Lincoln, Turner and McCook counties—N. C. Tychsen, Parker, Turner County, and H. VonWoert, Montrose, McCook County. Third District, Minnehaha County—John Thompson, Dell Rapids, Minnehaha County. Fourth District, Yankton County—J. B. Wynn, Yankton. Fifth District, Bon Homme, Hutchinson, Douglass, and Charles Mix—B. R. Wagner, Springfield, Bon Homme County; W. B. Robinson, Scotland, Bon Homme County. Sixth District, Moody, Lake and Brookings counties—R. C. McAllister, Madison, Lake County; George Rice, Flandreau, Lake County. Seventh District, Hamlin, Deuel, Grant, Codington, Clark, Spink, Day, Brown, Campbell, McPherson, Walworth, Edmunds, Potter and Faulk counties—N. T. Hauser, Aberdeen, Brown County; N. J. Schafer, Milbank, Grant County. Eighth District, Hanson, Davison, Aurora, Brule, Buffalo, Hughes, Sully, Hyde, Hand, Beadle, Kingsbury and Miner counties—George Sterling, Huron, Beadle County. Ninth District, Pennington and Custer counties—J. W. Nowlin, Rapid City, Pennington County. Tenth District, Lawrence and Mandan counties—W. A. Rinehart, Lead City; E. M. Bowman, Minnesella; A. A. Choteau, Minnesella, Lawrence County. Eleventh District, Pembina, Cavalier and Rolette counties—N. E. Nelson, Pembina County. Twelfth District, Grand Forks, Traill and Walsh counties—G. P. Harvey, Grafton, Walsh County; O. M. Towner, Larimore, Grand Forks County. Thirteenth District, Cass and Richland counties—John C. Pyatt, Wahpauaton, Richland County; L. J. Alfred, Tower City, Cass County. Fourteenth District, Barnes, Ransom, LaMoure, Stutsman, Griggs, Foster, Gingras, Kidder, Howard, Burleigh, Sheridan, Stevens, Renville, Mountrail, Walletoe, Williams, Mercer, Morton, Stark, Billings, Emmons, Logan and Ramsey counties—E. A. Williams, Bismarck, Burleigh County; B. W. Benson, Valley City, Barnes County. E. P. Phillips and William Lamb presented notice of contest for the seats of the Seventh District.

Chief Justice Edgerton then administered the oath of office to the members, after which prayer was offered by Rev. J. G. Travis, of the Baptist Church, Yankton.

The House then organized by electing E. A. Williams, of Burleigh County, speaker, and T. A. Kingsbury, of Codington, chief clerk; assistant clerk, E. T. Cressey, Beadle County; enrolling and engrossing clerk, A. Sheridan Jones, Hutchinson County; sergeant-at-arms, Judson LaMoure, Pembina County; messenger, Philip Clark, of Moody County; watchman, Peter Bjorgun, Union County; chaplain, Rev. J. G. Travis, Yankton County.

The oath of office was administered to the officers by Chief Justice Edgerton; the customary committees to inform the governor and the Council of the organization of the House were appointed; whereupon the House adjourned until the following day.

Governor Ordway's message was delivered in person to the Legislature in joint session, on the second day. The message follows:

Gentlemen of the Council and House of Representatives:

In compliance with the laws of Congress and territorial enactments, you are assembled to enter upon your duties as members of the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly.

Under the provisions of the Organic Act "the legislative power in each territory is vested in the governor and Legislative Assembly." It therefore becomes my agreeable duty as the executive of the territory to welcome you to the capital and congratulate you upon the favorable auspices under which you are assembled. Also to express satisfaction at the pleasant and comfortable appearance of your new legislative halls.

Public duties at the national capital and the serious illness of members of my family in a distant portion of the country, have so engrossed my time during the past month, that this, my second biennial message, will not be so extended as I otherwise should have desired.

I shall however briefly lay before you the condition of public affairs in the territory, and earnestly renew some of the recommendations made in my message to the Fourteenth Legislative Assembly which remained unacted upon at the close of the last session.

Printed copies of my first biennial message will be laid before you, to which I shall have occasion to frequently call your attention in this communication.

The period formerly fixed by Congress for the transaction of legislative business was extended by the last Congress from forty days to sixty days. You will therefore have more ample time for considering questions of a public nature, and to revise some of the hasty and imperfect enactments now encumbering our code of laws.

In this connection I may be pardoned for suggesting that in view of the near approach to statehood, it would be well to take up the public business early in the session, carefully revising all doubtful enactments, and so adjusting the laws of the territory that no member in either house of Congress can justly make our laws a cause for substantial objection to statehood.

With the view of co-operating in the early consideration of public business, and as some of the territorial appointments have been made to fill vacancies extending under the code to the end of the session, I shall defer the nominations of territorial officers to a later period of the session than has been usual in sending names to the council.

During the two years that have elapsed since the meeting of the last Legislature the people of all sections of the territory have enjoyed unexampled prosperity. Our population has increased from 150,000 to nearly three hundred thousand. Our taxable property has increased from $20,000,000 to $50,000,000. The agricultural and mechanical developments have fully kept pace with this remarkable growth of property and population.

The territorial finances are in a most satisfactory condition as the abstract of the report of the territorial treasurer shows.

Warrants issued on account of construction of hospital for insane and territorial penitentiary have been paid out of funds realized from sale of bonds issued by act of Legislature for this purpose.

Warrants issued by act of Legislature, February 22, 1879, amounting to $14,176.22, bearing 8 per cent interest, reported as outstanding in last report, have been redeemed by the territorial treasurer.

There remains unpaid $1,893.40, a warrant issued on general fund being the total outstanding indebtedness of the territory.

There is also outstanding $40,000 of 6 per cent bonds issued on account of construction of the Hospital for the Insane, and $50,000 6 per cent bonds issued on account of construction of the penitentiary, making a total bonded indebtedness of $90,000.

To offset the above indebtedness, the territory has resources amounting to $43,403.99, but from which the current expenses of the territory must be met. The details of all the financial transactions of the territory are very carefully and accurately set forth in the comprehensive reports of the territorial treasurer and auditor herewith transmitted and to which your attention is called.

The Hospital for the Insane which was commenced through the liberality of Governor Howard to meet a pressing emergency, has by acts of the last Legislature become a creditable and permanent institution. The new brick and comparatively fireproof hospital buildings were so far completed when the wooden structure was consumed by fire on the 2d of last April, that the patients were promptly transferred to the east wing and made comfortable at very slight expense. The report of the superintendent shows that the average cost of support of patients during the past two years has been about a dollar and seventy-five cents per week, and that the average number of patients who have fully recovered has been larger than at most other similar institutions. The necessity for increased accommodations for the insane, with the detailed method of treatment, is fully set forth in the reports of the medical superintendent, steward and matron, to which your attention is invited.

Then follows an account of the opening of the penitentiary in 1882 by the directors and the formal and official opening, the proceedings of which are given in the proceedings of this legislative assembly, the members of which participated in the ceremonies.

CARE OF THE BLIND.—The care of the blind has been committed to an Iowa college at Vinton, Iowa, under an arrangement made with my predecessor, at which place three pupils have been supported and educated during the past two years, at an average cost of $9.16 for each pupil per annum. (The amount stated seems too low for such service and may be an error of the printer.)

A reference to the agricultural college located at Brookings by the last Legislature is made, and the recommendation made that the Legislature memorialize Congress for a grant of land for the institution.

The Dakota University established at Vermillion under the laws of the territory, and the Yankton College, located at Yankton, are both so far approaching completion that they will be ready for occupancy during the next season. In view of the probable opening up of the Big Sioux Reservation, I would recommend that the Legislature memorialize Congress for grants of land to aid both these institutions.

SCHOOLS.—(Reports from the various counties regarding the condition and number of the schools had been very meagre and unsatisfactory, barely half of them complying with the law, due probably to the general conditions arising out of the remarkable immigration to the territory. That the schools were prospering could not be gainsaid, but they were overcrowded, details of management by the officers of the districts greatly overlooked and neglected, and the law which provided for the district system strongly condemned. The township system, the system practiced in New England and which had gained for that section such universal commendation, was urgently recommended, and stoutly supported by the territorial superintendent, General Beadle. "Whatever shall be your final views as to the system and change from the present plan, there can be no question of greater importance which shall require your attention than the subject of public education.")

The subject of changing county lines was discussed, also the refunding of county bonds and other bonds, and the territorial militia.

ADMISSION AND DIVISION.—There are now pending in both houses of Congress, bills providing a comprehensive enabling act for dividing the territory by the admission of the southern half as a state, also a bill to divide the territory substantially on the same line. It is not denied that the southern portion of the territory has the requisite population, if living in a state, would be entitled to a member of the House of Representatives. It is not denied that the amount of taxable property in the southern portion is fully equal to any territory that has been admitted as a state. There is very little doubt that a majority of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives are favorable to the passage of the enabling act referred to, yet during the limited number of days before the expiration of the present Congress the opponents of division and admission may prevent action and thus delay the matter until the assembling of the next Congress. If this delay should occur, I deem it of the utmost importance that this Legislature should memorialize Congress to increase the membership of the council to twenty-five, and the membership of the House of Representatives to seventy-five. That an act providing an additional United States judge for the territory be passed and that Congress make more adequate provisions for the protection of the school lands.

If on the other hand admission and division should be secured before the close of the present session of Congress, grave responsibilities will devolve upon the members of the Territorial Legislature in preparing for transition from territorial to state government.

NORMAL SCHOOLS.—Provision was made by the last Legislative Assembly for the organization of several normal schools on condition that suitable parcels of land for their location should be deeded to the territory within a given period. But one or two of these proposed institutions have complied with the requirements of the law for their organization and but one so far as I am aware has been put in operation.

While I would cheerfully recommend donations of lands by the general Government to aid a reasonable number of normal schools, I cannot approve of legislation looking to any other use of the lands set apart by the general Government to establish a grand common school educational system than that contemplated in the act of Congress.

FLOOD OF 1881.—During the latter part of the legislative session in March, 1881, the snow blockade had become so complete that railroad communication was cut off in portions of Central and Southern Dakota and appeals were made to the executive and some members of the Legislature for assistance.

The Legislative Assembly did not, however, deem it expedient, to place any means at the disposal of the executive to meet the existing or probable future emergency.

Then follows quite a lengthy account of the flood substantially as related in the chapters devoted to the year 1881.

IMMIGRATION, ETC.—The vast volume of correspondence constantly flowing in upon the executive, the secretary and other territorial officers, calling for statistical information in regard to the extent and resources of the territory for which no provision has been made to supply or to even pay the postage to answer this large correspondence, constrains me to urgently renew the recommendations made on pages twenty-four and twenty-five of my last biennial message, for the formation of a commission of three persons, members to be known as the "board of immigration, mining and agriculture." As suggested in the previous communication to which I have referred, this board could be made up of one person whose experience and qualifications could fit him to prepare statistical information so much sought for by officials and persons from different sections of the country as well as by new settlers.

One member of the board could be selected whose knowledge and experience in mining would enable him to prepare for publication and distribution reliable information in regard to the mineral resources of the territory, including regions supposed to contain deposits of coal. The other or third member of the board should be a person whose practical experience and education would fit him to prepare for publication and distribution reliable information in regard to the quality of the soil and its capacity for producing cereal or ordinary farm products, its adaptability for stock raising with specific information in regard to the localities best adapted to the different classes of agricultural developments.

The expense incident to the establishment of this commission need not be large and I am quite sure that the beneficent results which it would accomplish would increase the revenues of the territory much more than its cost.

OPENING OF THE BIG SIOUX RESERVATION.—By an act of Congress, approved May 7, 1882, an appropriation of $5,000 was made to enable the secretary of the interior to negotiate with the Sioux Indians for such a modification of existing treaties and agreements as would result in opening up to settlement, under the homestead laws, a large section of the country between the Missouri River and the Black Hills counties.

In pursuance with this act of Congress, Hon. H. M. Teller, secretary of the interior, appointed a very able commission, consisting of ex-Gov. Newton Edmunds, ex-Chief Justice Peter C. Shannon and James H. Teller, to carry on negotiations with the various Indian tribes for the cession of such portion of their reservation as they might desire to cede to the Government.

This commission has entered upon and prosecuted negotiations with the chiefs and headmen of the principal tribes with marked success, and from present advices received from the secretary of the interior, and the commissioners, it appears highly probable that a large area of valuable land will be opened up for settlement under the homestead laws at an early day. This subject is brought to your attention with the view of ascertaining whether any legislative action may be required.

TREE CULTURE.—The well intended act of Congress, allowing the entry of 100 acres of land as a tree claim, have been so completely nullified by the manipulation of land sharks that our broad and fertile prairies are comparatively treeless. I fear no adequate remedy for this abuse is provided by Congress, and I would suggest the propriety of legislation exempting a certain number of acres from taxation to encourage the growth of trees on every homestead.

The message recommends that the office of territorial attorney be provided for, and argues that the rapid growth of the territory in population and the establishment of new counties, demands an officer in the judicial department who will be able to advise the various officers of the territory on doubtful questions and appear for the territory in cases in court where the territory is interested.

The message reports the number of pardons granted. It also recommends amendment of the election law concerning the canvassing of votes for members of the Legislature and county officers. The message further comments:

I am of the opinion that the Crawford County system of holding primary elections, conducted under judges legally appointed and made subject to penalties, where all electors can have opportunity to vote for the candidates of their choice, would be a long step toward securing an absolutely fair vote, and an unquestionably honest count at all elections.

The message in closing comments briefly on the subjects of "marriage and divorce," the territorial library, and recommends to the close examination of the members the various reports from the public institutions.

CONCLUSION.—Members of the Council and House of Representatives: In closing this communication, permit me to express the hope that the work submitted to our hands may be well done, and that as co-workers in preparing the foundation for statehood, our mutual relations may be pleasant and agreeable.

N. G. ORDWAY, GOVERNOR.

The territorial penitentiary, the construction of which was authorized by the session Legislature of 1881, at Sioux Falls, having been completed and occupied as the territorial prison, was formally accepted by the territory during a visit made by the governor and members of this Legislative Assembly, on Monday, January 15th. The school for deaf mutes was also in operation at the Falls at this time, under the superintendency of Professor Simpson. The territorial university at Vermillion was then under construction, and was officially visited by the Legislative members during the same trip.

Hon. James H. Teller was secretary of the territory.

In the contest for the seats in the House from the Seventh District the contestants, Lamb and Philips were given the seats occupied by Schafer and Hauser. The Seventh District included the counties of Hamlin, Deuel, Grant, Codington, Clark, Spink, Day and Brown.

Mr. Donaldson, councilman from the same district, was also unseated, and the place given to Elias McCauley, of Spink County.

A bill providing for the removal of the capital of the territory from Yankton was passed at this session, and while it was not the most important measure affecting the welfare of the territory generally, it attracted widespread interest, not only among Dakotans, but abroad in the communities of neighboring states. The capital had been at Yankton since the territory was organized, a period of twenty-two years, but the time had come when Yankton was no longer centrally located as to population—in fact it had within two or three years been left so far to one side that it could no longer lay any reasonable claim to the retention of the seat of government on that score, except such claim as was warranted at the time by the situation of territorial affairs brought about by the rapid growth in population and material development of the territory. It had the same interest as other communities that the capital should be placed, as it was when it was located at Yankton, in a suitable location where it would accommodate the greatest number of the people and subserve the best interests of the territory.

This Legislature, however, had not been elected with any view that it would remove the capital; the people had expressed no sentiment on the subject, and no choice had been indicated of the point to which it should be removed. Governor Ordway had, however, agitated the subject during his term, and it was well understood that he was favorable to the change if the point selected for it should meet with his favorable opinion, and he expected to have a potent voice in the selection of this point.

There was general expectation at the time that the territory would be divided by Congress on the line of the 46th parallel of north latitude, or on the 7th standard parallel, and the people had been so confident of this that the Legislatures of 1881 had provided in the near future for duplicate public institutions for that portion of the territory north of the parallel mentioned. And in case Congress should refuse to divide the territory, there was no shadow of doubt that it could be admitted as a state by making the demand, for its population at the time was 295,468, at least one hundred thousand more than sufficient to entitle it to statehood. In the southern half the population had reached 205,000, and in the northern half 90,048, based on authentic information. But the interior of the territory was but sparsely settled, as is evidenced from the legislative apportionment of the members of the Legislature which passed the act for removal, and it was therefore impracticable to select a more central and at the same time accessible and suitable location for the capital.

Then again, if the territory should be divided, as was so confidently anticipated, settlement and development had not progressed so far in either section as to warrant the location of the capital with any certainty that it would be placed at a point that would be generally satisfactory. Neither section of the territory, therefore, was prepared for a re-location of the seat of government. It had, however, been a favorite hobby of Governor Ordway, during a greater part of the three years that had passed since he became governor that the capital should be removed to a more central location. He had not been in the territory a great many months before he discovered the great mistake that had been made by locating it so far away from the people, and possibly he was somewhat indignant that the rights and conveniences of the people had been so flagrantly ignored by their pioneer representatives. He claims to have been sent to the territory and admonished by the President and his cabinet officials to correct such abuses and he was not the man to neglect such an opportunity as the removal presented with its promise of a fruitful harvest to those who could secure a ground floor position in the site of the new capital.

CAPITAL REMOVAL

The first formal legislative movement in that direction was taken by Councilman George H. Walsh, of Grand Forks, who, about the first of February, introduced a bill to locate the seat of government of the territory, and to provide for the removal of the records and other property to the seat of government. This bill proposed to remove the capital to Huron.

It appears that the Huron bill was not taken seriously by the Legislature. Even the representative from Huron and the councilman from that district, knew nothing about it, nor were the people of Huron advised, though greatly gratified—so much so that when informed of Mr. Walsh's appreciative testimonial in their behalf, a delegation of pioneers of the place braved the wintry blasts and the hardship of a 150 mile overland trip on the emigrant trail to the capital at Yankton, to lend a helping hand in its promotion, deeming it sincere. This manifestation of a desire to help the good cause along was human as well as Huron nature, under the circumstances. At the time, the Huron press and people censured Mr. Sterling, their representative, for his laxity and want of enthusiasm in their favor; but they did not realize, as Mr. Sterling did, that there was a scheme behind the movement and that Huron had been selected as a figurehead to conceal their real purpose.

The bill was referred to a special committee of which Mr. Nickens was chairman, with Messrs. Walsh, Burdick, Jerould and Zielach. Ten or twelve days later this bill was reported from the committee adversely, and the bill was considered in committee of the whole, which committee reported adversely and was sustained by the Council. Mr. Walsh, however, through the friendly offices of the president of the Council was able to have it again referred to the same special committee.

These preliminary movements, including the most formidable one, that of Huron, failed of substantial encouragement, and the capital removal matter had apparently been abandoned after having the floor for nearly fifty days of the session. It would, however, appear from the completeness of the commission plan, which was finally adopted, that it had been some time in incubation, and was probably brought down from the Northern Pacific headquarters at Bismarek, fully worked out on paper, by Meek McKenzie, who had been at the capital a couple of weeks making the acquaintance of the members of the Legislature, and who was the power behind the throne of the commission plan bill. The legislative history of this remarkable, and to some extent, original scheme, is gathered from the legislative proceedings where it is found that on the fiftieth day of the session, Johnson Nickens, councilman from Jamestown, Stutsman County, chairman of the committee, reported the Huron bill (Council Bill 51) without recommendation, and at the same time presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President appoint a committee of five, to whom shall be referred Council Bill 51, providing for the removal of the capital. Said committee is authorized and directed to enquire:

First, Is it expedient to remove the capital from its present location? If yes, then in what manner shall another site be selected and located; and

Second, To what point in the territory shall the capital be taken; and Third, What inducements will be offered the territory for its location at a point the committee may recommend, or a proper and convenient place; and it is hereby made the duty of the committee to give a reasonable hearing to all persons interested in the removal of the said capital; and to report to the council its recommendation, either by bill or otherwise, at an early date.

Mr. Walsh moved the adoption of the resolution, and it was adopted by a vote of seven to five, though one uncompromising opponent of removal voted for it. The chair appointed as the committee Messrs. Nickeus, Walsh, Burdick, Ziebach and Jerauld—the latter, however, withdrew and suggested Mr. Dewey, of Yankton, in his place, which was conceded.

This action was the opening gun of the plan of the syndicate headed by Alexander McKenzie, of Bismarck, who was then visiting the Legislature to place the removal and the new location in the hands of the capital commission.

This committee held two or three meetings of a public character for the purpose of receiving proposals from any towns or persons who desired to contest for the honor of the capital location. This committee did not report, but on the 2d of March, the fifty-second day of the session, Mr. Allred, of Fargo, introduced in the House the capital commission bill, which is here given substantially as it was introduced, except that after its introduction some of its supporters refused to vote for the bill unless the names of the commissioners, which had been agreed upon by the governor, McKenzie and the remainder of the syndicate were inserted in the law. These parties had already begun to distrust the governor and they were unwilling to give him a chance to betray them, which they felt he might do under some plausible pretext. The commissioners were therefore placed in the bill to save it, though as the bill was originally drawn and introduced the names were omitted.

The members of the commission were said to have been selected with the view of securing the necessary number of councilmen (seven), to pass the bill in the council and the two who had been the most difficult to win over had been Jerauld, of Lincoln, and McCauley, of Spink counties, but they were finally obtained.

For members of the commission McCauley selected Dr. Charles H Meyers, of Spink County, under a pledge he claimed that the new location should be south of the 46th parallel. Jerauld selected Henry H. DeLong, of Lincoln County, said to have been a near relative, and also had a county named for himself. Governor Ordway selected Alexander Hughes, of Union County, at the time register of the United States Land Office at Yankton, and also secured the confirmation of his son George as territorial auditor. Alexander McKenzie was undoubtedly selected by himself as he was the head of the whole scheme, though the selection was credited to Councilman Nickeus, of Stutsman County. McKenzie also selected John P. Belden, of Deadwood. Burdick, of Clay County, selected M. P. Thompson, of Vermillion. Scobey, of Brookings, president of the Council, selected George A. Mathews, of Brookings. Councilman Walsh selected Milo W. Scott, of Grand Forks. Councilman Roberts, of Cass County, selected Burleigh F. Spaulding, of Fargo. The Agricultural College for the northern half of the territory was also located at Fargo.

The members of the House, who required an inducement to vote for the bill had a share in the minor places connected with public institutions, to be given to their friends, of which there were about fifty. And in addition the new counties whose boundaries were defined and which received distinguished names, were Benson, McAuley, Edgerton and Inman, Butte, Delano, Scobey, Pyatt, Jackson, Sterling, Nowlin, Fall River, Faulk, Potter, Foster, Hyde, Harvey, Jerauld, McLean, McIntosh, Nelson, Nickeus, Roberts, Sanborn, Sargent, Schnasse, Stanley, Steele, Towner, Rolette, Villard, Bowman, Ewing, Burdick, Dunn, McKenzie, Wallace, Allred, Flannery, Buford, Hettinger, Washington, Martin, Wagner, Rinhardt, Choteau, Washabaugh, Wynn, forty-eight in all.

The members of the Legislature were not the only parties who were plagued with a sentiment of distrust, for the governor was apprehensive that he might be cheated of some of the perquisites he had set his gubernatorial heart on. He was desirous of securing the office of territorial auditor for his son, and knew that the appointment would be quite distasteful to many of the councilmen which body could defeat the appointment by refusing to confirm it. It was the most important appointment, considered in connection with the financial affairs of the territory and particularly the capital commission, of any and the salary was a liberal one. There were a number of appropriation bills and bond bills pending designed for the new public institutions which the capital commission scheme had found necessary for the development of the territory to meet the growing demands of the people, and as these would require the approval of the governor in order to become valid, the governor possibly felt that the confirmation of his son would be more certain if he should make the appointment before these measures were presented for his approval. Accordingly about two weeks before the Legislature adjourned, he sent the nomination of George L. Ordway to be territorial auditor, and Wm. H. McVay, to be territorial treasurer to the Council for confirmation. Mr. McVay was promptly confirmed; but the other encountered much opposition and aroused quite a struggle. The phantom of a veto of many of the cherished bond and other bills saved the day, however, for the son, and he was finally confirmed by the narrowest margin. There were in the neighborhood of fifty appointments to be made, but the others were allowed to rest to be given out to those whose merits, at the close of business at the end of the session, might entitle them to a reward.

The capital commission bill passed the House on the fifty-fourth day of the session by a vote of fifteen to seven. Those voting for it were Messrs. Alfred, of Cass County, Benson, of Barnes, Bowman and Choteau, of Lawrence, Ellis, of Union, Harvey, of Walsh, McCallister, of Moody, Nelson, of Pembina, Pyatt, of Richland, Sterling, of Beadle, Thompson, of Minnehaha, Tower of Grand Forks, VanWoert, of McCook, Wagner, of Bon Homme, and Mr. Speaker (Williams, of Bismarck).

The opposing vote was given by Messrs. Inman, of Clay, Nowlin, of Pennington, Phillips, of Brown, Rice, of Lake, Robinson, of Bon Homme, Tychson, of Turner, and Wynn, of Yankton.

These proceedings were had on the 3d day of March, the fifty-fourth day of the session, and on the fifty-seventh day the bill reached the Council and was given its first reading, and referred by the president to the special committee who had charge of the original proposition. An earnest effort was made by the minority to refer it to the regular committee on territorial affairs, but the chair overruled all such attempts and placed it where it would do the most for the promoters, and insure speedy action. On the fifty-eighth day it was considered in Committee of the Whole, and amid much parliamentary confusion and wrangling, Mr. Scobey, of Brookings, being president. A number of other measures were considered in Committee of the Whole at the same session, and it was presumed that they were all favorably reported, for later in the day, May 7th, several hours were spent filibustering over the commission bill. Finally, an amendment offered by Mr. Dewey, requiring the location by commission to be ratified by a vote of the people, was carried by a vote of seven to five, McCauley voting for it, with Jackson, Dewey, Jerauld, McIntosh, Washabaugh and Ziebach—seven. Nays, Burdick, Nickens, Roberts, Walsh, and Mr. President (Scobey) 5.

The chair was sufficiently astute to realize that there had been a disastrous mistake made in the vote on that particular amendment—it meant the certain defeat of the whole scheme—and he delayed announcing the vote, giving Mr. Nickens an opportunity to visit Mr. McCauley and whisper a few words in his ear which induced McCauley to change his vote to nay, making the result six to six. As this move defeated the motion of Mr. Dewey for a vote on the bill by the people, the chair breathed with more freedom, and declared the amendment lost. Great is parliamentary law. This was followed by a number of dilatory motions, and finally the bill was passed by a vote of seven to five. Those voting for it were Messrs. Burdick, of Clay, Jerauld, of Lincoln, McCauley, of Spink, Nickens, of Stutsman, Roberts, of Cass, Walsh, of Grand Forks, Scobey, of Brookings, the president. Those voting nay were Messrs. Dewey, of Yankton, Jackson, of Minnehaha, McIntosh, of Aurora, Washabaugh, of Lawrence, and Ziebach, of Bon Homme, five. The governor approved the bill and it became a law.

It will be observed that none of the plans for removal received anything like a united support, and it is safe to infer that none of them promised the result which was finally attained; for a bill that proposed to locate the capital at Bismarck would in all probability have received no votes from the southern half of the territory, including the Black Hills, and from sentiments expressed by members it is doubtful that it would have been unanimously supported by the northern members. It was therefore necessary to reach this purpose by indirection, and the capital commission was finally evolved for the purpose. The only argument used against Yankton was that it had ceased to be the center of population. That other points, more central had now been founded and were growing into prominence. McKenzie, however, did not waste any words or time in argument, and if he had he would probably have avoided the question of center of population. He had more potent inducements to offer.

It is probable that the Northern Pacific Railroad interest had considered the removal, if it could be brought to a point on their line, for it would insure quite an addition to their traffic, and subsequent events tend to confirm that the potent influence observed in the proceedings was one that commanded the obedience of all the northern members, the selection of McKenzie to take charge of the manipulation of the scheme at Yankton, who came to the capital in the capacity of general manager of the capital removal proceedings and immediately became the closest companion and confidential friend of the executive, were matters of public notoriety. McKenzie's "O. K." was essential in many cases to allay executive opposition to the measures promoted by members. His generalship, his lavish liberality, his blandishments at times, his audacity at others, were evidence that he had with him the "power behind the throne," and was its accredited agent.

Yankton necessarily occupied a prominent position in the discussion of the capital removal question. It was conceded without argument that the capital would be placed in a more central location now that the territory had become practically occupied by inhabitants in every quarter, but as the territory was supposed to be on the eve of division, the general opinion held that the removal should be deferred until that event was accomplished. It was the indirect and corrupt methods pursued in securing the legislative authority that was so unanimously condemned by the press and people, and it would seem from a review of the comments of the contemporaneous press, that a unanimous voice was raised in indignant protest against it, and the most cogent of this, and the bitterest invective, came from a score of sources that may have never visited the old capital.

The office of attorney general, already practically supplied by the United States Government in the office of United States district attorney, was one of the new luxuries imposed on the territory because of the presumed necessity which existed for a capital commission, and was virtually attached to that august body. Alexander Hughes being appointed attorney general by Governor Ordway, at a salary of $2,500 a year, also became president of the capital commission at a salary of $6 a day, giving him a per diem of $14 a day for each working day in the year—the said over-burdened official reserving Sunday for his devotional exercises. The attorney general bill was house file 231, and was introduced in the House by Representative Ellis, of Union County; it made its way through the Legislature and reached the governor on the last day of the session, which would indicate that it was designed to supplement the capital commission bill.

There was a remarkable outburst of indignation throughout the territory, as gathered from the expressions of the newspapers, as soon as it became known that the law had passed, and even while it was pending. The Legislature, however adjourned, the day following the enactment of the law, and the members had gone to their homes where the censuring comments had their origin. Many pages might be filled with these denunciatory newspaper articles, which were expressed in all shades of unfavorable criticism, not only openly denouncing the law, but those who had been instrumental in procuring its passage, including the governor, as a gang of bribe givers, bribe takers, and much worse. A list of the papers so expressing these sentiments, is here given, showing that nearly every newspaper in the territory of all shades of politics, saving those at Bismarck and Huron, were as one, in condemning the act, which was commonly denominated a most brazen villainy, and one of the most flagrant ever endorsed by a legislative body.

As a gauge of public sentiment regarding this method of removing the capital, and spontaneously expressed, at least within a week or two after the adjournment of the Legislature, it was ascertained that it was condemned in emphatic terms by the:

Canton Advocate, Lincoln County; Grand Forks News, Grand Forks County; Fargo Republican, Cass County; Fargo Argus, Cass County; Egan Express, Moody County; Scotland Citizen, Bon Homme County; Brookings Sentinel, Brookings County; Elk Point Coyote, Union County; Press, Brookings County; Times, Walsh County; Capital, Jamestown, Stutsman County; Enterprise, Flandreau, Moody County; Press, Sioux Falls, Minnehaha County; New Era, Parker, Turner County; Post, Fargo, Cass County; Republican, Fargo, Cass County; Advocate, Aurora, Brookings County; Herald, Flandreau, Moody County; Review, Milbank, Grant County; Times, Lake Preston, Kingsbury County; Plaindealer, Grand Forks; Pioneer, Deadwood, Lawrence County; Register, Salem, McCook County; Register, Chamberlain, Brule County; Herald, Iroquois, Kingsbury County; Sentinel, Madison, Lake County; Herald, Milwaukie, Wis. Pioneer Press, St. Paul, Minn.; Press and Dakotian, Yankton; Dakota Herald, Yankton; Free Press, Bramhall, Hyde County; Times, Springfield, Bon Homme County; Sun, Redfield, Spink County; Journal, Rapid City, Pennington County; Courier, Watertown, Codington County; Leader, DeSmet, Kingsbury County; Times, Deadwood, Lawrence County; Chronicle, Custer, Custer County; Republican, Aberdeen Brown County; Exponent, Dell Rapids, Minnehaha County; Pioneer, Aberdeen, Brown County; Free Press, Plankinton, Aurora County; Herald, Grand Forks, Grand Forks County; Express, Egan, Moody County; Express, Pembina, Pembina County; Pioneer, Larimore, Grand Forks County; Farmer, Howard, Miner County; Advocate, Plankinton, Aurora County; Leader, DeSmet, Kingsbury County; Dispatch, Redfield, Spink County; News, Lake Preston, Kingsbury County; News Letter, Milbank, Grant County; Sentinel, Marion, Turner County; New Era, Parker, Turner County; Letcher Blade, Letcher, Davison County; Clark County Record, Clark; Argus, Sioux Falls, Minnehaha County; Canton Star, Lincoln County. Fifty-nine in all.

A brief extract from one of many well tempered articles follows:

The governor, Alexander Hughes, and other prominent capital removers, evidently miscalculated the temper of the people on the subject, or they would never have braved the tempest of denunciation now hurled at them from every quarter of the broad territory.

Comment by Parker, New Era:

Among all our numerous Dakota exchanges we fail to find one newspaper that upholds N. G. Ordway and the corrupt syndicate who have their paws on the throat of the capital. Individually, we were in favor of the removal of the capital, but wanted to see it done honestly and in the interest of the territory.

There was less indignation among the people shortly after the bill passed, than later. This was due to the numerous communities visited by the commission on their railroad journey and part of the Ordway plan to keep the people in an expectant mood, anticipating that their indignation would moderate as the days passed, and that the rival communities would find some gratification in the disappointment of their fellow sufferers. It may be safely presumed that all the points visited where bids were submitted, expected a decision in their favor, and their sentiment was naturally and diplomatically one of impatience towards the opposition to the method of removal. It should have been clear that the few northern people engaged in this piracy would not have located the capital at any point south, where it would have been more difficult to remove than from Yankton; for it was sure to be removed from Yankton, situated as it was on the extreme southern boundary, therefore remaining at Yankton left it in a position ready to be picked up whenever the Legislature so decided. Had Yankton been inclined to contest against its removal, its strongest security was the diversity of sentiment regarding another location. Had a vote been taken by the Legislature which passed this auction plan, no point would have received, probably, more than a fifth of the vote of both houses, except Yankton, which for the reason above stated, was quite secure against a removal by fair means until the question of division of the territory was settled.

It would be a grave injustice to North Dakota and its people to charge them with complicity in this corrupt scheme. It so happened that Ordway, McKenzie, Nickens, Williams, Walsh, and Roberts were North Dakota men, and certain members of the House were also North Dakota men, and every one of them supported with considerable energy the McKenzie enterprise, but the influence that governed them was not a home influence nor was the subject of capital removal suggested to them until they reached the Legislature and had entered on their duties. No doubt they were easily won for the support of the bill being appealed to by North Dakota leaders who may have explained to them that it was a measure of importance to their section of the territory. This circumstance of itself should have been sufficient to have put such conscientious councilmen as McAuley, of Spink, and Jerauld, of Lincoln, on their guard, the former of whom claimed that his support of the bill was given under a pledge from the leaders that the capital should be located at some point south of the 46th parallel. As Redfield was south of the 46th parallel, what else could such a pledge mean but that the seat of government should be located at Redfield? Mr. Myers did not recover from his disappointment and the shameless manner in which he had been betrayed for many months after the iniquitous prodigy was consummated. The controlling majority of the commission represented probably the Northern Pacific Railroad, and a clique of speculators who were in a position to know what the commission would do in time for their friends to place some investment at the favored point with the view of "unloading" when the grand rise came which would follow a public announcement that the commission, after the most diligent effort and scrutiny into every phase of the momentous problem, had finally concluded that the best interests of the people and the welfare of the territory had been the only objects sought to be accomplished in their final verdict.

In accordance with the resolutions of the commission, the bids for the capital were opened at Canton on the 15th of May, as follows:

Aberdeen, $100,000 and 160 acres of land; Pierre, $100,000 and 250 acres of land; Bismarck, $100,000 and 320 acres of land; Mitchell, $160,000 and 160 acres of land; Redfield, $100,000 and 240 acres of land; Ordway, $100,000 and 320 acres of land, and 100 acres of land for railroad; Canton, $100,000 and 160 acres of land; Frankfort, $100,000 and 160 acres of land; Huron, $100,000 and 160 acres of land; Odessa (Devil's Lake), $200,000 and 160 acres of land; Steele, $100,000 and 160 acres of land; Jamestown, $100,000 and $5,000 worth of land. (This bid was received after the bids had been opened, and was not considered.)

The commission did not make an award at the conclusion of this meeting, but adjourned to make further investigation of Northern Dakota points, and the propositions submitted by the section.

At this Canton meeting the legal process was served on the members of the board, requiring them to answer the quo warranto proceedings which had been instituted before Judge Edgerton, at Yankton.

The commission met at Fargo, on the 2d of June, and gave its final vote on the location of the capital, as follows:

For Bismarek, Hughes, McKenzie, Scott, Belden and DeLong—5; Redfield, Myers, Spaulding—2; Mitchell, Thompson, 1; Huron, Matthews, 1.

Shortly after the decision in favor of Bismarek, the Jamestown Alert, Jamestown being the home of Mr. Nickeus, on the N. P., said:

Large sales of real estate are being made at Bismarek. It is said Aleck McKenzie sold $250,000 worth yesterday, and that a half million dollars' worth has changed hands within the last couple of days.

June 5th, Governor Ordway was at Mandan, nearly opposite Bismarek, having come over on a special train from Bismarek. He was in company with Aleck McKenzie and Aleck Hughes, of the commission. Speaking to an assemblage of Mandan people who had turned out to give him a greeting, the governor said.

Bismarek is a first-class place for the capital. Yankton is too far away and the people are lacking in public spirit. Here you are in the center of the territory. I think you will soon have a railroad from Mandan to the Black Hills, and do you know, the location of the capital at Bismarek is going to do as much good for Mandan as for Bismarek itself?

The governor's reference to the center of the territory being near Mandan was a reflection of the new "war cry" that emanated from Bismarek at this time, declaring that "division was dead." The governor had all along opposed division of the territory and hence saw a stronger reason than ever why the territory should be admitted as one state, with the capital centrally located at Bismarek. This new declaration coming from the seat of division in the North, virtually accused the northern people of having been actuated only by a desire to secure the capital for Bismarek, in their long struggle for division. The sentiment was not pleasing, however, to the great majority of the people of the northern counties, and was repudiated by the press of the James and Red River valleys, though in later years it seemed to have an influence in weakening the desire for division in the northern and central counties of the territory.

John B. Raymond, who was at this time the delegate in Congress from the territory, and resided at Fargo, was urged by the Ordway and McKenzie influence to introduce a bill in Congress favoring the admission of Dakota as one state. This he refused to do on the ground that he had been elected upon a platform declaring emphatically for division, and he believed that it was still the sentiment of the people. For this cause the Bismarek leaders, including Ordway and McKenzie, resolved to defeat his renomination, which they succeeded in doing at the convention held at Pierre in 1884.

It was said by the Bismarek Tribune at the time the capital commission decided upon Bismarek for the capital:

We trusted in our magnificent country; the excellence of our location; the size of our bid; the integrity of the commission, and in God; and last, but by no means least, in the pluck and discretion of Alexander McKenzie. To him we owe all honor. His name even was a tower of strength, and in all North Dakota no man could have been found who could have better planned or better executed the work he had in hand. Those who knew him best knew he would not fail. He never fails.

Which confirms the statement that McKenzie went to Yankton equipped to remove the capital to Bismarek and to no other place, and all the swinging around the territory in a railroad train and receiving bids, was mere stage play.

The site for the new capitol building at Bismarek was selected in August, 1883. It had been decided that the main building would be 150 by 60 feet on the ground; and would consist of a sub-story or basement, surmounted with three stories, and would cost in the neighborhood of $250,000. The date of its completion was fixed at January 1, 1884. The foundations of the building were laid in August, and on the 18th of the month the directors awarded a contract to Charles W. Thompson, of Bismarck, to furnish material and construct the main building. There were several bids made, Mr. Thompson being the lowest, namely, $97,600. The plans of the buildings were taken from the capitol of Minnesota, reduced in form, and were furnished by Architect Buffington, of Minneapolis. These plans included the wings of the building, but the commission had concluded to defer the construction of the wings to a later period.

An interesting historical ceremony was the laying of the cornerstone of the new capitol on the 5th of September, 1883. A select assemblage of distinguished guests were present, among them ex-Pres. Ulysses S. Grant, and the German ambassador to the United States, whose title was Baron Von Eisendecker; also the president of the Northern Pacific, Mr. Henry Villard. During the ceremony of laying the stone, Governor Ordway read a brief greeting to the distinguished statesman of Germany, Count Bismarck, as follows:

We believe that this greeting will be welcome, coming from a distant land where so many Germans have found prosperity and happiness, and where your name is honored by all men, and from a city which bears that name, and which has become a center of commerce and civilization, and the capital of a great territory. Proud of our city's name, we are confident that our future career will not be unworthy of your highness, whose brilliant services in war and peace have achieved unity for the German people and greatness for the German empire.

With sentiments of profound respect we subscribe ourselves your highness's obedient servant.

This greeting was afterwards transmitted to Bismarck by the ambassador, to whom it was presented after being authenticated by Governor Ordway and signed by the mayor and councilmen of Bismarck. The German bar ambassador, in accepting it, said:

Mr. Governor—I accept this token of esteem for the German chancellor with gladness and pride. I am glad as the representative of the chancellor in receiving this important testimonial, and feel proud that I have been selected as such. I shall not fail to send the greeting to Prince Bismarck without delay, and I assure you that he will feel honored by such a remembrance from you all and from the city which bears his name. I can only wish for this city that you will make its name sound as well in this your own land, as the name of its prototype sounds in ours.

President Grant then made one of his brief sententious speeches, and was followed by President Villard, whereupon a "big feast," as it is termed in the neighborhood of the Indian country, followed. Not long after the following acknowledgment was received:

Foreign Office, Friedrichsruh, October 27, 1883.

To the Governor of Dakota Territory and Bismarck's Mayor.

Gentlemen: In response to the address of September last, so highly complimentary to myself, I would express my heartfelt thanks. I wish the young city, whose career I shall follow with the greatest interest, the rapid development which its fine situation and the energy and intelligence of its citizens give reason to anticipate.

BISMARCK.

Rev. Joseph Ward, pastor of the Congregational Church at Yankton, had been one of the first trustees of the Yankton Insane Hospital and had been of valuable service in setting the institution on its feet under Governor Howard, and had also accepted the same trust from Governor Ordway, but had resigned when he found that the affairs of the hospital were to be made a football of politics. His Sunday morning sermon, following the adjournment of the Legislature, was based upon the thirty-seventh Psalm, the entire psalm being taken for the text. Governor Ordway and his new attorney-general were present, as was their custom. Mr. Ward read the entire psalm in opening his discourse, a part of which is here reproduced:

Fret not thyself because of evil doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity.

STATE PENITENTIARY, BISMARCK, 1884

THE
AND
TILDEN FOUNDATIONS

For they shall soon be cut down like the grass, and wither as the green herb, Rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him. Fret not thyself because of him who prospereth in his way, because of the man who bringeth wicked devices to pass.
 Cease from anger and forsake wrath. Fret not thyself in anywise to do evil.
 For evil doers shall be cut off, but those that wait upon the Lord, they shall inherit the earth.

For yet a little while and the wicked shall not be; yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place and it shall not be.

But the meek shall inherit the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace.

The sermon made no direct allusion to the incidents of a local character, at the same time it was plainly intended as a reprimand to that class of iniquities embraced in false-swearing, bribe-taking and bribe-giving, betrayal of a public trust, corruption of public servants; the destruction of good government through the pernicious and wicked influences of dishonest public servants. There was a peculiar significance in the discourse given at this time, though such a sermon might with propriety be preached quite often as a fore-warning against wicked practices.

The civil list of Dakota's officials chargeable to the territory had grown rapidly under the fertilizing influence of the Legislature of 1883, and just before the final adjournment the governor sent the following list of appointments to the Council for confirmation. He had already sent in the appointments for treasurer and auditor:

Regents of the University at Vermillion—F. N. Burdick, of Vermillion (four years); J. L. Jolley, of Vermillion (four years); D. Elwell, of Sioux Falls (two years); E. T. Cressey, of Huron (two years).

Commissioners to Investigate the Financial Affairs of Yankton County—
 H. B. Wynn, C. J. B. Harris, A. W. Barber.

Regents of the University of North Dakota at Grand Forks—E. A. Healey, of Pembina (four years); C. E. Teele, of Grand Forks (four years); James Twombly, of Grand Forks (four years); W. T. Collins, of Grand Forks (two years); R. M. Evans, of Minto (two years).

Directors of the Northern Dakota Penitentiary at Bismarck—Alexander
 McKenzie, of Bismarck (six years); John A. McLean, of Bismarck (six years); John P. Dunn, of Bismarck (four years); C. A. Lounsberry, of Bismarck (four years); A. W. Edwards, of Fargo (two years); Joseph R. Miller, of Wahpeton (two years).

Directors of the Penitentiary at Sioux Falls—W. L. Dow, of Yankton;
 George P. Harvey, of Minto; R. H. Booth, of Sioux Falls.

Attorney-General—Alexander Hughes, of Yankton.

Members of the Commission to Consider and Equalize Taxation in the Territory—G. G. Bennett, of Deadwood; C. S. Palmer, of Yankton; E. P. Wells, of Jamestown.

Trustees of the North Dakota Agricultural College—N. K. Hubbard, of Fargo (four years); E. B. Eddy, of Fargo (three years); G. W. Vennum, of Jamestown (two years); Walter Brown, of Larimore (one year).

Regents of the Agricultural College at Brookings—George Morehouse, of Brookings (four years); E. P. Smith, of Brookings (four years); J. W. Shannon, of Huron; O. A. Ringsrud, of Elk Point; John A. Owen, of DeSmet.

Directors of the Brookings Agricultural College—W. G. Lockhart, of Brookings; George W. Hopp, of Brookings; George H. Hand, of Yankton.

Grain Inspectors—John Fadden, of Grand Forks; I. E. West, of Yankton.

Trustees of the Deaf Mute Asylum of Sioux Falls—E. A. Sherman, of Sioux Falls; Jonathan Dunham, of Valley Springs; William VanEps, of Sioux Falls; N. C. Nash, of Canton; E. B. Dawson, of Lodi.

Trustees of the Yankton Insane Asylum—J. R. Sanborn, of Yankton; F. J.
 Dewitt, of Yankton; B. R. Wagner, of Bon Homme.

Trustees of the Jamestown Insane Asylum—F. E. James, of Jamestown; Lewis Lynn, of Jamestown; J. B. Hull, of Fargo; M. G. Cushing, of Valley City; George W. Pierce, of Brookings.

FORMAL DELIVERY OF THE NEW PENITENTIARY

The new penitentiary of Dakota Territory had been completed and formally opened but a few weeks prior to the assembling of the Legislature in January, 1883; and agreeable to the request of the builders of the institution, and its newly elected officials, and by special invitation of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company, the governor, territorial officers and the members and officers of the Legislature, together with a few invited private citizens, made an official visit to the new institution on Monday, January 15, 1883.

At Sioux Falls the visitors were landed at the prison and spent several hours inspecting it. C. W. Koehler, of the Detroit House of Correction, had been appointed warden. Thirty prisoners from the Detroit House of Correction had been safely removed to the home prison, and were then being cared for. There were a very few prisoners whose terms of confinement would soon expire who were not removed. After the inspection the visitors accepted an invitation from the warden to take a prison dinner. An invocation by Reverend Mr. Dooliver, chaplain of the Council, preceded the collation, at the conclusion of which the formal exercises of turning the property over to the territory took place. These consisted of a delivery of the title deeds of the land and the keys of the prison to the executive of the territory, and by him entrusted to the proper officers.

Hon. Thomas H. Brown, of Sioux Falls, chairman of the board of penitentiary directors, initiated these formalities with the following address:

Governor Ordway, on behalf of the board of directors, it becomes my duty to present to you, as the executive of the territory, the keys and title deeds of the Dakota Penitentiary. We may not present for the inspection of the Legislative Assembly so large and fully completed a prison as may be found in some of the states. While we have made plans and constructed a larger and more complete prison than was contemplated when the appropriation was made; we trust we shall be able to show you that no money has been wasted, and that you have received full value for every dollar entrusted to our care. In this connection I may be permitted to say that we would be wanting in gratitude if we should fail to acknowledge the great services which the directors have received from the executive. I also desire to add that to the executive and Legislative Assembly, the directors and officers of this institution should always look for advice and assistance in properly caring for the unfortunate convicts who are to be left within the walls. In the selection of officers, we have sought to transfer the same humane but, firm prison discipline so successfully carried out at the House of Correction at Detroit, from which place most of those now here have been removed.

Governor Ordway then responded with the following words:

Mr. Chairman of the Penitentiary Board: As the executive of the Territory of Dakota, and on behalf of the Legislative Assembly, I receive from your hands the keys of the Dakota Penitentiary, and formally transfer them to the custody of Mr. Koehler, whom the board of penitentiary directors have chosen and who has qualified as warden. The title deeds of the eighty acres of land provided for in the act of the last Legislative Assembly, with the prison and appurtenances, I will now present for the inspection of the officers and committees of the Legislative Assembly now present, after which, if found to be valid, the title deeds to the property will be deposited with the territorial treasurer.

I endorse fully the suggestion that the territory has received full value for every dollar expended under the penitentiary board, and I confess that it is no small satisfaction for me to know that you have built and substantially completed a prison that does honor to the architect, to the superintendent and secretary of the board. It is an imposing structure, made from material that will not wear away nor deface, and I trust will stand long after those of us who are here will have passed away, as a monument of the faithfulness and economy of all who have had the work in charge. An inspection of the interior arrangement and of the prison proper, I trust, will convince the members of the Legislature that the convenience and comfort of the prisoners have not been ignored. Ample ventilation, with the proper amount of light and heat, has been secured with an evenness and certainty that ought to insure health to the convicts. If my advice and assistance to the board of directors has aided in securing to the territory one of the best arranged, though small penitentiaries, I shall feel more than repaid by this successful accomplishment of what all public officers should aim at—perfection of the work entrusted to their hands. The discipline of the prison and the proper utilization of the labor of the convicts will be subjects for careful consideration by the proper committee of the Legislative Assembly.

I cannot too strongly commend the humanity and kindness with which Dakota's convicts have been treated, so far as I have been able to learn at the Detroit House of Correction, and I cannot but anticipate but what Warden Koehler will bring the same discipline and humane treatment to perfection in the new field in which he has recently entered.

There had been an appropriation of $30,000 by the general government for the construction of a United States prison in Dakota, but it was held by the department that this fund could not be used with the territorial fund for the building of a common penitentiary, and a compromise was made by which the general government constructed its building in the form of a wing to the territorial penitentiary, using the east wall of the main building for one wall of the Government structure.

The penitentiary was removed from Bon Homme County and located at Sioux Falls, under the act of the Legislature of 1881, which appropriated $50,000 in territorial bonds to defray the expense of constructing the prison. Thomas H. Brown, Richard H. Booth and W. L. Dow, late of Governor Ordway's old county in New Hampshire, were appointed by the governor as the board of directors, and Mr. Dow, a very capable man, was employed as architect. The improvements planned consisted of a main building, two cell wings, detached laundry building, solitary cells, a female prison, hospital and boiler house. The main building, 54 by 71 feet on the ground, 40 feet high, and the west wing, 51 by 77½ feet and 32 feet high. The east wing was then under construction by the Federal Government, and would duplicate the west wing. The walls of the structure were laid up with Sioux Falls stone, three feet in thickness, inside partitions of brick, corridors and stairways of iron.

The members of the Legislature also visited the deaf mute school while in the city.

On the return trip, the following day, the legislative party halted at Vermillion, where the territorial university was under construction. This institution had been located at Vermillion in 1862, at the session which located the capital at Yankton and the penitentiary at Bon Homme. The university was three stories in height, built of Sioux Falls stone, with an iron roof. No appropriation had been made for constructing the university, but Clay County had voted aid to the amount of $10,000 to defray the expense of building, and presented it to the territory, with a tract of land covering forty acres. Dr. Eph. Epstein had been elected president of the university, and Bartlett Tripp, of Yankton, Judge Jefferson P. Kidder, F. N. Burdick, John L. Jolley and A. L. Lee, of Vermillion, the board of trustees. Mr. Burdick was secretary of the board.

The Legislature of 1883 provided for the erection of a Northern Dakota penitentiary at Bismarck, authorizing the issue of $50,000 in territorial bonds to defray the expense of constructing such building; Bismarck, as a condition of securing such institution, to furnish forty acres of land within a radius of one mile of the corporate limits of the city as a site for the buildings and improvements. The directors appointed to supervise the execution of the work were W. L. Dow, Alexander McKenzie and John P. Dunn. The contract for the building was awarded to Morgan & Kelly, of Fargo, who stipulated to furnish all material and perform all the work, and turn the building over completed by June 1, 1884, for the sum of $52,000. Other bids were submitted, but all were for some subdivision of the work.

ORDWAY AND TELLER CORRESPONDENCE

Governor Ordway had been extremely anxious that Mr. Teller, the secretary of the territory, should remove his office to Bismarck, and thus recognize that point as the capital. Mr. Ralph Wheelock, then of Mitchell, and a brother-in-law of Mr. Teller, had been chosen secretary of the capital commission, and though his qualifications for the position were ample and his character of the best, the selection was undoubtedly influenced by the considerations that had governed the capital removal syndicate in procuring the passage of their bill; but Mr. Teller failed to be the least influenced by the appointment of his relative, and it is doubtless true that he knew nothing of it until it was announced. He had concluded to remain at Yankton while the litigation over the removal was pending. Finally the governor issued a peremptory order directing the secretary to remove, to which the secretary made reply, refusing compliance. This took place after the governor had exhausted his efforts of a personal nature and through agents, and the reply explains the secretary's position and why he did not finally remove until the assembling of the Legislature in 1885. The correspondence follows:

Territory of Dakota, Governor's Office, Bismarck, Special Order.

Hon. James H. Teller, Secretary of the Territory of Dakota.

Greeting: In pursuance with section 1885 of the Organic Act and other United States laws; also an act of the Legislative Assembly, approved March 8, 1883, entitled "an act to provide for the location of the seat of government of the Territory of Dakota, and for the erection of public buildings thereat" which act specifically repeals chapter one of the political code which established the seat of government in the City of Yankton, Yankton County, also by the express provisions of sections 1, 4, 16 and 17, of the act passed by the Legislative Assembly and approved March 8th, as aforesaid, hereby annexed, which provisions of United States and territorial laws have fixed and located the seat of government and capital of the Territory of Dakota in the City of Bismarck at a point described and set forth in the annexed copy of an opinion of the territorial attorney general. You are therefore hereby authorized, directed and ordered to remove the office of the secretary of the territory, archives, books, records, papers, seal, and all public property in your possession or under your control, except the legislative furniture and territorial library, from the former seat of government at Yankton, to the City of Bismarck, County of Burleigh, in said territory, within fifteen days from the date hereof, which place has become by operation of law, the seat of government and capital of the Territory of Dakota; at which place all of the public offices of the territory shall hereafter be kept, and where all the legislative assemblies of the territory shall hereafter be held, and the public business transacted.

In order to meet the expense of the change contemplated in this order, I enclose a draft on the United States treasury for the sum of $250.00, which I have set apart from the contingent fund appropriated by Congress to be used at the discretion of the governor for this purpose.

Given under my hand at Bismarck, the seat of government and capital of Dakota Territory, this 11th day of September, 1883.

(Signed) N. G. ORDWAY, Governor of Dakota Territory.

SECRETARY TELLER'S REPLY

Territory of Dakota, Secretary's Office,
Yankton, September 24, 1883.

Hon. N. G. Ordway, Governor of the Territory of Dakota.

Sir: Your special order, dated September 11th, directing me within fifteen days thereafter to remove the records of this office to Bismarck, was delivered to me at a late hour on Saturday, the 22d instant.

Some four weeks since I informed the representative of Bismarck, who was sent to confer with me upon the removal of this office to that place, that I did not consider the proposed removal advisable, giving at the same time my reasons therefor. I was informed that the conference was brought about with your knowledge and approval, and inasmuch as the considerations urged upon me were the same as had been previously urged by you, I had every reason to believe that such was the fact. I regard it safe, therefore, to infer that you were at the date of this order aware of my decision and the reasons upon which it was based. The order then, is, in effect, a denial of the correctness of my position at that time announced, and indicates a purpose to subordinate the office of which I am for the time being the incumbent, and to attach to it limitations and duties for which I find neither law nor precedent, and which I cannot therefore permit to pass unchallenged.

I am not aware of the existence of any United States statute which empowers the governor of a territory to control or interfere in any manner with the secretary in the discharge of the duties of his office. The territorial law under which the order purports to be issued, could not affect this office, even were its validity in other respects unquestioned, as a territorial secretary is an officer of the general Government and not of the territory. The opinion of the attorney general of the territory accompanying the order, cannot be admitted as authority in this case. It is no part of his duty to construe the laws of the United States for the officers of the general Government, and so far as my action is concerned, his opinion can have no more weight than properly attaches to it from its intrinsic legal value. It affords no support to the order except such as may be found in the territorial law, which, as has been stated, is not regarded as material to the question at issue. The sole requirement of the United States statutes in the matter is that the secretary shall keep his office within the territory. It may be admitted, perhaps, that the keeping of his office at the seat of government is implied in the subsequent provisions for a seat of government and from its obvious necessity to proper discharge of the duties of the office. Be this as it may, the propriety of its location at the seat of government is beyond question. When, however, there is a question as to the actual location of the seat of government, it is I maintain, the right of the secretary, in the absence of a judicial determination of the question, to decide for himself whether or not a change in the location of his office is called for. This, it should be observed, does not call for a decision by the secretary that a place is or is not the legally established seat of government, but simply that under existing circumstances a change is or is not desirable. In any event, if this office is subject to removal by order, such order must come from the head of the department to which it is properly subordinate. The records and property which I am ordered to remove are without exception the property of the United States Government and for such I am responsible to the Government. Leaving this responsibility alone, I cannot admit the right of any one not authorized to relieve me of such responsibility, to control me in the disposal and care of the property involved.

Acting upon this understanding of my rights and duties in the premises, I decided on the occasion before mentioned not to remove this office to Bismarck. Since that time, however, the subject has been in no small degree relieved of difficulty by the decision of Chief Justice Edgerton, adjudging the law for the removal of the seat of governments invalid and of no effect. As a sworn officer of the government, I recognize a peculiar obligation to regard not only the letter but the spirit of the law, and as this decision is the law until reversed by a court of competent jurisdiction, I cannot consent to be a party to any act which will appear to disregard it. I must, therefore, refuse to comply with the order for the transfer of this office to Bismarck. I hope there will be no misunderstanding of my reasons for this conclusion. I have no desire to assist in the settlement of the claims of the respective towns to capital honors, nor am I inclined in the slightest degree to become a party to the controversy known as the "capital question." I have endeavored to consider the matter wholly free from personal considerations and in the light only of my duty as a public officer.

The substance of the order having been made public by persons whose knowledge of its contents was obtained prior to its delivery to me, and contrary to what I should have advised, I deem it due to you as well as to myself—the matter being in a certain sense one of public concern—that the order and this reply to it be published, to the end that neither of us be misunderstood.

I return the draft enclosed for the expenses of removal; and beg to subscribe myself,

Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

JAMES H. TELLER, Secretary of the Territory of Dakota.

CAPITAL REMOVAL—YANKTON SENTIMENT

Owing to the tendency of human nature to attribute a proportion of this popular indignation to Yankton influences, which may be supposed to have magnified and distorted the events so widely complained of and bitterly denounced, it should be stated, in justice to the Yankton community that of nearly all the communities in the territory Yankton betrayed no indication of harboring any greater indignation than was felt and openly expressed in nine-tenths of the territory. It may be truthfully averred that no occurrence of any character had ever before aroused such widespread indignation and met with such overwhelming rebuke as this flagrant legislative travesty, called a law, framed and executed in iniquity.

The intelligent citizens of Yankton were not much concerned pecuniarily whether the capital remained at Yankton. It brought profit to very few. They felt that a great fraud had been perpetrated, or was in course of perpetration, for they had seen and been compelled to realize it, and that the most corrupt methods had been resorted to by the majority of the Legislature of 1883 to procure the scandalous legislation.

But as concerning the loss of the capital, if it had been lost, there was no sense of material loss among the people. The citizens had not infrequently considered, during past years, whether the possession of the capital was an advantage to their city or a disadvantage. The arguments, pro and con, were familiar to all the people. They had never felt that it was permanently located in their city, and so feeling would look at the material conditions which would be affected by a removal of the institution.

Its direct advantages were not of a character to promote the improvement of the city except in the matter of hotel accommodations. The biennial sessions of the Legislature for sixty days increased the population not more than one hundred. The expenditures of the Federal Government on account of the capital were for the per diem of the officers and members of the Legislature, the rent of legislative halls, the rent of offices for the governor and for the secretary, and $2,500 for public printing for each biennial term. The officers known as territorial officers, auditor, treasurer and superintendent of schools, were kept by the incumbents at their several places of business, though until Ordway's coming in the law allowed these officials to keep their offices at such point as they might select, which most frequently was at some other point than Yankton.

Against these advantages and pecuniary rewards was the envy or jealousy of other communities who held that Yankton was not entitled to the capital, and who never failed to make the situation an unpleasant one whenever they aired their opinions. Yankton was the most convenient and better prepared than any other for a long series of years for holding territorial conventions of any character, but other points were selected in a majority of instances because Yankton had the capital, and "it couldn't have everything." Then there was the suppositious ring or cabal of politicians that were gratuitously presumed to have their lair at the capital and wanted to control the politics and the appointments of the territory, and many an ambition for a Federal plum was strangled in its budding period because the aspirant resided at the capital, and it would awaken a never-ceasing feeling of gratitude among the people of another county to have that appointment go elsewhere. The capital never built a rod of railroad, nor an industry, nor established any business. It did not bring the steamboat trade, nor induce the cement works. Whatever Yankton received in this respect she must have received had the capital been located elsewhere.

Yankton had long since been laid on the shelf so far as furnishing a candidate for delegate to Congress was concerned, and as for Federal patronage (appointments were so called), the general disposition was that it was better for the capital that they should go to citizens of other towns, but it will be borne in mind that the people of the territory had little or no influence in securing Federal appointments beyond the postmasterships. A resident of the territory who aspired to a Federal office usually secured the assurance that there would be no stumbling blocks placed in his path by his territorial neighbors, then hied himself back to his old eastern home where through friends he could enlist the service and assistance of a senator and congressman, and through them reach the ear of the appointing power, and even then come back to the territory without a commission. There must be a charm in holding an office, and it must be a natural ambition with most of us to strive for place and power. Even King David is represented as saying, "I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my Lord than to dwell in the tents of the ungodly."

Governor Ordway was the first governor of Dakota that had made it a part of his business to control the appointment of Federal officers in the territory. He was forearmed as to the time a Federal officer's commission would expire; he would then notify his senatorial friends in New Hampshire and Vermont, who would be able to have a candidate ready for the succession. Young Joe Chandler, son of the secretary of the navy, a New Hampshire citizen, secured the Yankton land office, succeeding Hughes, of capital commission fame, and Assistant United States Attorney C. S. Palmer, of Vermont, when appointed, was able to secure the position of associate justice of the Supreme Court of Dakota to succeed Judge Kidder, deceased, just in time to cast the deciding vote in favor of the legality of the capital commission. Mr. Tebbetts, who figured as the alleged agent of Governor Ordway in the Faulk County seat bribery case, was from New Hampshire, and held his position in the governor's kitchen cabinet as a friend and former business partner of his son George. Mr. W. A. Dow, the architect of the insane hospital and Sioux Falls penitentiary and other public institutions, and also a trustee of numerous institutions, was brought out by the governor from New Hampshire.

The headquarters of territorial or state politics is not desirable for a business community. Business enterprises are sometimes thwarted by revengeful politicians. Judging from the career of Yankton—its prosperity following this capital removal excitement—it must be admitted that the loss of the seat of territorial government was not in the slightest degree a retarder of Yankton's progress.

Its James River Valley remained. Its business invited an increase of railway facilities, and though never a "booming" town, its improvement denotes that its prosperity was constant and substantial, dependent entirely upon its natural location and natural advantages and the enterprise of its people. And looking abroad upon the capitals of our territories and states, one is led to the conviction that a capital adds very little to the resources of a community. Yankton College has been of more worth to the city, a hundred fold, than a capital would be. It is permanent and its benefits increase as time passes; while the Dakota Hospital for the Insane yields possibly twenty fold more in the shape of patronage.

While in Washington Ordway was solicitous for the credit of Dakota, and frequently cautioned his acquaintance in Congress when they were considering the Dakota division and admission measures, that great care must be taken to embody in them certain safeguards, to prevent the people of Dakota from misusing the privileges given them, for they were largely controlled by reckless influences that would countenance all sorts of extravagance—in fact were not a people that could be trusted to manage their public affairs wisely and prudently, and at the same moment he was prepared himself to become the leader in the most scandalous of extravagances, permitting his executive approval to be held out as a reward to those who would aid his schemes, and denying it with his veto to such as would not be coerced with his threats and bribes.

The great wealth of the territory in natural resources of the most valuable varieties—and possibly the wide publicity given to the shameful conspiracy, and the unanimity of the people in denouncing it, with the energetic and intelligent efforts to promote statehood, were of great value in off-setting the pernicious effects of this great crime of 1883.

INDIGNATION MEETING AT YANKTON

A meeting was held at Yankton on Saturday the 21st of April, for the purpose of discussing the capital removal topic. Hon. John R. Gamble was made chairman. Hon. R. F. Pettigrew, who had just retired from the office of delegate to Congress was present, and the principal object of the meeting was to hear an address from the ex-delegate. George R. Scougal was made secretary of the meeting.

Upon taking the chair, Mr. Gamble made a brief speech, stating that it was not out of order for him as chairman, and as the Yankton County member of the Legislature of 1881, to discuss the situation relative to corruption in that Legislature in connection with the attempt to remove the capital. It was the first time in two years he had had an opportunity to appear before a Yankton audience to discuss the legislative matters of that session. It was his fortune to know the chief mover, the chief corruptor within the capital syndicate, N. G. Ordway, and he was prepared to say that the same man who planned the move at the recent session, planned it on a different basis two years ago. He commenced lobbying for it then, and bent every energy, through himself, his son, and another one of his Hughes County appointees to trade off the capital. In that Legislature the question reduced itself to a quarrel with the executive or a betrayal of the interests of Yankton County. Ordway attempted to dictate all legislation, and it remained for the Legislature to unite against him in the interests of their constituents. In the City of Washington the speaker said he had not found a single person to speak a good word for Ordway. He was there mentioned as a jobber and a trader. A citizen of New Hampshire had said he was glad the people of Dakota had finally found Ordway out, and was sorry they had not found him out sooner. The capital removal scheme had been gotten up in corruption, adopted without authority of law, and had been put up by a crowd of speculators. The syndicate had said that they came here to speculate on Dakota's capital,—McKenzie had told Mr. Gamble so. Ordway originated the scheme. It was probable that a dozen members of the Legislature had propositions made to them to control their votes upon the capital removal bill. It was no secret that such means were being used. The standing invitation was "Come in and get rich. Catch on to the band wagon." This was the general talk during the pendency of the bill. There was no concealment about it. At the conclusion of Mr. Gamble's remarks he introduced Mr. Pettigrew, who spoke substantially as follows:

I have not come here to tell the people anything new about the Legislature or about Ordway, as you know all about the subject. It has been heralded abroad, and I learned all the details of the affair while out of Dakota. The last Legislature and the governor by their acts had earned the bad reputation given the territory by the public assertions of Ordway. The general outside expression was that Dakota could not deny Ordway's charges after last session's developments. Whatever might now be said regarding the executive would work him no injustice, his past record was worse than his recent record. There was not a New Hampshire member of Congress but would gladly go to the President and insist upon Ordway's removal from his present position if they could receive a guarantee that he would not go back to New Hampshire. The late vice president of the United States had said to Mr. Pettigrew that it was useless to ask if Ordway was in the capital job—if he was not, he had reformed since he left Washington.

The remedy which the people of Dakota have against the continuance of Ordway as governor, is to express their indignation and formulate charges and present them to the President. We should promulgate an indictment and appoint a committee to take it to Washington, and insist upon Ordway's removal. It will surely succeed with the charges made and proven. This subject has already been discussed in the President's cabinet, and there is already a strong feeling in that body in favor of Ordway's removal.

I do not believe the people of Yankton are moving in this matter simply for the retention of the capital. Their energy indicates that they could build a better and bigger city without the capital than with it. No community which was compelled to devote one-half its time to politics could give enough attention to business. Regarding the Capital Commission, if it was a constitutional organization, and was disposed to work by daylight, I would not be disposed to denounce it. The method by which it was created is particularly obnoxious. The Legislature has traded off my money and the money of others to secure votes for the bill. It had created offices and established public buildings which were not needed, and the people must pay for them. The permanent location of Dakota's capital is yet premature. Dakota should be divided upon the forty-sixth parallel, and when that division is made the location of the capital will be in order. When this is accomplished and matters so arranged that the state can own a couple thousand acres of land in the proper place upon which to locate the capital, I would not object.

Nine commissioners have been selected to carry out the provisions of the capital bill. This is one appointee for the seven members of the council who voted for the bill, and two appointees for the governor. Burdick had named Thompson. Jerauld had named DeLong. McCauley named Myers. Nickens named McKenzie. Roberts named Spaulding. Walsh named Scott. Scooby named Matthews, and the governor named Hughes and Belding. The reason the number was fixed at nine was because it took nine to go round and not because there was any special need of having nine members on the commission. Each man who voted for the bill must have his reward and the governor must be recompensed for signing it. The commissioners were not selected because they were large taxpayers, or because they were particularly honest or able, but because they had been traded on to secure the passage of the bill. Extensive appropriations had been made and forty or fifty new offices created, to gain votes for the bill. The bill was full of corruption. Every one felt it and knew it, though tangible proofs might be hard to produce. The governor had given positions to his tools in the interest of the capital scheme and had appointed his own son to audit their accounts. The newspaper fraternity of Dakota was largely represented in the list of his appointees, the object undoubtedly being to control in his own interest the papers edited by the men to whom he had given positions.

Mr. Pettigrew gave as the first cause of Ordway's hostility to himself, his rejection of a proposition made by Ordway. Shortly after Ordway became governor he proposed that Mr. Pettigrew join hands with him, and that together they could control the appointments for Dakota, the Press and the leading politicians, and through their influence could control the organization of the state, the construction of public buildings, and the profits flowing therefrom. Mr. Pettigrew said he rejected the offer, and Ordway then told him he would open a fight and defeat his renomination for Congress. Mr. Pettigrew said he told Ordway that it was possible he might accomplish this, but he could not take away his self respect.

Remarks were made by Councilman Dewey regarding his experiences in the late Legislature, resolutions were adopted, and the meeting adjourned. The remarks of Delegate Pettigrew were of importance at the time. His accusation that Ordway endeavored to form a corrupt combination with him shortly after his arrival in the territory, is in keeping with the effort he made to enlist Editor Caldwell, of Sioux Falls, and Editor Bowen, of Yankton, in a like combination. It would seem that the governor had formed a plan to get control of the territory and its patronage among the first of his transactions after being appointed, and that he adhered to this plan, though often defeated and debased, as long as he remained governor.

TERRITORIAL INDIGNATION MEETING AT SIOUX FALLS

A call was issued on the 20th of March, 1883, from Sioux Falls, calling a mass convention at that place on the 5th of April following to consider the general political situation which was now exhibiting symptoms of much turmoil. The call was in the language following:

The citizens of Southeastern Dakota are requested to meet at Germania Hall, Sioux Falls, on Thursday, April 5, 1883, at 8 o'clock P. M., for the purpose of determining upon definite and concerted action for defeating the infamous scheme with which the governor and last Legislature of Dakota have disgraced the territory. The sentiment is almost unanimous that something should be done to relieve the territory from the bad repute it has secured and may still suffer. The problem is to determine what plan promises the best results. It is for the discussion of plans that this meeting is called, and the people of the different counties and towns of Southeastern Dakota were invited to attend in order that whatever is undertaken may be that which shall be wise and effective. This mass meeting was attended by a large number of people. Col. John H. King, of Chamberlain, was chosen chairman, and A. J. Parshall, of Hanson County, secretary. Delegates were present from the counties of Minnehaha, Brown, Lincoln, Union, Clay, Yankton, Bon Homme, Douglas, Brule, Aurora, Davison, Hanson, McCook, Lake, Beadle, Moody and Grant. A number of addresses were made during the evening, condemnatory of the course of the governor and Legislature of 1883, in saddling an immense debt upon the territory, a large portion of which was unnecessary and not called for in the least degree by the public interest; and also for the questionable methods employed in making the capital commission.

There was also some opposition expressed to the purpose of the meeting by the delegates from Huron who deprecated hasty action, insisting that the commission should be given time to justify itself; a delegate from Canton shared this view and one of the Sioux Falls representatives was opposed to the object of the gathering. With these exceptions the assembly was apparently united in condemning the methods which had been employed to secure the enactment of the bill virtually at a cost to the territory of over a quarter million dollars.

Following the addresses, the Committee on Resolutions reported the following, which were practically unanimously adopted.

Whereas, A people are in a measure identified with and responsible for any wrong which they permit and tolerate without opposition; and whereas, the people of Dakota stand charged today, throughout the country, with complicity in the project for the relocation of the territorial capital on a plan to further a real estate speculation; and whereas, the methods used for securing the adoption of this project are of such notoriously corrupt and disgraceful character, involving the reputation of the chief executive and a number of the members of the last Legislature; and whereas, the citizens of Dakota have, as against the men who have thus disgraced them and their territory, no ready recourse other than to publicly and formally denounce them and thus free themselves of the odium which attaches to Dakotans generally for the misdeeds of these officers; therefore be it

Resolved, That we, as representatives of different portions of Southeastern Dakota, hereby express our condemnation of the gigantic fraud referred to, which was made possible by Gov. N. G. Ordway's venality and the prostitution of the powers of his position, and by a co-operation of a majority of the last Legislature, secured either through corruption or timidity; and be it further

Resolved, That we denounce the conspirators and perpetrators of this iniquity as unworthy the positions which they have disgraced, and that it is our earnest prayer that Dakota may be relieved of the official who has been a discredit to the territory and a continual cause of strifes and discords, which have done much harm.

Resolved, That an executive committee be appointed by this convention to inquire into any malfeasance on the part of Governor Ordway, in connection with the enactment of the capital removal bill; and if the facts developed warrant such proceedings, to formulate charges therein, present them to the President of the United States, and demand his removal, and in case of failure to act on the part of the President, to present such charges to the House of Representatives of the United States for investigation with a view to his impeachment.

The following persons were appointed the Executive Committee: Lincoln County, O. S. Gifford; Union County, J. A. Wallace; Clay County, E. B. Dawson; Yankton County, J. R. Gamble; Charles Mix, M. T. Post; Bon Homme, F. M. Ziebach; Douglas County, K. G. Foster; Brule County, J. H. King; Aurora County, A. M. Andrews; Hutchinson County, J. C. Boyles; Davison County, H. C. Greene; Hanson County, A. J. Parshall; Turner County, Vale P. Thielmann; McCook County, J. F. Norton; Lake County, C. B. Kennedy; Hughes County, M. L. Ledwich; Hand County, T. M. Wilkins; Beadle County, A. Davis; Miner, C. H. Van Tassel; Moody County, George Rice; Codington County, A. C. Mellette; Grant County, J. W. Bell; Brookings, L. P. McClarren; Deuel County, H. H. Herrick; Clark County, Wm. Lamb; Lawrence County, G. C. Moody; Pennington County, Fred J. Cross.

The meeting then adjourned subject to the call of the chairman.

The proceedings of the Legislature of 1883 were such as to justify in great part the scandalous reports Ordway had made to congressmen and to the public through his interviews of the reckless extravagance of the people through their legislatures and in their county affairs, and the need of safeguarding the state constitutions against this recklessness, which certainly could not have been more corruptly and recklessly displayed than in many of the transactions of the Legislature of 1883 to which the governor was not only a party but a principal and one of the chief intriguers, and his bold and shameless connection with the wrongdoing seemed to vindicate the charges that had been made against him by Delegate Pettigrew who had been constantly annoyed by his gratuitous and impertinent intermeddling with the delegate's duties during his entire term. Ordway at this time appeared to have thrown off his disguise and appeared in his true hypocritical character. He had played the Jekyll and Hyde part with some success and had won the favorable opinion of many respectable and influential people of the territory, who had been influenced by his oft-repeated assertions through the public prints that he was only anxious for the good name of Dakota, and to strengthen its credit abroad, and to induce the best people of the land to make their homes here, while every intelligent person in the territory must have known that for years before Ordway came to Dakota with a federal commission its good name had been untarnished, its credit was at the world over, and the best people of the land had been coming within its borders. The flagrant rascality of the majority of the Legislature of 1883, led by himself, could not tarnish its reputation though it might for a time stain it, nor impair its credit, nor check the inflow of a high order of population.

The pastor of the Baptist Church, Rev. G. J. Travis, who had been the chaplain of the House, preached a sermon later from this text:

For the congregation of hypocrites shall be desolate, and fire shall consume the tabernacles of bribery.—Job XV, 34.

(Paragraphs from the sermon.) The very air is filled with the numbing, palsyng, death-dealing poisons of political bribery. It may be that Dakota air, especially in the vicinity of the City of Yankton, is more charged with it than at other places, still judging from the press of the territory, it seems it is a prevalent disease all over our fair commonwealth. The press, within the limits of our empire territory, has everywhere lifted up its voice in clear and distinct tones against the gigantic evil which has lately been concocted within our city limits, and now it is time that the pulpit speak out with a voice of thunder against it. Let every pulpit in the territory be true to the interests of the common people, and demand that the men who are engaged in this nefarious business "step down and out." It may be that Dakota ministers have been watching the Yankton pastors to see how they will treat this monstrous sin, especially those who stood nearest the conspiracy in the humble capacity of chaplains.

From the very first, your speaker, as a citizen of the territory, in a private way, has taken decided grounds against this syndicate business. He believes it to be the biggest piece of scoundrelism, villainy and knavery that has ever been or can ever be enacted in the Territory of Dakota. The pulpit is not too good a place to denounce such an infamous transaction. It is quite possible that the words now spoken in your ears may be carried to the centers of influence and power within the limits of the fairest clime of the fairest territory that God's sweet light ever shone upon, and then if they shall contribute to arouse men's minds to the enormity of this evil and make them act for the right, the object of this address will be accomplished.

What is a bribe? According to Worcester it is a "reward given to anyone, especially a judge, an officer, or a voter, in order to corrupt or influence his conduct." The meaning of the word has not changed in its essential significance for the last 4,000 years. It is the same since the 1st of January, 1883, as it was in the time of Job, in the time of Moses, in the time of David, and in the time of Eli, whose sons turned aside after filthy lucre and took bribes and perverted judgments. It is said to be a natural propensity to feel that every element of power is to be employed as much as possible for one's own use and that its benefits should be conferred, not on those who best deserve them, but on those who pay most for them. The sin of bribery is so deeply seated among the oriental races that most attempts to eradicate it have proved futile. It is difficult to get the oriental mind to understand how it is reasonable to expect the temptation of a bribe to be resisted. In matters of personal violence or fraud, there is generally some person immediately injured in the act who can give detection to the offender, but in the offense of the perpetration of bribery, which most people believe was the means of the passage of the capital removal bill—a bill which it is safe to say nineteen-twentieths of the taxpayers of the territory believe to have been passed by the lowest and vilest methods of bribery—it is very difficult to get at the root of the matter unless backed by public sentiment. The press of the territory are making a grand fight against the fraudulent syndicate business and have carried the people with them; now let the pulpit speak in trumpet tones that the people may be aroused to such a pitch of holy indignation that the public thieves and plunderers may repent in dust and ashes because they attempted to steal $2,000,000 from the pockets of the people of the territory.

In the penal code, section 774 defines the word bribe: "The term bribe signifies any money, goods, right in action, property, things of value or advantage, present or prospective, or any promise or undertaking to give anything asked, given or accepted with corrupt intent to influence, unlawfully, the person to whom it is given, in his action, vote or opinion in any public or official capacity."

Will any fair-minded man say that he who holds certain bills in his hands, using the veto power as an axe held over the head of certain members until he is assured by them that they will vote for a certain other measure, that this act does not fall under the head of bribery? And should not a person proven guilty of this, suffer the full penalty of the law, which is "imprisonment in the territorial prison not exceeding ten years, or by fine not exceeding $5,000, or both."

How we all remember the terrible tragedy of the credit mobilier. Many a reputation, otherwise clear and pure, went down under the subtle power of the briber. Ex-Vice President Colfax, whom many of us believe to be innocent, will never be lifted out of the suspicion that he was bribed. It was under the temptation of bribery that Benedict Arnold sold the fort in the Highlands for $31,573. For this crime Ahithophel forsook David, and Judas betrayed Christ for the petty sum of $15. During Walpole's administration in England, there is no doubt that members of Parliament were paid in cash for votes, and the memorable saying that "every man has his price" has been preserved as a characteristic indication of his method of government. Listen to the confession of Sir Francis Bacon. He was lord chancellor of England, the leading thinker of his country, having already a very large income that would seem to have put him beyond the temptation of bribery—$36,000 a year besides princely estates—yet under this temptation he fell and confessed that he had taken bribes because all his predecessors had taken them. What did they do with Lord Bacon? He was fined $200,000 and imprisoned in London Tower.

But it is not necessary for me to go over the Atlantic Ocean to find a sufficient number of examples to show the power of bribery. It is a well known fact that $975,000 has been given to one legislature and state government by a railroad company to get a charter and to put through a donation of public lands.

It is affirmed that every man has his price and why attempt to purify this great evil. It is not true that every man has his price, though, alas, too many of them have. I am satisfied there were men in the House of our last Legislature who had so much honesty, principle, moral sense and manhood that they could not be bought. To affirm that every man has his price is a stigma upon Christian civilization. Away down in the dark ages, even many examples of incorruption may be found. Epaminondas, being offered a bribe, said: "I will do this thing if it be right, and if it be wrong, all your goods cannot persuade me." Fabricius, of the Roman Senate, was offered a bribe by Phrrhus of Macedon. He said: "What an example this would be to the Roman people; you keep your riches and I will keep my poverty and reputation." If it makes a man poor to be honest, he has something better than riches—a clean conscience. The president of the American Congress during the Revolutionary war, General Reed, was offered 10,000 guineas by foreign commissioners if he would betray his country. He replied: "Gentlemen, I am a poor man, but tell your King he is not rich enough to buy me."

Thank God, there are men and women, those who are in the church and those who are not, that you could no more bribe than you could get Lazarus in heaven to change places with Dives in hell. There are men in Washington, in Albany, in Harrisburg, in Des Moines, in Yankton, who would no more be approached with a bribe than you would go into a powder magazine with fire crackers for the purpose of playing Fourth of July. These are incorruptible men who save the city and state. Bribery does not necessarily mean hard cash or greenbacks or bank bills, but it means sometimes railroad passes; it means a large appropriation for a university way up in the northern part of the territory where common schools have hardly begun to do good work; another appropriation for a penitentiary in addition to the one we have, where those who vote for it ought to accept it. It means a great effort to remove the deaf and dumb asylum by those who are deaf and dumb to the innocent people. All this it means when interested parties are assured that their bills will not be vetoed if they would consider favorably and vote squarely on the capital removal bill. Is this bribery? Let the people answer. It has been well said "the machinery of bad American politics is made up of about five hundred wheels and the cogs of these wheels play in the cogs of a great wheel, and this great center wheel has a tire of railroad iron and also a crank on which is the hand of Satan, and he turns the great wheel and that turns all the 500 small wheels in the political manufactory." At least some such way seems to have been followed for the last few months in Dakota politics, and as the poet sings: "Satan leading on."

What is the only true antidote for all the corruptions in politics? It is the grace of God in the heart. While acting in the capacity of chaplain of the House, I often supplicated at the throne of grace that an old-fashioned revival of religion might so overpower and permeate the hearts of these servants of the people that they might not be found wanting when approached by the glittering gold of the briber. Both chaplains were duly warned by the Press and Dakotian that they had the most difficult task before them of all in presenting such sinners at the throne of grace. The warning proved true. Let me advise the parents before me to be careful how they give, unconsciously, the first lessons in bribery in the home circle and nursery. Do not bribe your children. Teach them to be good because it is right, not because they have the promise of a nickel or an orange. The man who is honest because honesty is the best policy is a hypocrite if not a knave. Let us all steer clear of bribery if we do not wish to become morally a bankrupt.

CAPITAL COMMISSION IN COURT

The quo warranto case against the capital commission was argued before Chief Justice A. J. Edgerton at a special term of the District Court held at Yankton, beginning July 25th, and concluding July 28, 1883.

The action was brought on complaint by E. G. Smith, district attorney for the Second Judicial District of Dakota, which document, after briefly reciting the history of the location of the capital for Dakota at Yankton, continued:

1. That the above named defendants were appointed commissioners for the purpose of locating a permanent seat of government and the capitol building for the Territory of Dakota, under and by virtue of a pretended act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota, entitled "An act to provide for the location of the seat of government of the Territory of Dakota and for the erection of public buildings thereat, approved March 8, 1883, which said appointments were and are in violation of said act organizing the Territory of Dakota.

2. That after that date, to wit, on or about the 3d day of April, 1883, the said defendants as a pretended board for the purpose above mentioned under said pretended act, without legal warrant, each usurped said office of commissioners and without warrant have usurped the right, privilege and franchise of naming the seat of government under said pretended act, and have ever since unlawfully held and exercised said office, right, privilege and franchise, and are proceeding to change and to permanently locate said capital and seat of government of said territory at some other place than at the City of Yankton under said pretended act, in violation of law and said act organizing the Territory of Dakota.

3. That each of said defendants are usurping and exercising said alleged rights and franchises arising under said pretended act, and are drawing and are about to draw and collect each the sum of $6 per day for their pretended services as such commissioners from the public moneys belonging to the territory, and from the treasury of said territory, and are also procuring a surveyor and assistants to locate said seat of government under section 9 of said pretended act at a like expense of $7.50 per day, and are drawing large sums of money from the territorial treasury for alleged expenses as such commissioners for team hire, stationery and other expenses.

Wherefore the plaintiff demands judgment that each of said defendants is not entitled to said office, and that they be ousted therefrom. That said pretended act and all acts done or performed by said commissioners be declared illegal and void, and that each of said defendants be declared not entitled to exercise any right, privileges or franchise under said pretended act.

E. G. SMITH,

District Attorney of the Second Judicial District of Dakota.

The attorneys for the plaintiff, the Territory of Dakota were in addition to Mr. Smith, Hon. G. C. Moody, Hon. Bartlett Tripp, and Hon. John R. Gamble, while the defendants were represented by Hon. Wm. F. Vilas, of Wisconsin, and by Atty. Gen. Alex. Hughes, president of the capital commission.

The contention of the plaintiff was that the governor and Legislature alone had the authority and power under the Organic Act to remove and locate the capital, and that said authority and power could not lawfully be delegated to any commission or body of persons, as had been pretended to be done by the Legislature and governor in the present case.

The arguments consumed four days, and every phase of the subject of delegation of power by a legislative body was thoroughly sifted, and every authority quoted that could be found in the books. Attorney Vilas was a criminal lawyer of national reputation. He was made postmaster general in President Cleveland's cabinet two years later. He conducted the case for the defendants, making the entire argument on that side, but his eloquence and finished oratory, more than his argument, won the attention and elicited complimentary comment. The court room was thronged by an appreciative audience. Hon. John R. Gamble made the concluding argument for the defense, at the conclusion of which the court took the case under advisement, urged the attorneys to furnish him with their briefs at the earliest day, and the court was adjourned.

The judgment of the court, which was in favor of the plaintiffs, was given out August 28th following, and is here inserted:

Judgment of the Court.

Territory of Dakota, Second Judicial District.

In the District Court in and for Yankton County, the Territory of Dakota on the Information of E. G. Smith, District Attorney of Dakota Territory, Plaintiff, vs. Milo W. Scott, Burleigh F. Spaulding, Charles H. Myers, Alexander McKenzie, George A. Mathews, Alexander Hughes, Henry H. DeLong, John P. Belding, and M. D. Thompson, Defendants.

At a special term of the District Court within and for the County of Yankton, in the Second Judicial District of the Territory of Dakota, held at the Courthouse in the City of Yankton on the 27th day of August, A. D. 1883.

Present: The Hon. A. J. Edgerton, presiding judge, and the officers of said court.

The summons with a copy of the complaint having been duly and personally served on each of the above named defendants, and the said defendants having each duly appeared and served an answer to said complaint, and this cause having been regularly called for trial in its order on the calendar at the July, 1883, special term of this court, and the plaintiff appearing by E. G. Smith, district attorney for the said Second Judicial District, and G. C. Moody, Bartlett Tripp and Gamble Brothers, its attorneys; and the defendants appearing by William F. Vilas, their attorney, and Alexander Hughes per se, and for his co-defendants, and thereupon the plaintiffs, by its said attorneys, duly moved for judgment on the pleadings herein and the said defendants also moved for judgment on said pleadings, and by consent of said parties in open court both of said motions were thereupon argued together, and both of said motions duly coming on to be heard, and the court having listened to arguments on behalf of the plaintiff by G. C. Moody, Bartlett Tripp and J. R. Gamble, and said William Vilas on behalf of said defendants, and the court being duly advised in the premises and having duly considered, the court overrules said motion for defendants and grants and allows said motion for said plaintiffs.

It is therefore, on motion of said district attorney, and said attorneys for the plaintiff, ordered and adjudged that said defendants be and they are hereby forever ousted and excluded from said office of commissioner, mentioned in said act in the complaint described, and from all franchises and privileges named, enumerated or included therein. And that the plaintiff have and recover of the defendants the sum of — dollars, costs taxed and allowed herein.

Done in open court this 27th day of August, A. D. 1883.

By the Court: A. J. EDGERTON, Judge.

(Seal) Attest: EDWARD EDGERTON, Clerk.

At a later day Judge Edgerton filed his opinion in the case, a lengthy document, covering the numerous points in the case completely, which was highly commended by the bar and press as one of the ablest decisions rendered from the Dakota bench.

Following the judgment of the court the defendants took an appeal to the Supreme Court of the territory. The Supreme Court at that time was composed of four judges, Chief Justice Edgerton, Second District, Judge W. E. Church, First District (Black Hills), Judge Sanford Hudson, Third District, Northern Dakota north of the 46th parallel, and Judge Jefferson P. Kidder, Fourth District, Clay County, and north including all the counties in the Big Sioux Valley.

The capital commission went ahead with their improvements at Bismarck; the governor and auditor made their offices there, while Secretary Teller, and the territorial treasurer, and the Supreme Court remained at Yankton. As the capital removal case was in court on appeal to the Supreme Court by the defendant commission, which had been declared unlawful and ousted by the judgment of the District Court, the opinion held by Secretary of the Territory Teller, in his reply to Governor Ordway's removal order, was generally supported, and the reader's attention is invited to that reply which will be found in this chapter. Secretary Teller was known as an able lawyer and was some years later elected to the Supreme Court of Colorado.

A few weeks later the citizens of Dakota were startled by the intelligence of Judge Kidder's death, which occurred in St. Paul, Minn., early in October. From a statement in a St. Paul paper, it was learned that some two weeks earlier the judge had written to W. H. Shelley, of St. Paul, a friend, to secure him a room at the Merchants Hotel containing two beds and to be ready to stay with him at the hotel for a few days, as he, the judge, was coming for the purpose of receiving medical treatment. Arriving in St. Paul, the services of Doctors Murphy and Ritchie were enlisted and an operation for stone in the bladder was performed. The operation was believed to have been successful until 1 o'clock on the morning of the second, when the patient was seized with violent pains. It was then seen that inflammation of the bladder had set in, and at the earliest moment the physicians were notified. A brief glance satisfied them that the case was hopeless, and only a short time elapsed before the judge became unconscious. Stentorious breathing quickly followed. The disease gained headway every hour and it was recognized that the end was near. The prime cause of the attack was stated by the physicians to have been the failure of Judge Kidder to suspend sessions of the court in order that he might leave the bench when nature demanded. He kept his court in operation from the time it was called until it adjourned—sometimes for six hours without cessation. It may therefore be said that in a measure Judge Kidder died a victim to his devotion to his official duties. His friends did everything possible to relieve his sufferings.

Jefferson Parrish Kidder was born in 1816, at Braintree, Vt., where he received a common school education. He was trained to agricultural pursuits, and also taught school. He prepared for college at the Orange County Grammar School, and graduated at the Norwich University, and was a tutor of that institution. He received in 1848 the degree of Master of Arts from the University of Vermont. He then studied law and engaged in its practice. He was a member of the state constitutional convention of Vermont in 1842, and a state senator in 1847-48. He was lieutenant governor in 1853-54. He removed to St. Paul, Minn., in 1857. Mr. Kidder was interested in the enterprise which had for its purpose the settlement of Sioux Falls in Dakota in 1858-59, and was elected provisional delegate to Congress from Dakota. He returned at the close of the year to Minnesota, and was a member of the Minnesota House of Representatives in 1861, 1863, 1864 and in 1865 was appointed associate justice of the Supreme Court of Dakota, and removed to the territory with his family. He settled at Vermillion. He was reappointed judge in 1869 and again in 1873, resigning in 1874 or early in 1875 to take a seat as delegate from Dakota to which he had been elected in 1874.

During Judge Kidder's incumbency of the lieutenant governorship of Vermont Governor Robinson was ill during most of his term, and Kidder became acting governor. Mrs. Kidder died two years before her husband, and was buried in Oakland Cemetery, St. Paul. But one of the judge's children was living, Silas W. of Vermillion. Judge Kidder was buried at St. Paul with Masonic honors. In worldly wealth the judge was said to own about fifty thousand dollars.

Judge Kidder was highly esteemed as an upright and competent official and a public spirited and worthy citizen. He was socially disposed. Was an earnest and intelligent friend of schools from the country school to the university. He believed education was truly the handmaid of civilization, and best and surest friend of free government.

Bar meetings were held in all the counties of his large circuit, and appropriate action taken by resolutions and by draping the court rooms with the emblems of mourning.

Judge Kidder's death occurred during the pendency of the appeal to the Supreme Court by the capital commission, leaving the supreme bench with but three members, but prior to the meeting of the Supreme Court in December, a friend of Governor Ordway's, Atty. C. S. Palmer, who had been appointed assistant United States attorney of Dakota from Vermont, was promoted to the vacant judgeship, and when the capital commission case was heard by that court the following December the decision was three to one against the Territory of Dakota, thus reversing Judge Edgerton. A lengthy opinion was delivered by Judge Church, of Deadwood, sustaining the commission. The plaintiff then perfected an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, which was still pending when the two states of North and South Dakota were admitted to the Union. The capital of the territory, however, remained in question during the remainder of the term of Secretary Teller who refused to remove to Bismarck during the pendency of the legal proceedings, and he was sustained by the territorial treasurer, Mr. McVay, and partially sustained by the Supreme Court which was required to hold its sessions at the capital. This body met at Yankton for its December term, 1883, and held its June term in 1884 at the same place, removing to Bismarck for the fall term. Governor Ordway was succeeded by Governor Pierce in 1884, and the new executive fixed his official and private residence at Bismarck. The Legislature of 1885 passed a bill removing the capital to Pierre which was vetoed by the governor, and here the contest ended. The division of the territory and the admission of South Dakota was confidently expected at every coming together of Congress, and all other public questions were totally eclipsed.

Jefferson P. Kidder, presiding judge of the United States District Court for the Fourth Judicial District of Dakota Territory, whose residence was at Vermillion, died at St. Paul, Minn., October 3, 1883. Sioux Falls was the principal city in the district, and a meeting of the attorneys was held there after the appointment of a successor was made, the proceedings of which furnish a better and safer report of the estimation in which the judge was held by the members of the bar and the people than the proceedings of the bar meetings held elsewhere, for it so happened that there were gathered there attorneys that had known the judge before he wore the ermine, as a pioneer of the first Sioux Falls, and others who had practiced in his court for nearly two score years, for the judge had held the position from 1805 to the day of his death, excepting during the four years he served the territory as delegate in Congress.

Following the appointment of his successor, Assistant United States Attorney Palmer, of Sioux Falls, a meeting of the bar was held, and the following proceedings were had:

On motion of C. H. Winsor, Esq., it was ordered by the Hon. C. S. Palmer, the presiding judge of said court, that a committee of five members of the Minnehaha County bar be appointed to prepare and report to the court suitable resolutions and appropriate resolutions upon the death of the Hon. Jefferson P. Kidder, late associate justice of the territory and this judicial district. Whereupon the court appointed as such committee: E. Parhman, William A. Wilkes, H. H. Keith, Thomas S. Free and F. L. Boyce. And now, on this 29th day of April, 1884, E. Parhman, in behalf of said committee, reported the following resolution, which his honor ordered spread at length on the minutes of this court:

Resolved, That the Supreme Court of the territory, the District Court of the Fourth Judicial District, the bar, and the people of the territory, have sustained, in the death of the Hon. Jefferson P. Kidder, the loss of an honorable and upright judge. That his long judicial career in this territory has been marked by great industry, high abilities and incorruptible integrity, and in the termination of his long public career, universal sympathy is extended. That in this slight tribute to his memory we can but inadequately express the loss sustained. That his life and labors, characterized as they were by honor, industry and the fullest integrity, are left for the future, and stand as an encouragement for those of us who survive him, showing that success in life depends more upon integrity and good faith than upon more brilliant accomplishments.

W. A. Wilkes supplemented the resolutions with an eloquent tribute to the deceased. Judge W. W. Brookings followed Mr. Wilkes. He stated that he had first met Judge Kidder in 1850, in this territory, when the total number of voters did not exceed thirty. The deceased remained with the pioneers long enough to win their esteem and affection and they elected him as Dakota's delegate to Congress. He accepted the dignity and labored the following winter at Washington for the admission of the territory, which he came within a few votes of accomplishing. He attributed to the departed two prerequisites which eminently fitted him for the bench—hard sense and a remarkable freedom from spleen, malice or prejudice. He was chief among the few legal gentlemen in the territory who could tell a story, and he was incorruptible in every walk of life.

C. H. Winsor said he had tried the first case before Judge Kidder in Lincoln County, and their friendship from that date was most cordial. I did not regard him as a great judge. Even had his legal erudition been sufficient to entitle him to this distinction, his broad humanity would have precluded him from attaining the position. His penchant to help a poor lawyer with his case had a tendency to render close lawyers slipshod, but as a man, neighbor and friend, he was the peer of any man.

District Attorney Carter, who had been closely associated with him in his official capacity, could not say that he was a brilliant man, but was a man of sound common sense. He possessed too much heart to become a great unbending judge, as his sympathy was always with the under dog in the struggle. He was the personification of honesty, and no lawyer who ever practiced in his court ever suspected that he had been improperly influenced in his decisions.

Hon. O. S. Gifford acknowledged the tenderness of Judge Kidder's nature, but esteemed him a great judge in many respects. He did more, in my opinion, than any other man to establish the judiciary of this territory. He came here in a day when it was sometimes necessary to convene court in a sod shanty, but it made no difference—the same dignity was preserved in those primitive surroundings as in the more modern palatial temples of justice. He believed implicitly in the integrity of the bar, and this was why he gave the attorneys so much latitude.

The court then adjourned for the day.

DAKOTA'S REMARKABLE GROWTH

The remarkable growth of Dakota during several years succeeding the opening of the Black Hills in 1877, gave to the settlement and development of the territory a distinctive reputation. In this respect it was generally conceded to have surpassed all precedents in the United States where permanent occupation by an industrial population alone was considered. And those who were then acquainted with the substantial and permanent character of the natural resources of the territory will not look upon it as remarkable. There could be but one opinion regarding the natural advantages of the territory, and this opinion was highly favorable. It was quite fortunate that during the most active years of the immigration, there were so many railway gateways opening into the territory. The railways did not induce the immigration but were themselves led by it, still they afforded a medium of access and distribution that could with difficulty and much hardship have been accommodated without their aid and generous co-operation.

In the matter of disseminating information regarding the territory and its inducements, there were, first in importance we believe, the thousands of private letters that went out at least weekly into the older states from Dakota settlers to their friends and relatives, and neighbors who were possibly considering a removal and were waiting the verdict of the man who had gone in advance. Then the public prints appeared to vie as to which would have the best word to say regarding the great territory in connection with its rapid settlement, its unprecedented activity in building railroads, its wonderfully fertile lands, and bumper crops, its gold output exceeding many millions, the earnest efforts to secure statehood, with nearly two hundred Dakotans at times in Washington pressing her demands for division and admission on Congress; and the scores of newspaper correspondents at the national capital who could always find something new and attractive to say of Dakota; and not to be omitted, Ordway, that governor assiduous to be interviewed and repeat the well-worn tale of his own incorruptibility, and the proneness to evil and extravagance of the people of the territory generally, always excepting the nine spotless ones who made up the capital commission.

THE TARIFF CUTS A FIGURE

The tariff was the leading national political question in 1883, in fact it had ever marked a broad and well defined boundary between the great political parties of the country. But its aggressive and economical spirit had never been manifested in the politics of the country until the incoming of the republican party in 1861. A leading tenet of this new republican party was "protection to home industries," as opposed to the dogma of the democratic party, which favored a tariff for revenue, but opposed the tariff for protection. The northern states were republican and favored the protective policy. The southern states were democratic and favored what was termed "free trade," though this term did not correctly define their attitude for democrats in many instances favored protection—a tariff for revenue with incidental protection.

The western states and territories of the republic north had been settled largely by northern people who brought to their new homes their old home ideas and notions about politics and many other things. In the course of time, however, there had grown up in the West a feeling that the East was getting too large a share of the general prosperity, and the West a much smaller share than its merits and resources entitled it to, and there came a demand from the West for a more equitable proportion of the profits. The West was largely agricultural—the East was largely manufacturing, and it was the manufacturing products that received the benefits of protection in much larger ratio than the agricultural West, and the West was taxed to pay these benefits because of its large use and consumption of the manufactured products of the East. And while the West remained unwaveringly republican it began to murmur in the halls of Congress about the inequalities of the tariff, and occasionally made an effort to revise the law and cheapen the products that were costing them too many bushels of wheat and too many pounds of beef to buy a dollar's worth. Dakota was in the West, and more completely an agricultural region than any other.

The Black Hills, while it became famous for its production of the precious metals was also a fertile agricultural and an ideal pastoral region, and would have been able to have built up profitable industries on these pursuits if it had not been a gold producing country, but had been left to depend upon its forests, pastures, and grain lands. Its mineral wealth was unexampled in extent and richness but its production did not occupy a title of the area of the hills. In 1882 it was conservatively estimated that 500,000 head of cattle were grazing on the Black Hills ranges, and in the production of all small grain it equaled any portion of the territory in quality and yield per acre.

But that Dakota was essentially agricultural was conceded, and it was therefore to the pecuniary interest of Dakotans, nine-tenths of whom were farmers, and largely republicans, to secure a reduction in the duties of manufactured goods, including clothing stuffs and farm machinery, and inasmuch as no protection of great moment was extended to the agricultural productions of the country it will be observed that its position on the tariff was watched by New England with some concern while Dakota was making such strenuous efforts to get into the Union. And it was an opinion of well informed Dakota people that the New England sentiment in Congress favored the admission of Dakota as one state instead of two for in that way its representation in the Senate would be much easier to satisfy.

Ordway was ambitious to be elected one of the United States senators from Dakota, and even a duller politician than himself would have discerned that he had no chance from Southern Dakota, but there was a bow of promise in the north—he could bestow a valuable favor upon the north by securing to that section the capital, and then make one heroic effort to gain admission as one state. The gratitude North Dakota would naturally feel for a friend who had secured to them so much of power and value would surely not fail of expression when the time came to make two senators from the great state. While he had practically secured control of the territorial finances through the appointment of his son George as territorial auditor, and was in a position to make and unmake law through the astute decisions or opinions of his attorney general and president of the capital commission, the Hon. Aleck McHughes, his cup of satisfaction was not yet filled nor his ambition satiated—he longed for the civic crown of a United States senator as a fitting climax and reward for his self-confessed abilities and the great work he had performed in ridding Dakota of its reckless and profligate and unreliable scalawag leaders, and filling their places with the spotless nine who composed the capital commission; occupied the auditor's office; located county seats for the unorganized counties at so much per seat; and adorned the rolls of the minor office-holding gentry in subordinate positions on the boards of territorial institutions and in divers places. There were indications that this prize of senatorship had been hanged within the reach of his vision by some designing persons who knew its value in keeping Ordway in line.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPLETED

When the Northern Pacific Railway was completed through to the coast, the event was celebrated by the officers of the railroad company with an excursion over the line and brief stops at some of the principal towns and points of interest. Ex-Pres. Ulysses S. Grant was an honored guest of the railway people, and during a brief halt of the train at Fargo, the general, as everyone called him, was prevailed upon to make a few remarks though he ever insisted that he couldn't make a speech. The City of Fargo was magnificently decorated in token of the great event which had been ten years on the way, and the national emblems of Germany, France, Italy and Norway mingled their gorgeous colors with the Stars and Stripes. General Grant being vociferously and enthusiastically called for, came out and spoke briefly as follows:

I came out here to be impressed, but I see greater evidences of enterprise in your city and prosperity in your country than I anticipated. All promise great for the future.

Although I have crossed the United States much, and visited nearly every territory as well as state, this is the first time I ever set my foot on Dakota. I am glad to be on so solid and substantial a foundation. I don't like to make a speech, but I should like to shake hands with all of you—but the time is so short.

The ceremony of driving the golden spike—the last spike on the Northern Pacific Railroad—took place September 8, 1883, about forty miles west of Helena, Mont. Ter. Ex-President Grant and a number of notable men were present on the occasion.

RAILROAD BUILDING IN NORTH DAKOTA

In January, 1883, the daily journal called the Fargo Argus gave out a statement of the railway projects then being under way in the northern portion of Dakota. The statement included a road projected on the west shore of the Red River of the North from Fargo to Grand Forks. The Manitoba Road was pushing its Fargo and Grand Forks extension northward from Grafton, and would soon connect with the Manitoba & Southwestern from Winnipeg at the boundary line. The Larimore extension was being pushed out towards the Devil's Lake country, and during the summer would reach Creelsburg, on the north shore of that lake. The Manitoba was also building a branch from Sidney to Casselton, connecting the Breckinridge, Hope and Portland extension with the Mayville branch, upon which trains were already operating. The same company had in contemplation another line running from Ripon, about thirty-five miles west of Fargo, where the Hope and Portland Road branches diverge, and this project was to cross the Mayville branch in the vicinity of Amenia, and come into Fargo either directly or upon the Grand Forks extension three or four miles north of the city, near the Cheyenne.

Surveys had been made for the Grand Forks & Missouri Valley Railroad, crossing the Northern Pacific at Oriska; work would begin early in the spring. The Fargo Southwestern branch of the Northern Pacific had been completed, and trains were running to Lisbon, fifty-five miles south of Fargo. This road was to be continued westward, through Ransom and LaMoure counties to Grand Rapids on the James River during the year.

The Northern Pacific having secured the Wahpeton Western extension from the Manitoba Road was laying track through Richland County directly west. This road was to be continued to some point on the James River, and there probably unite with the Fargo & Southwestern, thence combining to make one road to the Black Hills. The Jamestown Northern extension of the Northern Pacific was built out about forty miles; its destination was Devil's Lake at some favorable point where various lines could center and a city of good proportions spring up. Odessa was much in favor.

The Sanborn, Cooperstown & Turtle Mountain Railroad, controlled by Fargo capitalists, had been under construction by the general manager, Charles A. Roberts, and trains were already running ten or fifteen miles. Track laying was under way to Cooperstown, forty miles. The Fargo & Southern Railroad had been graded thirty-five miles south of Fargo, and was to be ironed as early as the weather would permit. There was no section of the United States where railway building was so active as in North Dakota during the period named, and the conservative estimates then made foretold the laying of 1,000 miles of railway track before the close of the year in the country east of the Missouri River.

TRANSPORTING BLACK HILLS MINERAL PRODUCTS

The transporting of the mineral products of the Black Hills to the railroad was a hazardous and expensive business in the early days. Her gold and silver mines and mills were separated from the civilization and conveniences of the outer world by nearly two hundred miles of Indian country which for a number of years was infested by small parties of lawless Indians and by a more formidable enemy, a pale-faced banditti, composed of a number of the daring and lawless spirits of the frontier, which preyed upon the valuable mineral products of the hills country during their transfer across the unsettled Indian country which separated the hills country from the Missouri River at Pierre. Prior to 1880, the treasure coach was sent out to the Union Pacific but the completion of the Northwestern to Pierre in 1880, furnished a nearer point over a better road. This coach carried no passengers or express—it was built especially for the purpose of safely transporting across the wild country, about three hundred thousand dollars in gold which was contained in a gold brick weighing about one hundred and fifty pounds, and as the gold output at the time averaged about six hundred thousand dollars per month, the treasure coach made two trips each month. It was an armored vehicle, bullet proof. Five men, captained in 1882 by Scott Davis, all skilled in border warfare, and known to be fearless, dauntless, possessing unerring skill with the rifle and pistol, guided the treasure and drove the coach. No ordinary band of robbers could obtain a fighting foothold within rifle shot of the vehicle. Its crew were selected with the greatest care. They had years of frontier experience among the lawless classes, and were selected for their invincible courage, their honesty and intelligence, and sobriety as a crowning recommendation. They were, as a matter of course, well paid, but they were so trustworthy, and were held in such respectful fear by the bold bandits that the coach had made its trips and safely delivered its treasure during a period of five years without a disturbance. At the last robbery, which occurred at Canon Springs on the southern route to the Union Pacific in 1878, after the robbers captured the coach it took them three hours, with sledge hammers, gunpowder and chisels to open the safe in which the gold brick, weighing in the neighborhood of one hundred and fifty pounds, was contained. Notwithstanding the precautions taken to secure the gold in the very best safe it was possible to procure the messengers guarded it awake every minute during the journey, never relaxing their vigilance during the thirty-six to forty hours occupied in the transit from Deadwood to Pierre.

ASSESSMENT FIGURES COMPARED

The increase of the assessed valuation for 1883 over 1882, was over twenty-one million dollars, nearly fifty per cent increase, and this increase seemed to have been uniform for the four years past. The estimated valuation for 1884 was $100,000,000. Here follows an abstract of the assessment rolls by counties for 1883 compared with that of 1882:

A TRIBUTE TO DAKOTA AND ITS PEOPLE

The following pen-picture of the Territory of Dakota at this time may have been somewhat exaggerated, but it portrays quite reliably the buoyant character of the Dakota people at this date; the general activity in all departments of industry which engaged the attention of the people, and the optimism everywhere prevalent, which would engage and interest the thoughtful sojourner; and it was such a person who paid this tribute to Dakota:

Among all the regions of the earth this young Dakota land is in many respects without a rival or peer in vastness of area, variety and exhaustlessness of resources, invigorating qualities of climate, intelligence, energy and enterprise; of its population and in development it is without an equal among the states and territories of the Union. It is as large as all the New England states—New York, New Jersey, Delaware and half of Pennsylvania combined. It is as far in a straight line from Pembina on its northern boundary to Yankton on its southern as from Chicago to Memphis, from Ontario to Washington, or from New York to Raleigh, N. C. From its northwestern to its southeastern corner it is as long a journey as from St. Paul to New York, or from Burlington to New Orleans. In this mighty, breezy, sweet and lake gemmed domain lie the greatest wheat fields, the largest gold mines, and the greenest pasture lands on the face of the globe. Its climate is better than all the porous plasters, liver perambulators, and lung balsams that quacks' or chemists' skill ever invented. Its merry zephyrs, which untutored barbarians of the outside world sometimes decry as blizzards, sweep all miasma and malaria away from its rich soil and beautiful valleys and plains, and all slanders about the arctic frigidty of its winters may be silenced by a glance at any reliable map. The northernmost line of Dakota is 100 miles south of the southernmost point of England, and Pembina, on the international boundary line, is in precisely the same latitude as Paris.

Crops, ideas, people, fortunes, and everything else grow so vast that it makes a down-easter's head swim like a fishing cork in a maelstrom to watch them.

It is not strange that the dwellers in this realm without a parallel should be somewhat different from the common folks. Nowhere else beneath the sun was there ever gathered such a pioneer population. No hickory shirts and hob-nailed rawhide boots, no log cabin and coonskin caps, no lumbering old ox wagons full of tow-headed children with a half dozen brindle dogs trotting along between the wheels, no coarse homespun, no hog hominy. Our pioneers come in palace cars, reading the latest novel or Longfellow's rhythmic twaddle about "The Land of the Dakotas." Their costumes tell of jaunts to Saratoga and Newport and their wives are up in all the mysteries of Worth, Demorest and Butterick, and familiar with the newest in operas and dance steps. All farm work is done by machinery. The ground is broken by sulky plows, the sowing done by buggy seeders, the golden grain is harvested with self-binding reapers and threshed by steam, while the engine feeds itself with straw for fuel. Our graziers farm with tailor-made suits, wear gloves to protect their hands, and scent their handkerchiefs with the soft fragrance of new mown hay.

Such opportunities, such advantages, such bewildering chances to combine labor and luxury, profit and pleasure, fortune and fun, could not long escape the notice of the working millions in less favored realms, and the growth of this far northern elysium has actually amazed the world. The tales of oriental magic, the castles builded by enchanters' spells in the dew-fall of night, dwindle to nothingness beside the everyday realities of Dakota's wonderful progress, now apparently at its zenith.

COUNTY FAIRS AND COUNTIES

In the year 1883 county fairs were held in the counties of Aurora, Moody, Lincoln, Bon Homme, Spink, Lawrence, Beadle, Davison and Kingsbury. An agricultural exposition was held at Sioux Falls, and the Southeastern Dakota Industrial Association held a fair at Yankton.

Twenty-five counties were organized, the greatest number in one year in the career of the territory, namely—Emmons, Sanborn, Butte, Roberts, Billings, Jerauld, Buffalo, Sully, Campbell, Edmunds, Fall River, Potter, Foster, McLean, Sargent, Nelson, Ramsey, Benson, McPherson, Faulk, Mercer, Stark, Steele, Towner, and Walworth.

Joseph G. Chandler, of New Hampshire, son of the secretary of the navy, was appointed register of the United States Land Office at Yankton in May, 1883, succeeding to Hughes who had been appointed attorney general, and a member of the capital commission.

The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company began its survey from Scotland to Mitchell and also a line in a northwesterly direction through Douglas County in the early winter of 1883-84. It was stated that the last mentioned line was intended to form a junction with its Chamberlain Line at Kimball or Pukwana.

Harrison Allen, of Pennsylvania, was appointed United States marshal of Dakota to succeed Butler B. Strang, also of Pennsylvania, who received the appointment succeeding Marshal Raymond, but found the official duties ungenial, and concluded to resign after looking the Dakota field over.

Butler B. Strang was appointed United States marshal March 9, 1882. He was born in Steuben County, New York, March 6, 1829. His father was Rev. Francis Strang, a Methodist clergyman. The family moved to Tioga County, Pa., in 1850. Mr. Strang was a lawyer and a prominent political worker in the republican party. He had seen service in the Pennsylvania Legislature, and was president of the State Senate four years. He wanted a judicial appointment, but accepted the marshalship, and intended to look the Dakota field over before deciding to retain it.

Mr. Strang subsequently killed himself as the following paragraph relates. This intelligence came from Elmira, N. Y., under date of May 11, 1884:

Butler B. Strang's life was ended by his own act of shooting a revolver bullet through his right temple at his home in Westfield, Tioga County, Penn., at 6.30 on the morning of May 10th. He had been in poor and constantly declining health since 1881, when he accepted a Government appointment as marshal of Dakota Territory, in the vain hope that a change of climate might prove beneficial. Upon returning home a year later he grew weaker, and his general debility became so complete that, with lung troubles in addition, hopes of his recovery were given up some weeks ago. Still he was able occasionally to leave his bed. Saturday morning he arose early, dressed himself, and was making his toilet in the presence of his wife and son Benjamin, when, without attracting their attention, he took a revolver from a drawer and lodged a bullet in his brain. He did not speak after the shot. His protracted illness, without hope of recovery, was undoubtedly the cause of the action, as the coroner's jury found. In the campaign of 1880 he was a most fearless associate of John J. Mitchell, since elected United States senator. In politics he was regarded as an able and worthy leader, and his death will be generally lamented.

COUNTY ORGANIZATION FRAUDS

Governor Ordway's term would expire in May, 1884, and he was anxious for a reappointment, for which he was supported by the same interests that procured a removal of the capital. It is hardly probable that President Arthur would have reappointed him, but there was no question that the New England influence that secured his appointment in the first instance was still a powerful factor in republican circles in Washington. Ordway's unpopularity in the territory had approached very near to being a unanimous sentiment. It was claimed that the petitions against his reappointment that were sent to the President from the different portions of the territory contained in the aggregate over thirty thousand names of lawful citizens. In addition to these petitions copies of affidavits were also filed with the President reciting the flagrant abuses and criminal practices that attended the governor's part in the organization of new counties. The following are copies of some of those that were filed in the executive department, and probably relate to the same matters that led to Ordway's indictment and the absconding of Mr. Tebbetts from the territory to avoid being subpoenaed as a witness. Mr. Tebbetts at this time was a prospective member of the Ordway family. He was also said to have been quite near an indictment for his part in the bribery affairs. The first affidavit concerns the Faulk County organization, as follows:

Thomas H. McMullin, one of the townsite proprietors of LaFoon, Faulk County, in an affidavit sworn to before C. H. Squire, notary public, Faulk County, says:

On or about September 2, 1883, William B. Tebbetts came to LaFoon and exhibited a letter from George L. Ordway, son of Governor Ordway, stating that Tebbetts came to Faulk County for the purpose of looking it over with reference to its organization.

Tebbetts stated to me that the county would be organized as soon as he reported to the governor, and in accordance with his report, I met Tebbetts at the office of D. W. Hunt, in LaFoon. There were present, besides Tebbetts, C. E. Hardy, D. R. Miller, John Hough, E. W. Rogers and myself, all of whom were members of the Townsite Company, and D. L. Smith, who had land adjoining. Conversation was had with Tebbetts relative to the location of the county seat. One of the party proposed to Tebbetts that he become a partner in the townsite of LaFoon. To this Tebbetts assented. The meeting then broke up and Tebbetts withdrew. The balance of the party, being a majority of the shareholders of the Townsite Company, then held a meeting at which it was agreed to give Tebbetts one-half of the townsite of LaFoon, comprising 100 acres. They also concluded to give him all the land they could get donated and whatever money they could get subscribed. It was agreed that those who donated the lands should execute deeds to Tebbetts, and that the deeds and money subscribed should be placed in the hands of D. R. Miller, of Redfield, to be delivered and paid to Tebbetts whenever Faulk County should be organized and the county seat located at LaFoon. I proceeded at once to procure the deeds of property donated, and D. R. Miller and John Hough went to work to raise money. I obtained deeds from Andrew Greenwald, Louis Kneisel, Jr., Lee M. Sprowls, James P. Raulborn, James W. Johnson, William T. Hensley, Lawrence W. Hensley, Darius S. Smith, Joel C. Booth and Nora Reppy, for 380 acres of land in all. After I had procured these deeds they were shown to Tebbetts, who expressed himself as highly gratified at the result. He was also informed of the amount of money subscribed, and which I then understood and have since been informed amounted to about three thousand dollars.

The deeds were delivered to Doctor Miller, of Redfield, with a paper accompanying them signed by each, stating that they (the deeds) were to be delivered to William B. Tebbetts upon the happening of a certain event, to-wit "when commissioners for Faulk County were appointed by the governor, and the county seat located at LaFoon." After the delivery of the deeds Mr. Tebbetts went away. He said he was going to Bismarck to see the governor and make report. I saw Tebbetts again October 1, 1883, in the presence of D. R. Miller, in the latter's bank at Redfield. Miller said it was all right, but the deeds would have to be changed and made out to him (Miller), and that he would convey to Tebbetts. Miller stated, in the presence of Tebbetts, that the reason for changing the deeds was because it appeared too open and barefaced to have the deeds go direct to Tebbetts. In accordance with the request, new deeds were executed to D. R. Miller. I wrote out four of the deeds myself. One of the deeds, that of Kneisel, was not changed but went on the record direct from him to Tebbetts. I have been informed, and so understand, that the money subscribed, amounting to about three thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine dollars, was paid to D. R. Miller, to be paid by him to Tebbetts, and that it was so paid. Tebbetts subsequently returned from Bismarck to Redfield, and stated that the governor wanted a petition asking for the appointment of the commissioners that we wanted. Thereupon a petition was prepared and privately circulated around LaFoon and the eastern portion of the county, asking for the appointment of Thomas L. Humes, Matthew J. Jarvis, and Harvey A. Humphrey. This petition was forwarded to the governor, and the parties above named were appointed commissioners of Faulk County.

E. S. Spinden, one of the townsite proprietors of Faulkton, in an affidavit made before W. S. Bowen, notary public, Yankton County, stated that he met Governor Ordway in June, 1883, after numerous petitions for organization had been sent to him, and represented the urgent necessity of the immediate organization of Faulk County. In August, 1883, he saw George L. Ordway at Pierre, and was informed by the latter that he had sent W. B. Tebbetts to Faulk County to look the ground over, and that the parties interested could confer with Tebbetts. On returning to Faulkton, Spinden met Tebbetts, who said that he had been sent there to investigate and report. Spinden told Tebbetts that it was unnecessary to keep up pretenses, and he was prepared as president of the Faulkton Townsite Company to make an offer for the county seat. The townsite company offered Tebbetts, or those for whom he was acting, 120 acres of land adjoining Faulkton, 250 lots in the townsite and $1,000 in cash. Tebbetts remained ten days in Faulkton and went to LaFoon. He assured Spinden that they would have an opportunity to make a second bid if necessary. Afterwards Spinden went to Pierre and told Tebbetts they would add to their offer the hotel at Faulkton, and $1,000 for him (Tebbetts) personally. Spinden regarded him as acting for Governor Ordway, to whom he said he was to report. It was understood by them all that a bonus must be given to Governor Ordway before the commissioners were appointed. Of the three members of the board appointed two were residents at the time of their appointment of Spink County.

H. A. Humphrey, of Faulkton, one of the commissioners of Faulk County appointed by Governor Ordway, in an affidavit taken before C. H. Squire, notary public, Faulk County, stated that the letter written and signed by George L. Ordway, the governor's son, and brought by Tebbetts to Faulkton, stated that Tebbetts came there for the purpose of looking the county over in view of its approaching county organization. Humphrey had several interviews with Tebbetts, who said he wanted to see the most prominent men in various localities, and gave Humphrey to understand that the county would be organized in accordance with his report. He further gave Humphrey to understand, in a manner not to be mistaken, that he was prepared to receive and consider any propositions that might be made to him with regard to Faulkton securing the county seat. On being asked what proposition LaFoon had made, Tebbetts replied that that was confidential. Humphrey also stated that he had been informed by men who subscribed as large amounts of money and land in consideration of the location of the county seat at LaFoon.

George W. Fifield, P. B. Durley, H. A. Humphrey and J. A. Pickler, of Faulkton, and Thomas H. McMullen, of LaFoon, in a joint affidavit before C. H. Squire, notary public, Faulk County, recite the facts in regard to the repeated efforts of the citizens of Faulk County to obtain organization. Petition after petition was forwarded for this purpose, but in vain. The affidavit states that during the period of eleven months between the time the county should have been organized, as required by law, and the time it was finally organized, Faulk County was without local government or any court of justice, and without schools, being without the power to levy taxes for their support; that many settlers, residents of the county, in making final proof on their claim, were put to great trouble and expense by being compelled to travel with their witnesses a distance of from thirty-five to forty miles to an adjoining county to reach an officer who could administer the necessary oath; that litigants and witnesses were compelled to travel a like distance at like expense in any action or proceeding at law.

Nora Reppy, a property owner residing near LaFoon, in an affidavit before J. M. Miles, clerk of the District Court, Faulk County, states that at the time of Tebbetts' visit to LaFoon, as the representative of Governor Ordway, she was asked how much of her land she would give to have the county seat at LaFoon. She gave forty acres, being the southwest fourth of section 17, town 118, range 68, a deed for which she executed to Tebbetts and delivered to D. R. Miller, a banker of Redfield, to be given to Tebbetts when LaFoon got the county seat. She understood that the land donated by herself and others was for the governor, and that LaFoon's chances for the county seat depended on the amount of land and money donated.

The certified copies of the deeds on record in the office at LaFoon of J. H. Bottom, register of deeds for Faulk County, Dakota, which accompany the affidavits, show the following transfers:

Louis Kneisel, Jr., to William B. Tebbetts, forty acres, consideration $1. Andrew Greenwald to D. R. Miller, twenty acres, consideration $1. Alexander LaFoon to D. R. Miller, forty acres, consideration $1. Lee M. Sprowls to D. R. Miller, forty acres, consideration $1. James P. Rathbun to D. R. Miller, twenty acres, consideration $1. William P. Hensley to

YANKTON COLLEGE

Founded in 1883 by Rev. Joseph Ward

D. R. Miller, twenty acres, consideration $3,000. Lawrence W. Hensley to D. R. Miller, twenty acres, consideration $1. Darius S. Smith to D. R. Miller, and Delia M. Smith, his wife, to D. R. Miller, forty acres, consideration $1. Joel C. Booth to D. R. Miller, sixty acres, consideration $1. D. R. Miller and Delia B. Miller, his wife, to William B. Tebbetts, 280 acres, consideration, $2,800.

The description and amount of property conveyed by Andrew Greenwald and others to D. R. Miller correspond with that of the property conveyed by Miller and his wife to William B. Tebbetts except in one instance, where twenty acres are deeded by Miller to Tebbetts in lieu of forty acres deeded to Miller by LaFoon. The other twenty acres may have been allowed Miller, who was a Redfield banker, as his per cent for negotiating the transaction.

The value of the one-half interest in the 100-acre town proper, which Tebbetts received according to the affidavit of Thomas H. McMullen, cannot be less than $10,000 to its owner, if he will handle it properly. It is extremely probable that $15,000 will be realized this year by the owner of that half interest.

Concerning Hyde County, Dr. A. W. Perkins, of Highmore, editor of the Vox Populi, in an affidavit before D. S. Martin, clerk of the District Court, Hyde County, states that on or about the 1st day of June, 1883, he went to Pierre, where Governor Ordway then was, to confer with the latter relative to the organization of Hyde County.

I met him by appointment at the First National Bank of Pierre. During this interview with Governor Ordway a full and free conversation was had with him relative to the organization of Hyde County, and the location of the county seat. I had previously had a conversation with one J. S. Harris relative to its location upon his land, he having expressed a willingness to convey a three-fourths interest for the location of the county seat, being an undivided three-fourths interest in 160 acres. It was agreed in this interview with Governor Ordway, that he (Ordway) would appoint commissioners who would locate the county seat upon the land of the said Harris and in consideration thereof he—the governor—was to have the said three-fourths interest, to be deeded by the said Harris, and to fully control the same, and out of the said three-fourths interest (the governor's share) he, the governor, was to satisfy the railway company for any demands they might make for putting in a station. It was agreed that the governor should appoint as commissioners L. E. Whitcher, John Falde, Jr., and A. E. VanCamp. Subsequently, on or about the first day of August, the commissions appointing Whitcher, Falde and VanCamp were issued but were not delivered until about the 1st of October following, at which time all of said commissions were sent to Whitcher, who delivered the commission to VanCamp but refused to deliver the one issued to Falde. Subsequently Governor Ordway attempted to revoke the commission of Falde and appoint in his place and stead, one George W. Dunham, whose land adjoins the Harris section, upon which the county seat was to be located. I have been informed and verily believe, and it was well understood in this community that the reason why Governor Ordway revoked the commission of Falde was because he had been informed that he would not vote to locate the county seat upon the land of the said J. S. Harris. The land belonging to Harris and upon which it was proposed to locate the county seat, is in section 12, township 112, range 73 (five miles west of Highmore).

A. S. Gerhart, J. H. VanCamp, A. E. VanCamp, D. A. W. Perkins, John Zwright, L. C. Hadley and J. R. Goudy, citizens of Highmore, Dakota, in an affidavit before E. S. Martin, clerk of the District Court, Hyde County, set forth the facts in relation to the many fruitless attempts made by the people of Hyde County to secure organization from the date of a public meeting held on November 30, 1882, when a petition to the governor asking the appointment of commissioners, was signed by sixty-seven bona fide residents of age, to the time of the dual organization of the county in the latter part of September, 1883. During the interim the county was without local government or schools, settlers were compelled to travel long distances at great expense to prove up on their homestead or pre-emption claims, and the people were left without any protection of law, either civil or criminal. Finally, when organization was determined on, Governor Ordway appointed two boards of commissioners, both of which were attempting to exercise the duties and functions of office, which had entailed expensive and vexatious litigation upon the people of the county.

COMMON SCHOOL STATISTICS

In 1884 Gen. W. H. H. Beadle was the territorial superintendent of public instruction, having held the position since the coming in of Governor Howard in 1878. He was generally acknowledged to have given to the position its widest sphere of value and usefulness, supplemented by an ability of the highest order, and years of painstaking study and investigation of the common school subject which included every phase of the best systems then known and practiced in the United States. His term of office had extended through six or seven of the most important years in the history of the territory, beginning just before the marvelous increase of immigration in 1879, and extending through a period in which the territory grew in population from fifty thousand to seventy-five thousand each year for the year terminating in 1884, during which period much more than one-half of the territory open to white settlement was entered upon and occupied by a permanent white population, fifty-nine new counties were organized, school districts and schools established in an orderly and satisfactory manner, while no neglect occurred to the educational interests in the more than thirty counties that had been organized prior to the coming in of Mr. Beadle as superintendent. While the administration of Governor Ordway was properly chargeable with many flagrant official delinquencies, in the department of education we fail to discover even one complaint. He discovered that a competent head had been selected for that important department of territorial government, and sagaciously concluded not to disturb it. It is no exaggeration to claim that there was no portion of the United States where greater activity could be found in meeting the demands for common schools than existed in Dakota during the years given, or where the administration of the work was performed with better system, with greater promptness, or with more satisfaction to the hundreds of thousands of people directly interested. It is not at all remarkable that at a later day his valuable services so faithfully and ably performed, without ostentation, should awaken a widespread sentiment favorable to an honorable recognition of his labors by setting up a suitable and permanent testimonial of the public appreciation of a citizen who had guarded the educational interests of every community so successfully and with such prosperous results through the most difficult, though most prosperous period of our territorial career.

On his retirement from office, which occurred with the coming in of Governor Pierce, the general placed on record a valuable report, from which we have endeavored to glean a summary of the growth of our common schools during those years when the immigration fairly flooded the territory, as well as other items connected with the educational interests of the people.

As showing the unprecedented growth, and for the purpose of comparison, the reports for the school year ending in March, 1883 and 1884, each giving similar items are selected. It should be stated, however, that the school year of 1883 ended in March. The law was amended by the Legislature of that year, fixing the termination of the school year at June 30, hence the report for 1884 includes fifteen months and one school term more than that of its predecessor. We first quote from the report of 1882-83.

The following is a summary of the statistics of public schools for the school year beginning April 1, 1882, and ending March 31, 1883, so far as received from the counties. The succeeding tables exhibit these items in detail and also show the defective nature of many of the reports. (Total number of organized counties in Dakota at the close of 1882 was fifty-seven, leaving thirteen that made no report.)

There are fifty-one graded schools included in the total number of schools.

The table is made up from the territorial superintendent's report for year ending March 31, 1883, and is to be compared with the report for the year ending April 30, 1884, which reveals a remarkable growth not alone in schools but in number of counties reporting and new ones organized.

There are eighty-one organized counties in the Territory of Dakota at the date of this report, but the statistics are derived from sixty-five only of these, the remaining sixteen not having been organized long enough before the close of the school year to furnish any statistics, or in a very few cases failing for reasons not given. Those lacking are all new counties. The act of 1883 changed the ending of the school year from March 31st to June 30th, and left fifteen months in the year included in this report. While this gave a longer time for building schoolhouses and holding schools, it did not increase greatly any but the schoolhouse statistics since there were taxes for but one year to expend, and practically all the first three months were in many respects used in the transition to the new law. Yet the aggregate statistics are increased from this and other causes beyond what they would otherwise have been. To the common school statistics are added some of the expenditures for the higher institutions made in the same period, and other expenses of the school system.

The names of the newly organized counties, numbering sixteen, not given in the accompanying tables, were: Benson, Billings, Bottineau, Campbell, Cavalier, Emmons, Hyde, Logan, McHenry, McIntosh, McPherson, Mercer, Ramsey, Rolette, Towner, Wells— sixteen.

The tables of the superintendent's report occupy several pages, and represented every item of importance connected with the schools and their government, much of which was indispensable when the report was rendered, but not of importance later.

Prior to the year 1883, the common schools of the territory had been administered and governed under the school district system, which gave to each common school district a corporate organization which was authorized to establish and maintain one school, and was empowered to levy and collect taxes for its support. Superintendent Beadle was an advocate of a more advanced system of government for common schools which was known as the "township system," which displaced the "district system," enlarged the area of territory to be governed by one set of officers for school purposes, and also made it uniform by making each civil township a school township, with authority given to a school township board to establish and provide for the maintenance within said school township of as many common schools as might be required for the accommodation and convenience of the inhabitants thereof, and also to establish graded schools. Being an innovation, and not being generally understood, there was considerable opposition among the members of the Legislature to its adoption. The new township school law had been prepared by Superintendent Beadle, and constituted a complete code for the educational system of the territory. It has been the basis of Dakota's common school system from the time of its adoption, and the tables will show that a very large majority of the counties adopted it during the year following its enactment. Owing to prejudice against a change, which existed in practically all the populous counties then existing where the schools were in operation under the district system, the following named counties were excepted from the operation of the law until such time as the board of county commissioners of such counties should order a change to the township system, to-wit: "Union, Lincoln, Clay, Turner, Yankton, Minnehaha, Moody, Brookings, Lake, Deuel, Codington, Cass, Grand Forks, Walsh, Pembina, Barnes, and Lawrence counties."

In supporting his argument favoring the change the superintendent quoted from an Iowa report made by a commission appointed by the General Assembly of that state in 1864, composed of Horace Mann, Amos Dean and Mr. Bissell, who had been given authority to revise the common school law of that state, which at that time provided for a sort of compromise system that gave township supervision with sub-districts established for each school and its government, thus practically nullifying the principal advantages of the township system. In submitting their report to the General Assembly with a new school bill, the commissioners say:

Their own settled convictions are, that the whole district system, as stated in the bill, should be promptly discontinued and that of making each civil township a school district substituted in its place. The following are some of the reasons that have led to this conviction:

1. It facilitates and greatly simplifies the organization of school corporations.
2. It gives fewer occasions for controversies relative to boundaries.
3. It equalizes among a large community the burdens imposed in the erection, repairs and outfits of schoolhouses, offers much greater facilities and inducements to establish township libraries and to sustain and increase them.
4. It annihilates forever the possibility of cutting up a population into small districts, to which the district system so frequently leads.
5. It leads to the erection of more commodious schoolhouses, with larger accommodations and means of instruction.
6. It offers facilities for classifying those of different ages and attainments, and of employing different grades of teachers in their instruction.

At this time there were in Dakota Territory over twelve thousand school districts, and appearances indicated, based on the steady influx of immigrants, that this number would be doubled within a very few years. The additional cost of maintaining the independent district system was a strong factor in promoting the passage of the township law.

In connection with his general report and at its conclusion, Superintendent Beadle gave a brief statement of the public and private educational institutions of the territory, of the highest grade, beginning with the University of Dakota, which was located at Vermillion as early as 1862, but no move had been made to establish the institution for occupation and work until twenty years later when the citizens of Vermillion appreciating the necessity for the higher school, provided the funds and began the erection of the main building, and in fact completed it. The following Legislative Assembly accepted their work in 1883, and authorized the issue of $50,000 in territorial bonds for further improvements. Of this institution, Mr. Beadle says, in his report for 1884:

The University of Dakota is situated upon a campus of twenty acres adjoining Vermillion, Clay County, and it is desired to add twenty acres to this, making a square tract of forty acres. The main building is 104 feet by 72 feet, in its largest dimensions, and has three stories with a full basement. The west wing has two stories with basement and contains six rooms of good size. The whole is built of Sioux quartzite, with cut stone trimmings. It has a good reference library of 500 volumes. The mineral cabinet contains over five hundred native geological specimens and fossils. The apparatus includes a fine selection of instruments for illustrating the instruction in natural philosophy, chemistry, geology and physiology. There are 116 students enrolled for the first term this year, and the university is doing valuable work while it is steadily advancing in popular favor and support, and filling the place designed for so important an institution.

It will be observed that the University of Dakota, located at Vermillion, had received no aid from the territorial treasurer prior to 1883. The Legislature of that year authorized an issue of bonds amounting to $50,000 to construct the first substantial buildings, but at the same session it established the North Dakota University at Grand Forks with an appropriation of $30,000, the Agricultural College at Brookings with $40,000, the Deaf Mute School at Sioux Falls and made appropriations for the normal schools at Madison and Spearfish. Thus we see that 1883-84 were the years in which all our leading educational institutions of the territorial era were founded. And other state institutions, namely, the insane hospital at Jamestown, the Agricultural College at Fargo, the penitentiary at Bismarck, the capitol also at Bismarck, the reform school at Plankinton, and normal schools were also established at Larimore, Grand Forks County, at Minto, Walsh County, and at Springfield, Bon Homme County.

The University of North Dakota was located upon a tract of twenty acres near Grand Forks. It was chartered in 1883, when it received an appropriation of $30,000 as a building fund. The section of the main building which was completed in 1884 is 150 feet by 54 feet, and there is also an observatory, both admirably adapted for their purposes, massive in form and thoroughly substantial and excellent in construction. The preparatory, normal and collegiate departments have been organized since September last, and over fifty students are in attendance, and the number is increasing. The charter provides for departments of law, medicine and industrial arts. William Blackburn, D. D., is president, and professor of mental, moral and political science.

The Territorial Agricultural College is located at Brookings, Brookings County, chartered in 1883. It has a large and handsome building, massive in style, and very thorough and substantial in construction. One of the finest in elevation, appearance and permanent value erected by the territory for any purpose. It stands upon an elevation adjoining the City of Brookings and has, besides the immediate grounds, a farm of eighty acres adjacent. Under the presidency of the Hon. George Lilley, the school was but recently opened and organized, and now has about fifty students in attendance, and promises very great usefulness and honor. With ample facilities it is confidently believed the school would soon contain over two hundred students, as it meets a need over a wide area from which access is convenient. It should be made not only an agricultural college, but a real industrial university, where all the instruction required by any person could be secured in all the applied or industrial sciences and arts. We need in Dakota such a college, where not only the mind and taste may be cultivated, but where especially the eye and the hand may be trained. This training need not be simply in muscular labor or to industry and faithful application, but should be toward skilled industry and the application of science and inventive genius, with trained hands, to the problems of field and shop. We have great practical problems to solve, in which the elements are soils and climate and all material things. Our people are mainly devoted to agriculture in all its forms. We have also rich mining regions. Manufactories suited to our needs are to be promoted. Through such a school vast good may continually be accomplished. The productive capacity of the people may be greatly increased. Industrial training combined with mental discipline and intelligence, which such a school should supply if properly equipped, will prepare our youth to open all sources of wealth to our people. The trained genius of mind and eye and hand combined, will ennoble labor, enhance production and promote in the highest degree the best state economy. It is only the ignorant workmen who are too numerous. Such a school would reflect upon our common schools great benefit. The hand should be honored as well as the taste. The eye as well as the brain. There should never be a caste of superior classic education. All departments should hold equal honor, and that of industrial education should not be postponed.

The Normal School at Madison is now (1884) in its second year; Charles S. Richardson, A. B., principal, and F. W. Evenson, A. B., assistant, with lectures by prominent resident physicians upon anatomy, physiology and hygiene. The site is large, convenient to the town, and good in every respect. The building is a substantial frame upon basement walls of stone, and is two full stories high. It is 70 feet by 50 feet with a side projection for entrance, stairs and halls of 50 feet by 12½ feet. The plan is to veneer the structure with brick, and when this is done it will be a superior building in strength, convenience and comfort, and will accommodate 200 students in classes. There were a total of fifty-four different students in attendance last year, seventeen men and thirty-seven women. The institution is well located for health and in a community suited to the good life of the students. Its good influence is already felt upon the public schools. There is nothing they need so much as trained teachers, and the vast expansion of our schools creates a pressing demand for a great enlargement of this school, and opening normal departments in the universities.

A normal school was located at Spearfish, Lawrence County (in the Black Hills of Southern Dakota) by chapter 100 of the laws of 1881, and by an amendatory act of 1883. The citizens donated forty acres of land for a site September 1, 1883, one-half mile from the town. The grounds are well located and beautiful. The school could not be visited. A letter from Joseph Ramsdell, president of the board, states that the building was completed February 27, 1884. It is 45 feet by 30 feet in size, two stories high, of brick. The stories are each fifteen feet high. It has a large cistern, with spouting, drainage and ventilation complete. About the middle of March, 1884, Van Buren Baker, of Pennsylvania, was employed as principal, and the school opened. Three terms have since been held. During the first term there were many young pupils, attracted through novelty, and as a natural result did not remain. Fifteen pupils were enrolled during the third term. The remoteness of the several counties in and near the Black Hills from the other territorial institutions, will make it desirable and necessary to maintain a school for them and to give its course of study a wider scope and put it in charge of able and competent instructors.

The Territorial Deaf Mute School is located on the eastern side of the City of Sioux Falls, upon an attractive site, and has buildings worth $20,000. It is in excellent condition and is doing its work well, and meeting the wants of the defective class for which it provides in a satisfactory manner.

The great work of the territory in education does not limit the enterprise of its citizens or the vigor of Christian work in this behalf. Colleges and academies are being founded on every hand, and so some have become already established in their high usefulness. If one needs more than the public school report to show the character of our people and the spirit they exhibit in favor of education, it can be found in these schools. There are many parochial, Indian and other schools that are not here noted as the facts could not be gathered. Nearly every military post has a school, and there is hardly a town of considerable size without some private kindergarten or parochial school. A considerable number of our youth are drawn also to colleges and academies outside the territory.

Yankton College, under the auspices of the association of Congregational churches, has an attractive building upon a fine site. Its property is worth $25,000. Its total enrollment is 105, including some students in art and music only. Library, 1,200 volumes. The classes are the most advanced of any in the territory, and the institution, now in its third year, has established a high reputation for accuracy in scholarship and thoroughness in instruction. It has no endowment in possession, but one large and one small one in control. President, Rev. Joseph Ward, D. D.

The Academy of the Sacred Heart, Yankton, Catholic, has a large and fine building, which with other property is worth $40,000. It is now an Indian school with seventy-five Indian boys as students. It is under the immediate supervision of Rt. Rev. Bishop Marty, and of Rev. Father Willard.

The Dakota Collegiate Institute, Sioux Falls, is under the control of the Association of Baptist Churches. The building is of Sioux quartzite, 76 by 43 feet, and four stories in height. Property worth $20,000. It has 115 students, of whom sixty are private students in music, piano and voice. Hardy C. Stone, A. B., principal.

All Saints School, Sioux Falls, is under the immediate supervision of the Rt. Rev. W. H. Hare, missionary bishop of South Dakota, Protestant Episcopal Church. The cornerstone was laid Thursday, September 11, 1884, and a large and handsome building of stone is well advanced. It has some endowment.

The Pierre University is situated at Pierre, Hughes County. One building is completed and in use, 76 by 50 feet, two stories, and one well advanced in erection, 76 by 50 feet, three stories, 60 feet high at the tower, and 45 in the main part. Value of the property, $30,000. Endowment $5,000, and temporary income $2,500. There are thirty students enrolled. President, Rev. T. M. Lindley.

The Tower University (Baptist) at Tower City, Cass County, on the Northern Pacific Railroad, was founded and endowed in 1884 with $100,000 by Charlemagne Tower. It is under the control of Baptist churches and has ample buildings in process of erection.

The Methodist University was, by the conference of that church, located at Mitchell, with a branch at Ordway, Brown County. These locations were conditioned upon the donation of certain property, which in the former case has not yet been completed, and the work awaits further action. At Ordway the institution will open January 5, 1885, in buildings provided by that town.

The Presbyterian churches have located a college at Jamestown, Stutsman County, upon the Northern Pacific Railroad, but its present condition and advancement is not reported.

A Scandinavian college has lately been removed from the State of Iowa to Caton, in Lincoln County, and is now in progress in suitable buildings which had been erected there for another purpose.

The Protestant Episcopal Church has a parochial at Yankton with sixty pupils, and others in the territory.

In addition to the Academy of the Sacred Heart, above mentioned, at Yankton, there are the following Catholic schools in Dakota, as furnished upon request, by Rt. Rev. Bishop Marty:

Bismarck, St. Mary's Academy, 120 pupils; Deadwood, St. Ambrose Academy, 80 pupils; Fargo, St. Joseph's Academy, 90 pupils; Grand Forks, St. Bernard's, 150 pupils; Jamestown, Parochial School, 50 pupils; Mariavell, Parochial School, 50 pupils; Mandan, Parochial School, 40 pupils; Rome, Parochial School, 30 pupils; Wahpeton, Parochial School, 90 pupils; Yankton, Parochial School, 110 pupils; Devil's Lake (Odessa), Dolorosa School, 80 Indians; Devil's Lake, St. Michel's, 25 Indians; Standing Rock, St. Benedict, 60 Indians; Cannon Ball, St. Francis Xavier, 40 Indians; Turtle Mountains, St. John Baptist, 106 Indians.

DAKOTA LEADS THE LIST FOR SCHOOLS

A most remarkable statement appeared in the annual report of the national commissioner of education for 1884, 1885, giving some statistical information of great value to the reputation of the Territory of Dakota. The commissioner found that Dakota led twenty-two of the states in the amount it expended for educational purposes. He found also that Dakota had a schoolhouse for every 151 people within its borders. In the proportion of schoolhouses to people, Dakota surpassed the states of Kansas, New Hampshire, Minnesota, Indiana, Wisconsin, Florida, Michigan, Missouri, Kentucky, Ohio, Illinois, South Carolina, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Colorado, Connecticut, New York, North Carolina, New Jersey, Arkansas and Texas. In that portion of Dakota known as South Dakota there was one schoolhouse for every 132 people, and in that portion known as North Dakota one schoolhouse for every 202 people. By this showing it was concluded that the proposed State of South Dakota, surpassed probably every state and territory in America in its common school facilities. In the value of permanent school property Dakota outranked fifteen states, and in the number of teachers employed fourteen states. These were official figures of unquestioned authenticity, and were considered of great value at the time as a factor in promoting the statehood movement.

GEN. W. H. H. BEADLE

Regarding Gen. W. H. H. Beadle, and his connection with the public affairs of Dakota Territory, it is not an easy matter to measure the benefits which the people have derived from his labors. He is best remembered for his labors in behalf of educational matters, including the conservation of the school lands, but this will be found only a portion of the public work he performed. For a period of about twenty years he might properly be denominated the general utility man of the territory. He was not ostentatious in his public duties, and did not appear to realize that he was doing any more or carrying more than his share of the citizen's responsibilities. But the record shows that he was on the firing line in most every necessary and commendable work. He was assiduous in writing for publication in the journals of the Central States, where there was the greatest interest felt in Dakota, or giving public lectures regarding the vast and useful resources of the territory, and no citizen of the realm had a safer or more complete knowledge of these, gleaned from personal investigation, than he. He was a Dakotan all the time. He was at the front when the people were in want or distress because of grasshopper raids, soliciting and obtaining substantial relief from the great industrial centers of the country. "A friend in need is a friend indeed." He was in large part the compiler and reviser of the first code of laws in 1877, a work universally commended. He was one of the builders of the state—one of the most useful, and carried his full share of the work of preparing for it, watchful of the constitutional law, that no weak or untried timber might be admitted in its construction. He was a co-worker with Rev. Joseph Ward, Bartlett Tripp, Judge G. C. Moody, Governor Mellette, Hugh J. Campbell and others. As a statesman he was safely conservative and suspicious of experimental legislation. He believed rather in testing remedies somewhat before incorporating them in constitutional law. Few lawyers were as well informed concerning the legislation of the states generally, and particularly that class of legislation desirable for Dakota.

An enumeration of the public duties he has discharged, and the valuable voluntary labor he has given in aiding the uprearing of Dakota's governmental fabric, would require an abstract from the proceedings of town meetings, all through the varied boards and councils to the Legislature. Churches, schools and colleges all have been substantially benefitted by his counsel and unselfish assistance.

The perusal of this history will lead the reader, as the making of it has the author, to the conclusion that Dakotans of the territorial era and their descendants and successors must ever hold the memory of Beadle in high esteem for his valuable and lasting public services. Though quite familiar with the general through all his Dakota career, we were not prepared to find that his personal efforts had been so large a factor in building up the permanent and most valuable of the public institutions of both the Dakotas when as yet there was but one.

GILBERT A. PIERCE, GOVERNOR

Gilbert A. Pierce, of Chicago, was appointed governor of Dakota Territory by President Arthur on Friday, June 27, 1884. He was a newspaper man and connected with the Chicago Evening News, a strong Arthur paper before the nomination of Mr. Blaine. A brief biography of the appointee stated that he entered the Civil war as a lieutenant in the Ninth Indiana Infantry, and was soon afterward made quartermaster of that regiment. He was then promoted to a captaincy, and made a brigade quartermaster. For his services he was again promoted to the rank of lieutenant colonel and quartermaster general of Gordon Granger's corps. In 1863 he was made colonel and quartermaster general of the Department of the Gulf. In 1867 he was appointed financial clerk of the United States Senate, remaining in this position until 1872, when he took a position on the Inter Ocean, Chicago, and was managing editor of that paper from 1876 to 1880, when he became the leading editorial writer on the Chicago Evening News, in which position the appointment as governor of Dakota found him. He was an author and had written a number of novels, and of "Dickens' Dictionary," which proved quite profitable.

Governor Pierce was born in New York, and after growing to manhood and receiving a liberal education, studied law, and for a time practiced law at the Village of Valparaiso, Ind., about fifty miles from Chicago.

President Arthur and Editor Pierce became personal friends, hence the governorship was a friendly gift. Governor Pierce's family consisted of his wife, two daughters and two sons. One of his sons was in business in Chicago. The governor was about forty-eight years of age, about six feet tall and fairly well proportioned.

Governor Pierce came into the executive office of Dakota at an unfortunate and somewhat tumultuous period in the history of the Territory of Dakota. The capital removal and the manner of its doing were the prominent public topics in every town and hamlet and home in the territory. It had been so unexpected and so novel in its execution that it naturally excited discussion. Governor Pierce found Yankton claiming that no lawful removal had been made, and he found Bismarck in possession of his predecessor, and a stately edifice being erected for a capital building. The secretary of the territory, Mr. Teller, had refused to recognize the removal and still maintained his office at the City of Yankton. The legal points involved in the removal were then in process of adjudication, having been appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the secretary had virtually announced his intention of awaiting the verdict of that tribunal before removing.

A division of the territory was also demanded by three-fourths of the people at least, and it had been the principal political question during the entire official term of his predecessor. It was thought at the time that the capital removal would militate against division, but it did not appear to affect the sentiment in Congress in the least. The exigencies of the political parties of the nation controlled Dakota's division and statehood. Governor Pierce quite naturally, it is presumed, chose for himself the course that promised the least resistance on his part, which was to permit the courts and the Legislature to adjust and settle it.

Before going to Bismarck Governor Pierce came to Yankton, arriving there on the 25th of July, and during the evening was given a serenade by the brass band and an informal reception by the citizens. His coming had not been announced, and no preparations had been made for his reception, as should have been done, but this gave occasion for an impromptu address in which the governor congratulated the members of the band for the excellence of their music, and thanked the people for the honor of his cordial welcome. The reception had been a surprise to him, but his coming had also been a surprise to Yankton. He said he came to Yankton to take the oath of office and enter upon his duties as governor. He came also because he wanted to meet the young and enterprising secretary of the territory who had stood so firmly by the people. Yankton was the historic city of Dakota and had in fact created considerable hubbub throughout the United States. An old question was up here—the question of the location of the seat of government. All states and territories had to pass through it, the same as children must have the measles and whooping cough. The citizens of Yankton were well satisfied, he supposed, that they could not keep the capital, but were opposing the method of the alleged transfer more than the transfer itself. Yankton, like Chicago, was located for a commercial center, and this was of far greater importance than the possession of a political center. Touching upon the subject of the capital location contest, the governor said:

The duty of the executive is not to make the laws, but to execute them. The only means he has of knowing the will of the people is by looking at the measures they have enacted through their representatives. If such representatives have been false to their constituents, the remedy lies in changing them and electing men more faithful to their oaths and their duty. Now, your Legislature has passed an act regarding the seat of government. What it intended to do, what it intended to accomplish by that act, is very plain. What it actually did accomplish must be determined by future developments.

This act repealed the law making Yankton the capital. It appointed a commission to fix upon a permanent seat of government, and last, it provided that until such location was made the territorial archives should remain in Yankton, unless the governor should designate some other point by written order. Whether this last provision was wise or unwise it is not for me to say, but it is certainly as much a part of the law as any other section. The governor, in his discretion, has acted upon this clause, and it is very clear to me that the power having been exercised, the order has all the force and effect of a statute until repealed or revoked. That the incoming governor may again recall the grant into play and revoke or annul the order is probably true. The question is, should this be done? I am told that the capital building will be completed within a few weeks and therefore the commissioners are required to notify the governor, who in turn is required to issue a proclamation and the offices shall then be issued to such place. Now, then, the order of Governor Ordway must be observed by the incoming governor or it must be revoked. It would be something more than a disregard of precedent and courtesy to ignore this order formally authorized as it was by the Legislature.

OSCAR SHERMAN GIFFORD
Pioneer of Lincoln County
Delegate to Congress from 1885 to 1889

Now, shall I revoke it? Would such an act contribute to the dignity and tranquility of the territory? Would not a proclamation revoking the order appear frivolous in view of the fact that within a fortnight the governor may be called upon to issue a proclamation enforcing it? I am asking these questions, not because I have completely settled the matter in my own mind, for events may occur to demand such revocation, but to suggest some of the difficulties I have encountered in considering this question. In a few months the Legislature will assemble and the people will have an opportunity to make their wishes known in this matter. Whatever action may be taken now will be but temporary and ephemeral at best, and in view of this fact what I may do seems of slight importance and trifling significance.

I have not discussed the legal proceedings which are pending, because I must act solely on what I find before me upon the law as it stands until altered by the Legislature or the courts. The Legislature meant to transfer the capital, of that there is no question. Recognizing the fact that it is the duty of the executive to carry out the intention and meaning of the people's representatives as thoroughly and completely as possible, I still wish it understood that I have no plans to push or theories to advance against any competent authority which may direct me to modify or reverse my action. I am the subject of the law. Let the law and people who make the law express clearly what they require me to do and I shall cheerfully obey.

Judge Peter C. Shannon, ex-chief justice, who was present, was then called upon and spoke as follows:

I have listened to the admirable speech of Governor Pierce and have concluded that it should cause serious reflection on the part of all good citizens. Our people are law-abiding and desire to do nothing but what is right and just, and as citizens they have the right to expect that the new administration will be carried on in a spirit of honor and of justice and of truth. Whatever conclusion the new governor may reach, we should give him our respect and esteem. A healthful respect for the law should always be encouraged.

I have coincided from the beginning in Judge Edgerton's ruling in the capital case, and I still believe that his ruling was correct. An appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court of the territory and decided. I would not put my opinion against three justices of the Supreme Court, still I believe the chief justice was right. In this country it will not do to attribute wrong motives to that tribunal, and we all owe a manly concession to the views of the majority. My views are but the views of an individual, still I think Judge Edgerton was right. The case has gone to the Supreme Court of the United States and it will take three years to get a decision. In the meantime the proper course is an appeal to the people to redress the wrong with their ballots at the next November election. The people should take care to select legislative representatives who would not, like the legislators of the past, accept bribes and perquisites for their votes. If we send true and trusty men the capital question will be settled in a way about which there can be no cavil. As an individual I believe Yankton to be the capital, but when three justices of the Supreme Court decide otherwise, the surest and best appeal is to the ballot.

Governor Pierce had taken the oath of office at 3.30 o'clock that afternoon, Friday, July 25th, and then became governor of Dakota. The oath would have been administered by Chief Justice Edgerton, but that official was absent from the city, and the duty fell upon ex-Governor Faulk, who at the time held the office of justice of the peace. The room where the ceremony took place was the office of John P. Cronan in the Fargo Block. Secretary and Acting Governor Teller and a few friends were present. Governor Faulk had also administered the official oath to Secretary Teller one year earlier. This was the first instance where a governor of Dakota was sworn in by a dignitary of less title than chief justice.

Governor Pierce was accompanied by his daughter, and the following day they took their departure for Chicago, leaving Acting Governor Teller in charge of the executive department for a few weeks, while the governor was arranging some matters of a personal character at Chicago prior to taking up his permanent residence at the capital of Dakota.

What Governor Pierce said in a Chicago interview:

Question—Do you think Bismarek will remain the permanent capital?

Answer—I have no more knowledge of that than yourself. It will depend upon who the people elect as their representatives, and what those representatives conclude to do about it. It is a matter in which I shall have no personal interest and in which I shall not assume to dictate or interfere. I am ready to reside wherever the capital may be located, whether it be Bismarek, Deadwood or Yankton.

According to the law under which the capital commission was acting, the commissioners were required to give the governor notice whenever the new structure at Bismarck was completed and ready for occupancy. The governor on the 13th of November, 1884, issued his proclamation announcing the fact, prefacing it with the following communication from the capital commissioners:

Bismarck, D. T., November 13, 1884.

To His Excellency, Gilbert A. Pierce, Governor of the Territory:

Sir—You are hereby notified that in accordance with the act of the Legislature of the Territory of Dakota, approved March 8, 1883, and entitled "an act to provide for the location of the seat of government of the Territory of Dakota, and for the erection of public buildings thereof, the commissioners therein named did, on the 2d day of June, 1883, select the site for the capital, as contemplated in section 4 of said act, which site is located in the City of Bismarck, County of Burleigh; that land and money was donated as provided for in said act, and from the proceeds of that part of said land which has been sold, and the money so donated, the building contemplated therein has been erected and completed.

By order of the commissioners,

ALEX HUGHES, President.

Attest: B. F. SPAULDING, Secretary.

The governor also recited that portion of the law bearing upon this phase of the law, and said:

Now, therefore, I, Gilbert A. Pierce, in obedience to the requirements of said act, do declare said Capitol Building ready for occupancy, and do hereby enjoin upon all persons whom it may concern to take due notice and govern themselves accordingly.

Up to this time Secretary of the Territory J. H. Teller and Treasurer W. H. McVay had maintained their offices in Yankton, but as it had become certain that the next Legislature would convene at Bismarck, these officials made preparations and removed to that city.

THE KNIGHTS TEMPLAR

The grand commandery of Knights Templar was organized at Sioux Falls at the Cyrene Asylum on the 16th of May, 1884, by Theodore S. Parvin, of Des Moines, Ia., grand recorder of the grand commandery of the United States. The following named delegates were in attendance:

Samuel Roy, eminent commander of Dakota No. 1, Deadwood. W. D. Stites, eminent commander; W. T. Doolittle, generalissimo, and B. F. Campbell, captain general, Cyrene No. 2, Sioux Falls. L. B. French, eminent commander; Dr. D. F. Etter, generalissimo, and L. D. Parmer, captain general, DeMolay No. 3, Yankton. M. A. Brewer, eminent commander, No. 5, Fargo.

No representatives of Tancred No. 4, Bismarck, were present, but that organization had signified its full endorsement of the movement for a grand body.

The code of statutes of the grand commandery of Iowa, with such changes to fit it for this body, was adopted.

After the adoption of the code, election of officers was had, with the following result:

Grand commander, Samuel Roy, Deadwood; deputy grand commander, William D. Stites, Sioux Falls; grand generalissimo, Dr. D. Frank Etter, Yankton; grand captain general, M. A. Brewer, Fargo; grand prelate, Rev. J. M. McBride, Sioux Falls; grand senior warden, A. T. Bigelow, Bismarck; grand junior warden, Edward Porrett, Fargo; grand treasurer, L. D. Parmer, Yankton; grand recorder, Edwin E. Sage, Sioux Falls; grand standard bearer, L. B. French, Yankton; grand sword bearer, R. C. Lake, Deadwood; grand warden, L. R. Graves, Deadwood; grand captain of the guard, William T. Doolittle, Sioux Falls.

The officers-elect were publicly installed in the evening at Cyrene Asylum by Theodore S. Parvin, of Iowa City, Ia., as representative of the most eminent grand master. The exercises were attended by a large company of ladies and blue lodge Masons, in addition to the members of the commandery.

Knighthood is an outgrowth of the days of chivalry and the crusades, when in the twelfth century the Christians of Europe arose to wrest Palestine and the Holy City from the infidel Saracens. It is built upon the cornerstone of Masonry, but is something more than that. A professor of any creed accepting the god-head may be a Mason, but only a believer in the Christian religion can be a Knight Templar. The latter order is therefore known only in Christian lands, while Masonry has penetrated to every civilized government on the globe. The original purposes of the order having expired with the circumstances that called it into being, it then developed into a higher and broader brotherhood, and has gone on linking the great and good of Christendom in bonds which must be eternal. It lays upon its adherents the duties of Christian gentlemen, and makes them particularly protectors of women, as were their renowned prototypes, and gives them the grand privilege of participating in that influence upon civilization and enlightenment which the order has always exerted.

The grand commandery of Dakota was the thirty-fourth in the United States—the first ever organized in any territory, and although it was the youngest, it was not the smallest; in fact, it had been constituted under circumstances more favorable than had been the case in a majority of sister jurisdictions in the states. Four years before the first subordinate commandery had been chartered at Deadwood, and the number present was five. At this, the first conclave of the grand commandery, the first charter was granted, which was given to Lacotah Commandery No. 6, on petition of twenty-eight sir knights at Huron. Grand Recorder Parvin was elected an honorary member of the grand commandery of Dakota. Sir Knight George H. Hand was appointed chairman of the committee of foreign correspondence. Grant's tactics were adopted for the government of the commandery. A committee on ritual was appointed. Yankton was selected as the place for the next meeting of the commandery. The commandery then closed in due form.

NEW JUDGES APPOINTED

On July 7, 1884, President Arthur appointed Frank Sperry, of New York, and Seward Smith, of Iowa, to be associate justices of the Supreme Court of Dakota. Mr. Sperry was to be assigned to the Eighth, or Bismarck district, and Judge Smith to the Fifth, or Huron district, both new districts organized under Delegate Raymond's bill, approved July 4, 1884.

Judge Seward Smith was confirmed as associate justice the day following his appointment. Judge Sperry was not reported. Judge Smith was a native of Massachusetts, and had been in the practice of law at Des Moines, Ia., for twenty-three years. He was fifty-three years old. Senator or Congressman Kasson, of Iowa, secured his appointment. Judge Smith had been for several years a law partner of General Solicitor Withrow of the Rock Island Road. He was recommended as a gentleman of ability and learned in the law, but "perhaps too amiable to shine brightly before a jury, but hard to excel in drawing pleadings."

Of Judge Sperry it was stated that he declined the Dakota appointment, feeling that his experience in law had not been sufficient to qualify him. The modest gentleman had been promised an Alaska appointment, which he failed to get.

Delegate Raymond made an effort to secure the appointment of two Dakotans to these places, and had recommended George H. Hand, of Yankton, and George P. Flannery, of Bismarck.

The declination of Mr. Sperry made a place for William H. Francis, who at the time was receiver or register of the Bismarck Land Office, and he was duly appointed and confirmed July 9th. Judge Francis had resided at Bismarck two years. He had been appointed to the land office from New Jersey, and had practiced law at Newark for a number of years. He was admitted to the bar in 1862.

Frank Sperry was appointed receiver of the Bismarck Land Office after declining the judgeship.

Before retiring from office Governor Ordway appointed George P. Flannery, of Bismarck, district attorney for the new Sixth Judicial District, and George A. Matthews, of Brookings, for the new Fifth District.

Judge Kidder, associate justice of the Fourth District, died in 1883, and C. S. Palmer, of Sioux Falls, and a close friend of Governor Ordway, was appointed to succeed him a few weeks prior to the famous decision in the capital removal case.

A MISSOURI RIVER COMMISSION

The river and harbor bill passed at the session of Congress for 1883-84 provided:

A commission to be called the Missouri River Commission, to consist of five members, shall be appointed by the President, three of whom to be selected from engineers of the army and two from civil life, one of whom at least shall be a civil engineer. The President shall designate the president of the commission. The commissioners appointed from the corps of engineers shall receive no other pay or compensation than is allowed them by law. The commissioners taken from civil life shall each receive $2,500 per annum.

It shall be the duty of the commission to superintend and direct the improvement of the river and carry into execution such plans for navigation from its mouth to headwaters as may now be devised and in progress and complete such surveys and examinations, investigations, topographical, hydrographical and hydrometrical, and mature such plans and all such estimates deemed necessary to maintain a channel in said river sufficient for navigation.

The secretary of war is authorized and directed to place under control and superintendence of the commission such vessels, machinery and instruments and such plants now provided, devised or in use, from appropriations heretofore made, or other sources, and when requested by the commission to detail from the engineers the officers and men necessary and place in charge of the commission vessels, machinery, instruments, etc., as may be necessary. And the commission may, with the approval of the secretary of war, employ additional force and assistance, and purchase or otherwise provide vessels, boats, etc., as may be deemed necessary, to be paid by appropriations made for said river. Said commission shall, under the direction and with the approval of the secretary of war, superintend, control and expend, for the purposes of this act, all appropriations or unexpended balances heretofore made for the improvement of said river, and which may be hereafter made, or so much thereof as necessary, shall prepare and submit through the chief of the engineer corps, to the secretary of war, to be by him submitted to Congress at the beginning of the regular session of each year in December of each year, a full and detailed report of all their proceedings and actions, and of all such plans and systems of work as may be now devised and in progress and carried out by them, and all of such additional plans and systems of work as may be devised and matured by them, with full and detailed estimates of the cost thereof, and statements of all expenditures made by them; and the secretary of war may detail from the corps of engineers or other corps of the army, an officer to act as secretary of the commission, and all moneys hereby appropriated for the improvement of said Missouri River shall be expended under the direction of the secretary of war in accordance with the plans of said commission, when such plans, specifications and recommendations have been approved by Congress.

The act further provided that the secretary of war should at his discretion cause an examination or survey, or both, and estimates of cost of improvement to be made. Five hundred thousand dollars was the amount appropriated. It was stated that this law had been the joint product of Delegate Raymond, of Dakota, and Delegate Maginnis, of Montana.

DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION TO CHOSE PRESIDENTIAL DELEGATES

The Democratic Territorial Committee called a convention to be held at Pierre May 14, 1884, for the purpose of electing two delegates and two alternates to the National Democratic Convention to be held at Chicago on the 8th of July to nominate candidates for President and vice president.

The Democratic Territorial Committee was made up as follows:

D. M. Inman, of Clay County, chairman; First Judicial District, D. P. Wilcox. R. P. Cormack, Judge Rhinehart; Second Judicial District, C. J. B. Harris, M. H.

Day, James S. Foster; Third Judicial District, M. F. McCormack, John P. Dunn, D. M. Kelliher; Fourth Judicial District, Abe Boynton, John R. Wood, T. S. Goddard.

The convention assembled pursuant to call. W. T. Love, of Beadle County, was made temporary chairman, and George Egbert, of Fargo, and C. J. Haines, of Pierre, secretaries. The Committee on Credentials was then appointed, consisting of:

Chairman, M. H. Day, of Bon Homme. First District, Fred E. Stearns, M. W. Rogers, of Pennington County; Second District, C. H. Price, of Hyde, and Maris Taylor, of Yankton; Third District, D. M. Kelliher, of Stutsman, and M. McCormick, of Grand Forks; Fourth District, George Henry, of Brookings, and E. C. Kennedy, of Turner.

Committee on Permanent Organization—C. J. B. Harris, Yankton, chairman; First District, F. E. Stearns, of Pennington, and J. W. Rogers, of Custer; Second District, James S. Foster, of Davison, and C. J. Harris, of Hughes; Third District, C. B. Pratt, of Grand Forks, and C. F. Smith, of Pembina; Fourth District, E. G. Smith, of Minnehaha, and C. F. Zimmerman, of Kingsbury.

Committee on Resolutions—W. F. Duncan, chairman; First District, J. F. Watson and J. W. Rogers; Second District, A. Adams, of Edmunds, and Benjamin P. Hoover, of Sully; Third District, W. J. Goodrich, of Stutsman, and C. J. Hallenback, of Burleigh; Fourth District, E. G. Wright, of Minnehaha, and F. G. Hale, of Lincoln.

The Committee on Permanent Organization reported:

For chairman, James S. Foster, of Davison; first vice chairman, H. C. O'Neill, of Cass; second vice chairman, E. G. Smith, of Minnehaha; secretary, Capt. Geo. Egbert, of Cass; assistant secretaries, Jacob Gibbert, of Minnehaha, and F. R. Fulton, of Grand Forks. The report was adopted.

The resolutions committee was not ready to report, and the business of the convention was taken up by the nomination of delegates to the Democratic National Convention. There were six nominations made, the successful ones being Capt. Frank M. Ziebach, of Bon Homme, and M. F. McCormack, of Grand Forks; alternate, Fred Stearns, of Pennington.

The platform declared in favor of a division of the territory on the forty-sixth parallel, but did not endorse any candidate for the presidency.

The final adjournment of the convention did not take place until the following day, the delegates remaining to talk over the delegate question and to consider territorial matters. There was an unusual buoyancy observed among the delegates which appeared to have grown out of an expectation that the next President would be a democrat, and they would then all be in clover. It was a coming event that had cast its shadow before, and gave to the proceedings an unusual interest and animation.

DEMOCRATIC DELEGATE NOMINATING CONVENTION

The Democratic Territorial Delegate Convention of 1884 was held in the City of Sioux Falls October 2d. John R. Wilson, of Lawrence County, chairman of the territorial committee, called the convention to order. Charles H. Price, of Hyde County, was elected temporary chairman, and E. B. Palmer, of Hughes County, secretary.

As there were no contesting delegations, the chair proceeded and appointed the following committees, to-wit:

On Credentials—J. B. Conklin, of Lincoln County; J. J. Smith, Hand; A. E. Cord, Foster; W. S. Wynn, Minnehaha; J. C. Slater, Kingsbury; Claude LeBland, Brule.

On Permanent Organization—L. A. Burke, Edmunds; Fred Marsh, Ransom; M. S. Robinson, Turner; Frank Foster, Hansen; Miles Russell, Clay; S. G. Humphreys, Charles Mix; N. H. Young, Sully County.

On Resolutions—F. M. Ziebach, Bon Homme; C. J. B. Harris, Yankton; M. W. Sheafe, Jr., Union; P. B. McCarthy, Pennington; V. E. Hall, Cass; F. T. Ohlwine, Beadle; F. E. Lally, Hamlin.

The Committee on Credentials reported the following named persons entitled to seats in the convention as delegates from the various counties:

Bon Homme County, F. M. Ziebach, George H. Bangs, M. H. Day, H. A. Reeves, James Baskin; Butte County, P. V. McCarthy (proxy for D. J. Harrington); Beadle County, Frank Ohlwine; Cass County, J. E. Hall, two votes; Clay County, Miles Russell, W. W. Smith, D. M. Inman; Charles Mix County, S. G. Humphrey; Brule County, C. G. LeBland, Louis LeFebre; Dickey County, William H. Becker; Foster County, A. G. Covell; Hyde County, Charles A. Price; Hamlin County, F. E. Lally; Hand County, J. J. Smith; Hughes County, E. B. Palmer, James Ward, J. P. Watson; Hanson County, F. B. Foster, Lewis Meesch, H. W. Bade; Kingsbury County, J. C. Slater, E. W. Ellis; Lake County, William Tobin, W. McGrath; Lawrence County, P. McCarthy (proxy for John R. Wilson), V. B. Baker, F. W. McLeFresh, W. C. Kingsley, E. R. Collins, John D. Hale, W. R. Steele, S. P. Romans, W. McClintock, C. A. Gushurst, C. F. Thompson, D. P. Wilcox, W. A. Rhinehart, C. Baupre; Lincoln County, O. D. Hincley, S. V. Conklin, F. J. Rodway; Douglas County, A. D. Maher; Edmunds County, L. A. Burke; Minnehaha County, E. G. Wright, W. S. Wynn, C. K. Howard, A. Houser, G. G. Phelps, G. E. Phelps, William VanEps, E. G. Smith; Ransom County, F. E. Marsh; Sully County, N. H. Young; Sanborn County, Thomas R. Dunn, Ed. Welsh; Pennington County, P. B. McCarthy, J. P. Plunkett, William Bachelor, J. A. Gervy, Charles L. Allen; Turner County, M. S. Robinson, R. Reese, J. O. Brodie; Yankton County, C. J. B. Harris, L. D. Palmer, Augustus High, Maris Taylor, Isaac Waterbury, John Noonan; Union County, Mark W. Sheafe, Jr., John R. Wood, Thomas Brody.

The Committee on Permanent Organization recommended D. M. Inman, of Clay County, for permanent chairman, and W. H. Becker, of Dickey, for secretary. The report was adopted, as was also the report of the Committee on Credentials.

The convention then proceeded to the nomination of a candidate for delegate to Congress. The candidates were John R. Wilson, of Lawrence County; Mark W. Sheafe, Jr., of Union, and Maris Taylor, of Yankton. The two last named withdrew, and Mr. Wilson was unanimously nominated.

A territorial committee was then appointed as follows:

First Judicial District—B. G. Caulfield, of Lawrence; Ben Bear, of Lawrence; F. E. Stearns, Pennington; P. B. McCarthy, Pennington; D. W. Flick, Custer. Second District—S. G. Humphreys, Charles Mix County; John L. Farre, Brule; C. J. B. Harris, Yankton; James S. Foster, Davison; Matt. Kean, Sanborn. Third District—J. A. Joy, Grand Forks; T. A. Webb, Pembina; F. E. Marsh, Ransom; George Egbert, Cass; John Blank, Richland. Fourth District—M. W. Sheafe, Jr., Union; R. Reese, Turner; William VanEps, Minnehaha; Abe Boynton, Lincoln; John Brennan, Lake County. Fifth District—J. A. Ward, Hughes County; F. Lally, Hamlin; L. A. Burke, Edmunds; J. J. Smith, Hand; J. C. Slater, Hughes. Sixth District—D. M. Kelliher, Stutsman; J. C. Hollenbach, Burleigh; N. H. Becker, Dickey; A. G. Covell, Foster; W. F. Vallandigham, Barnes.

The Resolutions Committee submitted a platform which met the approbation of the convention and was adopted without a dissenting vote. The platform congratulated the country on the nomination of Grover Cleveland for President, and declared for the admission of Dakota into the Union as one state.

REPUBLICAN CONVENTION TO ELECT PRESIDENTIAL DELEGATES

The Republican Central Committee of Dakota Territory, of which E. P. Wells, of Jamestown, was chairman, and E. W. Caldwell, secretary, called a territorial convention to meet at Huron on the 22d of April for the purpose of electing two delegates to the National Republican Convention, to be held at Chicago June 3d, to nominate candidates for President and vice president. The number of delegates apportioned to the convention was 220. The counties represented were nearly the same as those named in the call for the territorial delegate convention, which appears in this chapter.

The convention assembled at Huron, April 23d. John H. King, of Chamberlain, was elected temporary chairman, with Col. A. W. Edwards, of Fargo, secretary. A committee on credentials was appointed, as follows: J. R. Gamble, Yankton; Howell, of Campbell; Dewey, of Hughes; Steele, of Kidder; Beardsley, of Cass; Yorker, of Walsh; Nickens, of Stutsman; Harding, of Lawrence; Palmer, of McCook; Drake, of Brown; L. C. Tyler, of Hand; Gilbert, of Dickey; Thorson, of Lincoln.

These were the days when James G. Blaine was the acknowledged leader of one of the strongest wings of the republican party, and his friends had set out to make him the nominee of the national party for President, the strife therefore in this convention of Dakotans was whether to elect Blaine delegates or Arthur delegates, President Arthur being up for re-election. There were 205 delegates present, and the forces were quite evenly divided. Colonel Plummer, of Fargo, was elected president of the convention when the permanent organization was effected.

After quite a strenuous contest Hon. N. E. Nelson, of Pembina County, and Hon. John L. Jolley, of Clay County, were elected delegates, with Byron E. Pay, of Brookings County, and R. E. Wallace, a banker of Jamestown, alternates. The delegates were instructed to vote for Blaine.

The convention endorsed resolutions favoring a division of the territory on the forty-sixth parallel, and the admission of the southern half into the Union, and then adjourned.

THE TERRITORIAL CAMPAIGN

The preliminary political campaign on the part of the republicans in 1884 was in some of its prominent features a continuation of the campaign of 1882. John B. Raymond, of Fargo, had been nominated at Grand Forks in 1882 as the result of a bargain between a large portion of the Northern Dakota delegates and the faction of the party south known as the Pettigrew faction. He was elected by a large majority, carried every county save two, and had made an efficient and successful agent of the territory at Washington both before the departments and in Congress. He had received many voluntary encomiums from prominent congressmen for his untiring zeal and efficiency in promoting territorial matters and for his general deportment. His constituents appeared to be well satisfied with his official service, and his renomination and election in 1884 was looked upon during the first half of the year as a foregone conclusion. Mr. Pettigrew would not be a candidate, and Mr. Hand had become engaged in a profitable private business and had no ambition politically at the time. Raymond had been a hard and faithful worker in the promotion of everything that he was elected to promote, and had steadfastly refused to betray his trust by giving any countenance or favor to the one-state schemes of Ordway. The people of the territory seemed satisfied with his course, and when the time came for choosing his successor there was ground for the prevailing opinion that he would be chosen to succeed himself.

Conditions within the territory had changed radically since his first successful campaign. The republicans of Northern Dakota were not now united in his favor, but were largely against him—it is meant by this that the republican leaders who would manage the caucuses and conventions were largely against him, though the masses were probably for him. Two years before he had been chosen on a division and admission platform. Since his election the Legislature had passed the capital removal bill by methods which were quite generally condemned; the capital commission had located the capital at Bismarck, and thereafter there was heard no demand for division from that immediate locality, but on the contrary a declaration was issued from that quarter that "division was dead." Governor Ordway and Alexander McKenzie were now the ruling spirits of the northern capital, and the admission of Dakota as one state was their shibboleth. They demanded of Raymond that he should introduce a bill in Congress legalizing the act of the Territorial Legislature in removing the capital (the matter then being in litigation), which Raymond declined to do, and also refused to countenance any one-state measures.

This position of the delegate, which was justifiably taken, gave serious offense to Ordway and McKenzie and those interested with them, but his position was stoutly defended by the greater portion of his northern as well as southern constituents. The Ordway faction had adherents here and there throughout the territory, as had been in evidence quite frequently, and added to this Ordway hostility was the opposition of Mr. Pettigrew and his many adherents, who had not "buried the hatchet" completely at Grand Forks in 1882, when Pettigrew was compelled to yield to Raymond to prevent the nomination of a rival candidate from Southern Dakota. The handle of the hatchet had been left exposed and the implement had been drawn from its open sepulcher and entered for service in the campaign of 1884. It was not charged that the course of Mr. Pettigrew and his friends was due to a revengeful feeling, but it is not improbable that their opposition to Mr. Raymond was rendered easier because of the presumed advantage taken by Raymond's friends in 1882.

It was a presidential election year, and James G. Blaine was the republican candidate for President. Dakota had declared for Blaine in its convention, and there was no dissension on that score, though Raymond had stated that he favored the nomination of Mr. Arthur, who had become President at the death of President Garfield.

There was yet another and probably the strongest impelling force among the republicans of the southern territory, which had for its purpose to regain the lead in the political affairs of the territory which had been lost to them at Grand Forks, and again by the proceedings of the last Legislature. The approach of statehood, which could no longer be looked upon as a remote event, suggested to the leaders south that they must get together and "save the state," and the result was a strong coalition in favor of a South Dakota candidate for delegate and the control of the central committee. Pettigrew was not a candidate and refused to become a candidate, and during the preliminary campaign, though two or three prominent names were suggested, including Judge Gifford and Samuel McMasters, of the Black Hills, there was no candidate who received anything like the united support of the elements opposed to Raymond. But the Ordway and McKenzie people, together with the forces who were acting in concert with Pettigrew, were actively at work to prevent the election of Raymond delegates, and it required all the forces they could muster, for Raymond had grown in favor through the territory, and was much stronger than when he was first a candidate.

Ordway had withdrawn largely from his efforts to usurp the delegate's duties at Washington, which he manifested so persistently to the annoyance of Delegate Pettigrew. He no longer besieged Congress and the departments, and related the story of the recklessness and willful extravagance of the Dakota legislators and the counties of the territory. He had "taken the wind all out of his own sails" by his pernicious course during the Legislature of 1883. In 1881 he had vetoed a dozen or more county bills that granted the privilege of issuing bonds for building courthouses and needed jails, and was able at Washington to make quite a showing of the way he "set his face against all forms of corruption" by parading his veto messages before the President and the departments and the members of Congress who had listened to his stories of the profligate character of the people he had been appointed to rule over; but in 1883-84 he was estopped by the colossal recklessness of the Legislature of 1883, when he approved bills for bonding the territory and counties, and appropriating public moneys amounting to hundreds of thousands, for much of which there was no demand at the time. Therefore Delegate Raymond pursued the even tenor of his way unmolested, at least openly, and had given general satisfaction. And while Raymond resided at Fargo and had business interests as a wheat farmer in the north, he was not regarded as a sectional man. He was as proud of the south as the north, and for a number of years had resided in the extreme southern section.

This was the situation when the Republican Territorial Convention assembled at Pierre in September, 1884. It was "Raymond against the field," and the field against Raymond. The total vote of the convention was 386. Of these Raymond mustered 173 on the early ballots, leaving him twenty-three short of a majority. Raymond felt quite confident of winning at the opening of the convention.

The Territorial Republican Convention was called to meet at Pierre, Wednesday, September 17, 1884, at 2 o'clock P. M. The basis of representation was changed from former conventions, and in place of apportioning the delegates on the number of votes cast in the counties, owing to the vast increase of population since that vote in 1882, it was deemed advisable to make the apportionment as follows:

In said convention the representation shall be two delegates for each organized county and additional delegates based upon said county's population, as shown by its vote for congressional delegate in 1882, at the rate of one delegate to said territorial convention for each 200 votes or major fraction thereof cast at said election.

Following gives the apportionment: Counties—Aurora, 5; Barnes, 8; Beadle, 5; Bon Homme, 8; Brookings, 9; Brown, 7; Brule, 5; Burleigh, 7; Billings, 2; Benson, 2; Butte, 2; Campbell, 2; Cass, 15; Charles Mix, 3; Cavalier, 2; Clark, 4; Clay, 7; Codrington, 6; Custer, 4; Hutchinson, 5; Day, 3; Dickey, 3; Douglas, 3; Deuel, 4; Jerauld, 2; Emmons, 2; Faulk, 2; Feater, 2; Fall River, 2; Grand Forks, 11; Grant, 8; Griggs, 6; Hamlin, 4; Hand, 5; Hanson, 4; Minnehaha, 14; Hughes, 4; Hyde, 2; Kidder, 3; Kingsbury, 6; Pennington, 6; Lake, 6; Union, 8; Logan, 2; Lincoln, 8; McCook, 6; McLean, 2; Sanborn, 2; McPherson, 2; Miner, 8; Mercer, 2; Steele, 2; Moody, 7; Morton, 5; Nelson, 3; Pembina, 8; Edmunds, 2; LaMoure, 3; Lawrence, 21; Ransom, 5; Richland, 6; Roberts, 2; Rolette, 2; Sargent, 2; Spink, 7; Stark, 2; Davison, 6; Stutsman, 7; Sully, 2; Towner, 2; Traill, 10; Turner, 8; Potter, 2; Ramsey, 2; Walsh, 13; Walworth, 2; Yankton, 8.

Signed by Committeemen—E. P. Wells, W. F. Steele, Iver Larson, B. R. Benson, John Fadden, E. W. Caldwell, George W. Haines, W. H. Skimmer, W. M. Cuppett, John H. Drake, John H. King, A. J. Plowman, H. M. Gregg, A. C. Boland, Republican Territorial Central Committee, appointed after the Grand Forks convention in 1882. Wells was chairman; E. W. Caldwell and A. W. Edwards, secretaries.

The delegates elected under the foregoing call assembled at Pierre on Wednesday, September 17th, and were called to order by E. W. Caldwell, of Minnehaha County, one of the secretaries of the central committee.

D. D. Holdridge, of Miner County (anti-Raymond), was elected temporary chairman, and A. H. Lewis, of Grant; V. V. Barnes, of Kingsbury, and R. B. Hoskins, of Pembina, secretaries.

After a lively discussion led by the leaders, Nickets, for Raymond, and Moody, anti-Raymond, the convention voted to adjourn until next day in order that the chairman might make up the Committee on Credentials and that committee have time to perform its duty, which would include the hearing of a few contests.

The Credentials Committee was composed as follows: John Bett, of Clark County, chairman; R. F. Aikens, Lincoln; J. B. Jones, Clay; N. Root, Barnes; D. R. Jackson, Lawrence; A. K. Fahnstock, Codrington; A. H. Clark, Custer; F. B. Phillips, Jerauld; N. B. Scribner, Brown; R. D. Jennings, Fall River; J. G.

Hamilton, Grand Forks; W. F. Steele, Kidder; D. A. Mizener, Davison; John A. Stoyell, Burleigh; W. Karl Gerner, Beadle.

The Committee on Permanent Organization was also announced, as follows: A. F. Stuart, Fall River; E. W. Foster, Spink; N. W. Tyner, Cass; F. B. Allen, Burleigh; John R. Gamble, Yankton.

The Committee on Credentials submitted its report on the convening of the convention Thursday, as follows, the following named being entitled to seats in the convention: Aurora County, B. H. Sullivan, W. M. Smith, I. N. Auld, John Rogers, Rache Hooper; Barnes County, N. Boot; Burleigh County, N. G. Ordway, Judge Flannery, J. C. Bly, W. Griffin, John A. Stoyell, J. Neal, S. A. Bentley; Beadle County, J. W. Shannon, Karl Gerner, Fred Hord, A. Davis, John Cain; Bon Homme County, Fred Morgan, Peter Wagner, Sylvester Wilcox, T. M. Hitt, Charles Stilwill, A. W. Lavender, Robert Dollard, D. Wilcox; Brown County, J. C. Houghton, Thomas Burnham, C. T. McCoy, M. V. B. Scribner, J. C. Luse, C. J. C. MacLeod; Brookings County, C. E. Hamlin, B. E. Pay, John Lynch, Charles Preston, K. C. Knudson, Henry Lawshe, J. O'B. Scobey, L. D. Miner, E. L. Sparling; Butte County, C. F. Johnson, H. J. Grant; Brule County, John H. King, E. C. Cook, F. J. Goodykoontz; Benson County, T. J. Larison, E. S. Rosph; Billings County, represented by Morton County; Cavalier County, L. C. Naracong; Charles Mix County, 3; Cass County, John E. Haggart (chairman), D. H. Twomey, N. N. Tyner, Charles Scott, C. Byerly, J. W. Morrow, W. J. Hawk, John Rustad, A. C. Marshman, E. S. Tyler, E. V. McKnight, George Brandenburg, R. M. Pollock; Campbell County, Frank Alexander; Clark, Sam. E. Elrod, Carl G. Sherwood, J. E. Bennett; Clay County, J. A. Barnsback, Daniel Berglund, Hans Myron, F. E. Jones, J. V. White, Harvey Gunderson; T. J. Douthitt; Codington County, A. C. Mellette, T. V. Eddy, W. S. Glass, Frank Crane, E. D. Wheelock, Cortland Wood; Custer County, Judge Cook, A. H. Clark, George Boland, A. K. Smith; Dickey County, T. M. Pugh, William H. Seward, J. B. Brown, G. P. Melendy; Douglas County, Irving H. Welch, F. LeCocq, Jr., John Elbinger; Davison County, C. M. Cooley, George A. Johnson, E. M. Ewart, D. A. Mizener, E. Hitchcock, David Cole; Day County, David Williams; Deuel County, H. H. Herrick; Emmons County, William V. Wade, E. T. Herrick; Fall River County, A. S. Stewart, R. D. Jennings; Faulk County, J. A. Pickler, John M. Chain; Foster County, H. C. Jones; Grant County, H. Niel, N. Thorndike, A. H. Lewis, S. S. Lockhart, W. F. Crawford, J. B. Whitcomb, C. B. Williams, N. J. Lowthian; Grand Forks County, J. G. Hamilton, George A. Walsh; Griggs County, E. S. Rolfe, H. M. Clark, O. G. Menham; Hughes County, L. E. Gaffey, H. F. Sawtell, Gilbert M. Stevenson, Gen. William Stough; Hanson County, L. C. Taylor, A. J. Parsball, J. B. Hayne; Hamlin County, 4; Hand County, B. R. Howell, W. G. White, Turney M. The total number of votes in the convention was 386, requiring 194 to nominate. Raymond was the strongest candidate at the opening of the convention and for two days following. At the caucus held by his friends there were 186 votes for him. The actual candidates were quite numerous. The following named were formally placed before the convention by nomination:

Karl Gerner named Junius W. Shannon, of Beadle County; John W. Stoyell, of Burleigh County, named Dr. W. A. Bentley, of Burleigh County; J. P. Fowler, of Pennington County, named John B. Raymond, of Cass; T. V. Eddy, of Codington County, named A. C. Mellette, of Codington; Charles W. Stough, of Hughes County, named Eli Johnson, of Hyde County; Judge J. M. Carter, of Lincoln, named Oscar S. Gifford, of Lincoln; Gideon C. Moody, of Lawrence, named Samuel McMasters, of Lawrence. Had an early vote on the nomination been had Raymond would probably have been nominated. Understanding this, the Gifford and McMasters forces sought reasons for delay, and no ballot for the nomination was had until Friday morning, when upon the first vote the result stood: Raymond, 170½; McMasters, 32; Mellette, 40; Gifford, 89½; Shannon, of Huron, 18; Bentley, 27; Laird, 2; Moody, 2; Edgerton, 1.

There were seven ballots had without material changes, Raymond, however, losing eight votes and Gifford gaining eight. When the final break came, resulting in Gifford's nomination, Raymond still had his 170 votes, with 2½ votes additional. This was on the twelfth ballot. On the eleventh ballot Gifford had 97 and Raymond 172. On the twelfth Gifford received 223 and the nomination, which was made unanimous. Moody led the break to Gifford by throwing the McMasters vote of Lawrence County to that candidate.

Raymond's defeat did not come as a rebuke for his course as delegate, for he was probably at the time the most popular man in the field of candidates, and had really won his popularity by his efficiency as delegate to Congress and by remaining true to the interests of the people and their overwhelming desire for a division of the territory and statehood for the southern half, and in the contest before the convention it is plainly seen that at this time in 1884 the Northern Dakota sentiment, outside of Burleigh County, was almost solid for division. Delegate Raymond's position on the important issues were emphatically and clearly stated just prior to the territorial convention in the following brief note:

Fargo, Dak., August 19, 1884.

I have always been, am now, and ever shall be, in favor of division and statehood. I know of no citizens of North Dakota, save a few at Bismarck, who are opposed to division or who harbor any unkind feelings toward South Dakota. I deem it of so much importance, not only to Dakota but to all the Northwest and the republican party, that I would sacrifice all other measures and my position in Congress to secure it. I would not accept a nomination if accompanied by instructions to oppose division and statehood at the earliest possible date.

JNO. B. RAYMOND.

The platform adopted gave no expression regarding Ordway or the capital removal methods. Otherwise it was undoubtedly a fair expression of the republicans of the territory concerning the subjects mentioned. The text of the document follows:

Be it resolved by the representatives of the republican party assembled, that we hereby express our loyalty to the principles of the party as adopted at the last national convention.

Resolved, That we heartily endorse the present administration of public affairs as calculated to secure honest government, peace and prosperity at home, and respect for our nation abroad.

Resolved, That we commend the services of our delegate in Congress, John B. Raymond, and that we express our appreciation of the beneficial legislation he has secured.

Resolved, That we emphatically urge upon Congress the claims made by Dakota for division on the forty-sixth parallel, and the admission of the southern half to the rights and privileges of statehood.

Resolved, That we earnestly ask of Congress the ratification of the Indian treaty that has been made for the cession to the government of a large part of the Great Sioux Reservation, and that we also ask for the opening of the Winnebago and Wahpeton and Sisseton reservations in the territory, and that the lands included in them shall be disposed of only under the provisions of the bill now pending before Congress.

Resolved, That as there has already been a liberal appropriation for a survey of the Missouri River with the object of its improvement, that we ask Congress for prompt legislation for the purpose of such improvement, not only to the end that our natural advantages for commerce may be benefited, but that valuable lands, timber and otherwise, may be preserved from destruction.

Resolved, That as the demand for homes upon the public domain is greater than ever and cannot be supplied with lands that can possibly be surveyed with the present funds allowed, we ask that an appropriation be made sufficiently large to meet the demands for homesteads, preemption and timber claims.

Resolved, That we deprecate the public plunder of the sections set apart for the benefit of school funds, and that we ask of Congress the enactment of such laws as shall preserve them for their legitimate purpose, and as shall secure to the territorial treasury the revenue which might be obtained by permitting them to be lawfully used under lease or otherwise.

Resolved, That we deprecate any sweeping interference with the present land laws.

Resolved, That we favor the passage of a bill by Congress granting a portion of the unoccupied public domain for the establishment of a school of forestry and experiment stations in Dakota.

Resolved, That the present price of government lands within railroad limits work a great injustice upon the settler, as it makes him pay for an equal amount of land which the government claims to have given to the railroad company.

Resolved, That our delegate in Congress is requested to use his utmost endeavors to secure the passage of a bill making all government lands bear the equal price of $1.25 per acre.

Resolved, That this convention recommends to the different counties in Dakota the importance of a proper exhibit at the World's Exposition at New Orleans.

Raymond's defeat may be ascribed, in a general way, to the proceedings of the Grand Forks convention that nominated him in 1882, where he received his nomination by a combination with Pettigrew. The result at Pierre, so far as it affected the political fortunes of Raymond, was the aftermath of Grand Forks; and in a general way his defeat was due to about the same causes that retired Bennett in 1880, Bennett reaping the wrath of the "soreheads" who charged that he had defeated Kidder by unfair means. Pettigrew succeeded Bennett, but he did not unite the party, though he was loyally supported by it, elected and made a most efficient delegate, but at the conclusion of his term he found arrayed against him the same elements that had opposed him two years before.

The nomination of Mr. Gifford promised a respite from or rather would leave no feeling of resentment that would have the least influence upon the councils of the republican party at their next assembling. It placed the party in a position similar to that which it occupied when Judge Kidder was first nominated in 1875. It united all the elements. Gifford had antagonized no one; he had no overweening ambition to become a leader, was competent to discharge the duties of the office and everyone felt that he would do so strictly as he had agreed to.

The defeat of Raymond eliminated from the field of leadership in the republican party a popular citizen who, had he received this nomination, might have remained in a position to materially affect the fortunes of other leaders, for it is apparent that in the republican party at this time, with statehood in view, there were as many leaders, and even more, than could be accommodated with high positions in the new state, including senatorial and congressional positions, as well as state officers.

The Central Committee for the ensuing two years was elected by the convention: A. C. Mellette, chairman, Codington County; John A. Stoyell, Burleigh County; M. H. Jewell, Burleigh County; N. G. Nelson, Pembina County; H. W. Alexander, Hanson County; A. W. Edwards, Cass County; J. A. Monroe, Barnes County; Johnson Nickeus, Stutsman County; W. F. Steele, Kidder County; John VanDusen, Hughes County; F. D. Hughes, Brown County; J. N. Wheeler, Brookings County; T. K. Long, Sanborn County; M. H. Kelly, Davison County; E. B. Dawson, Clay County; J. R. Gamble, Yankton County; A. Davis, Beadle County; B. F. Campbell, Minnehaha County; R. N. Welch, Union County; W. A. Houton, Spink County; H. J. Patterson, Aurora County; J. A. Pickler, Faulk County; T. M. Hitt, Bon Homme County; N. V. Reed, Kingsbury County; K. G. Phillips and Seth Bullock, Lawrence County; Sam Roy, Turner County; A. D. Clark, Pennington County; A. S. Stewart, Custer County; S. S. Lockhart, Grant County; C. F. Johnson, Butte County.

SKETCH OF THE CANDIDATE

Mr. Gifford was widely known and highly esteemed as a citizen, but had not been known as a politician, and in fact was not naturally inclined to that field of endeavor. He was a business man with a substantial reputation in that field. While the Lawrence County delegation, which fate designed should have the decisive vote in making the nomination, supported McMasters, being moved thereto by local considerations, Judge Moody, the leader, was friendly to Gifford, and undoubtedly expected or intended to go to him when the psychological moment came, there being no reasonable probability that McMasters could be nominated.

Raymond was formidable, standing on his determined battalion of 170 delegates, but one can observe in this situation where a candidate may be strong before the people, in matters of this character, and yet this strength may be his principal source of weakness. At that time the controlling forces in the republican party did not desire to recruit any more leaders. It was over-supplied, and had Raymond won in this contest he would very likely have displaced some who had not only ambition for honorable position, but the fruition of their ambition was very promising. The triumph of Raymond might have changed the destiny of individuals and of aspiring cities even, and it is related that the astute McKenzie, who, though a democrat, was on the ground and almost frantic because of the formidable candidacy of Raymond, finally went to Judge Moody and made a strong personal appeal to him to change the Black Hills vote to Gifford in order that Raymond might be defeated. The change was made and Raymond's political star became permanently obscured. Judge Gifford, in addition to his substantial qualifications, would not endeavor to build up a faction in the party to promote his individual interests. Raymond had already a strong following.

Oscar S. Gifford was born in Watertown, N. Y., in 1842, and looked all of his forty-two years. His early life was spent on a farm and his early educational advantages were not pronounced. In 1854, when Oscar was a lad of twelve years, his parents removed to Boone County, Ill., where in winter the boy went to school, spending his summers on his father's farm until 1861, when he enlisted in an Illinois regiment of infantry and as a private soldier fought all through the Civil war. Returning to Illinois in 1865, he succeeded in very much improving his education in a neighboring academy, and taught school in Boone County several seasons. In 1871, he started for Dakota, arriving in Canton, Lincoln County, as he says, without either a carpet bag or a federal commission. He soon succeeded in amassing some property and opened a general store in Canton, but his tastes did not lead to mercantile pursuits. He was soon elected a justice of the peace, serving in that capacity and also as mayor of Canton for several terms. Opportunity serving, Mr. Gifford commenced to read law in the office of Mark W. Bailey, of Canton, one of the brightest lawyers in Southern Dakota. Admitted to practice, he associated himself in the legal business with Mr. Bailey, and the partnership was continued until the death of the latter. Since that time Mr. Gifford has continued the pursuit of his profession and has acquired considerable property. He is married and has one son, four years old. Mr. Gifford is a stalwart republican, inclined to protection, and earnest for division on the forty-sixth parallel, and the admission of South Dakota as a state.

SCHOOLS OF FORESTRY

Delegate Raymond introduced a bill to establish a school of forestry in Dakota. It did not pass, and it was not defeated for want of merit by a vote of either House but for lack of time. It would have passed, undoubtedly, if it could have been reached in the House. It was a comprehensive and practical measure and provided funds, lands, and authority to establish a number of forests in the territory.

HARMONY AMONG REPUBLICANS

The territorial campaign following the nominations was comparatively a quiet one, it being generally believed that Gifford, owing to the harmonious conditions that apparently prevailed in the republican ranks north and south and in the Black Hills would receive the full vote of his party, which would insure his election by a large majority.

The democrats, however, did not permit the election to go by default, but made every reasonable effort to secure votes. It is not to be presumed that they anticipated a victory in Dakota, but they were quite sanguine that the national contest between Blaine, republican, and Cleveland, democrat, would give their party the presidency. Cleveland was governor of the great State of New York at the time, having been elected thereto two years before by a majority of over a quarter of a million. New York was looked upon as a pivotal state, and the democrats the country over were prosecuting the national campaign with unusual energy.

Mr. Blaine was a candidate for the first time, but he had been prominently before the people for fifteen years, and had been a prominent candidate before the convention that nominated Garfield. He was a great leader and an able statesman, but he was not without influential and open opposition in his own party. There was, therefore, sufficient in the national contest to encourage the democrats of Dakota to make a good showing at home which would recommend them to the favor of the next national administration should Cleveland be successful.

This was the campaign that gave rise to the organization of the republican faction which was stigmatized as "mugwumps," led by Henry Ward Beecher and Harper's Weekly, which gave its support to Cleveland.

There was also an unusual interest felt in the territorial contest for members of the Legislature, it being the general opinion that the capital question was not yet settled, and the sentiment of the next Legislature would determine whether the people endorsed the removal and the methods by which it was accomplished. The capital had not, however, been entirely removed from Yankton. The Supreme Court held its session there in October, 1884, and the secretary and acting governor, Mr. Teller, had kept his office there, but it was conceded that the coming legislative session would convene at Bismarck, and Governor Pierce had established his residence there.

Overshadowing and modifying all else was the dominating expectation of a division of the territory and the admission of the southern half as a state. With the accomplishment of this it was realized that all the differences between the two sections would be amicably adjusted.

THE OFFICIAL CANVAESS OF THE VOTE FOR CONGRESSMAN

We hereby certify that the statement hereto annexed is a full, true and complete statement of the lawful votes cast and returned according to law for the office of delegate to Congress at the general election held in the Territory of Dakota on the 4th day of November, A. D. 1884, as appears from the returns now on file in the office of the secretary of the territory and as canvassed by us this 20th day of December, A. D. 1884.

A. J. EDGERTON, Chief Justice.

J. H. TELLER, Secretary.

The officially canvassed vote will be found in the following tables by counties, the northern and the southern counties separated in order to show the party strength in each county as well as in each of the two grand divisions of the territory:

With such a one-sided partisan showing, Dakota was not in a strong position to appeal to a democratic President and a democratic House of Representatives, both having been chosen at this election for admission to the Union as two states.

EDUCATIONAL AND RELIGIOUS INSTITUTIONS—PIERCE, GOVERNOR

NEW ORLEANS COTTON EXPOSITION—SKETCH OF MCKENZIE—MILWAUKEE CAR EXHIBIT—EDUCATIONAL AND RELIGIOUS INSTITUTIONS—CATHOLICISM IN DAKOTA—EVANGELISTS ORGANIZE—CONDITION OF THE FARMS—COUNTY ORGANIZATION—ORDWAY INDICTED AND INDICTMENT QUASHED—GOVERNOR CLEVELAND (N. Y.) THANKSGIVING PROCLAMATION—RAILROAD BUILDING—GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC ORGANIZED.

THE NEW ORLEANS COTTON EXPOSITION

Alexander McKenzie, of Bismarek, having been appointed by Governor Ordway, commissioner to take charge of the exhibit of Dakota at the New Orleans Cotton Exposition and World's Fair, issued a circular letter with an appeal for funds in June, 1884 (July 2), as follows:

The people of Dakota have always felt a just pride in their great territory, its resources and capabilities, and have never lost an opportunity to present its superior advantages to the world. Perhaps no territory in the Union has been so thoroughly advertised as Dakota, yet the half has not been told. Dakota is an empire in itself and even its own people would be amazed at the lack of intelligence they have regarding the vast resources of the territory as a whole if samples of the products were congregated together. The people of each section know the advantages of their immediate surroundings, but few, indeed, can realize the grand aggregate of resources, developed and undeveloped.

Probably the most successful method of attracting the attention of settlers and investors, outside of personal efforts, has been through the medium of exhibits at various fairs and exhibitions, where the products of the territory have been brought in competition with those of other sections of the country. Attention has thus been attracted in a practical way, and scoffers and doubters have been silenced when brought in contact with actual results.

The World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition to be held in New Orleans from December 1, 1884, to June 1, 1885, promises to be one of the greatest events of the kind in the history of the world. Congress has seen fit to appropriate $1,000,000 to aid in the construction of buildings and preparation of grounds, and nearly every country on the globe has already signified its intention to take part in the affair. The people of Dakota have been invited to make an exhibit of their productions and resources, as the exhibition will be attended by visitors and representative men from all parts of the world, the opportunity is thought to be a grand one to illustrate what the territory has already done and is capable of doing.

The expense of such an exhibit, lasting as it does for six months, will, of course, be quite large, and after some consultation it has been thought proper that the territory raise at least fifty thousand dollars to defray the cost. It is proposed to raise this sum by an assessment upon the various counties in the territory, as it is thought each board of county commissioners will be willing to make an appropriation to aid in the work.

This method of raising funds becomes necessary because of the fact that the next session of the Territorial Legislature will not convene in time to make an appropriation. It is thought best that the money be raised as above stated, then each county to request its members of the Assembly to vote for a bill making an appropriation to reimburse the counties for such appropriations. By this method no difficulty would be encountered in arranging so that the burden would be equally shared by all taxpayers.

It will be necessary to collect at once samples of grain and other farm products, care for them and have them ready for shipment when desired. Every sample of grain should be, so far as is possible, carefully labeled so that each section may have due credit. Twenty to thirty cars of selected samples of wheat, oats, rye, barley and other products, in bundles, will be required, but further instructions can be given when it is definitely known whether the funds will be forthcoming to carry on the work.

In this exposition nearly every country in the world will make an exhibit, and as we have in this territory more undeveloped wealth, mineral and vegetable, than any other country of equal extent in the world, and as we have but 400,000 people within the borders of this vast domain—a region abundantly capable of sustaining 5,000,000 souls—it behoves us to make not only a creditable showing, but to excel all others.

It is desirable to make an exhibit of samples of wheat, oats, rye, barley, corn, sorghum, and other cereals; timothy, buffalo and bunch, Hungarian and other grasses; all kinds of fruits, both wild and cultivated; vegetables and other agricultural products; cheese, butter, cattle, hogs, sheep, fowls, game, medicinal waters, woods, soils, gold, silver, coal, petroleum, tin, lead, plumbago, copper, iron, mica, fire clay, gypsum, asbestos, building stone (which has no equal), brick, terra cotta, marbles, and all manufacturers, and, in fact, everything and anything that is connected with Dakota that will interest and instruct visitors.

Will not your county board appoint two men to act as special commissioners in your county, and to be paid by the county, who can aid the commissioner of the world's exposition in his work, and attend to the collection of money and samples? This is a matter of public interest and demands prompt attention.

All moneys collected by this assessment will be used to defray freight charges, telegraphing and printing, stationery, and other expenses at New Orleans, and not used for the transportation of a large number of would-be visitors to the exposition. Hoping to have a favorable and prompt response, I am, respectfully,

ALEXANDER MCKENZIE,
United States Commissioner for Dakota Territory.

"North, South and Central American Exposition," was the name finally adopted by the New Orleans Exposition, which informally opened November 10, 1884. The exhibits from South American states and those of Central America, as well as Canada and the United States, had accumulated to such an extent and to such a variety that it was decided that the great fair was entitled to be designated by a continental name.

The exposition was officially opened Tuesday the 16th of December, 1884, by Chester A. Arthur, President of the United States, and the ceremony in which he acted the principal part took place in the east room of the White House at Washington, where were assembled with the President and his cabinet, with their wives, all the foreign ministers, a number of famous military and literary men, the Supreme Court judges and their wives, congressional committees, and others. These opening ceremonies were conducted through the medium of the electric telegraph between Washington and New Orleans. The formal proceedings were introduced by Commissioner Richardson, at New Orleans, who addressed the President, as follows:

To the President: The present occasion is the consummation of an enterprise inaugurated in conformity with the act of Congress passed less than two years ago, and authorizing the holding of the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition, under the joint auspices of the United States National Cotton Plant Association and the city of its location. New Orleans was then selected as the site of the World's Exposition, and in June, 1883, thirteen commissioners, comprising the board of management, was appointed by the President of the United States and at once entered upon the discharge of their duties. At an early date, however, it became manifest that the liberality of the city and state would be inadequate to meet the requirements of the ever increasing magnitude of the undertaking. Accordingly application to the United States was made through Congress, resulting in obtaining generous assistance. Mr. Richardson concluded his address with an expression that the exposition would produce closer and more friendly intercourse with the countries and a firmer establishment of peace in our own country.

The President responded with the following concise address, which more fully explains the purpose of the exposition:

In the name of the people of the republic I congratulate the citizens of the Southwest on their advancing prosperity as manifested in the great international exposition now about to open. The interest of the nation in that section of our commonwealth has found expression in many ways, and notably in the appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi, and by the national loan to promote the present exposition. Situated as it is at the gateway of the trade between the United States and Central and South America, it will attract the attention of the people of the neighboring nations of the American system, and they will learn the importance of availing themselves of our products, as we will of theirs, and thus not only good feelings and profitable intercourse between the United States and the states of Central and South America will be promoted. The people also of our own country, thus brought closer together, will find in this exposition of competitive industries, motives for strengthening the bonds of brotherhood. The railroads, telegraph lines, and submarine cables have drawn much nearer the nations of the earth, and an assembly like this of representatives of the different nations is promotive of good will and peace, while it advances the material welfare of all. The United States extends to those from foreign countries who visit us on this occasion a cordial welcome.

And now, at the executive mansion in Washington, in the presence of the representatives of the friendly nations of the world; of the president of the Senate, of the speaker of the House of Representatives, of the chief justices and associate justices of the Supreme Court, of the committee from each house of Congress, and of the members of my cabinet, I again, and in their name, congratulate the promoters of the exposition upon the auspicious inauguration of an enterprise which promises such far-reaching favorable results. With my best wishes for the fulfillment of all its great purposes, I now declare the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition open.

Senator Logan followed with a brief address from the joint committee of Congress, at the conclusion of which the President touched the button of the instrument and started the machinery in New Orleans.

At New Orleans the formal exercises opened with a prayer to God, first pleading for the divine blessing upon the officers, directors and managers of the exposition; continuing the clergyman prayed that

"This day may mark the beginning of a new dispensation of prosperity and brotherhood. May there come from the influence of this exposition—from these fields of industry—results which shall give the people more complete apparel and better food; more comfortable shelter and more thorough educational advantages. May it result in spreading the golden sails of our paralyzed shipping, in starting the plow and opening the doors of our storehouses, and may there come to this whole land increased prosperity from this gathering together from day to day and month to month of people of all states and countries. We pray that past feeling of sectional discord may disappear and the South, North, East and West become four part of great national harmony. May it be the unification of North and South America," closing the prayer by invoking the divine blessing upon the manufacturing, industrial, educational and reformatory institutions of the world.

Dakota took an active part in this exposition—in fact the only occasion it had ever exerted itself in behalf of a national celebration of this character. The centennial at Philadelphia in 1876 found Dakota busied with efforts to open the Black Hills, and generally unprepared to do much in the line of an exhibition of its products and resources, and rather than disclose her meager store, she contented herself with a display of literature, a modest contribution to the capital stock, and a pyramid of corn and wheat.

The New Orleans celebration found the territory in much better condition to represent products and resources that would interest and instruct the intelligent people of our own and foreign countries. Dakota's traditions and history were linked with New Orleans. The territory was a part of that great domain of Louisiana, which was purchased by the United States in order to get control and ownership of New Orleans, the entry port from the Mexican gulf to the Father of Waters, and its main tributary, the Missouri. It was not a difficult matter to interest Dakotas in the New Orleans celebration. The earliest pioneers—the fur traders of the Dakota portion of the Missouri country—were from New Orleans and St. Louis, the latter having been planted or founded, partially to give New Orleans a nearer base of operations to the rich Missouri Valley. All the earliest traders of enterprise and prominence were those true southerners. Our Red River pioneers were English and Canadian—our Missouri pioneers represented France and Spain. Had the railroads left Dakota to work out its destiny without their aid, New Orleans would have been Dakota's shipping port to the world's markets of her surplus grain and beef, as it was in the early days the shipping port of the agriculturists of the Mississippi Valley.

Col. Melvin Grigsby, of Minnehaha County, was appointed commissioner from Southern Dakota, and through the energetic efforts of the two commissioners, the counties of the territory were prevailed upon to raise about forty thousand dollars, which was the sum estimated to be necessary to defray the expenses.

As will be learned from a brief description of the Dakota exhibit given herewith, the Dakota representatives displayed commendable enterprise and excellent discretion in assembling the products of the territory, and won the admiration and plaudits of the foreign as well as home visitors for the artistic, attractive and novel method pursued in arranging this material for exhibition. It was said to occupy the most complete, suitable, and unique section of the entire show, and was by far the best the territory had ever made for the people of the world to look at and inspect. A brief description of its scope and general character will be of value and not devoid of interest. The first feature presented was that of a wild country in a state of nature shown by a genuine buffalo and elk skin tepee, with an Indian family abiding in it, the squaw engaged in domestic duties, while the husband had an Indian pony harnessed to a travois, the vehicle peculiar to the savage when on the march; an Indian youth was in the group with a genuine Indian dog, a cross between a wolf and an American hound, also harnessed to a boy's travois. Buffalo hides and trophies of the chase, minus the scalps of a foe, however, were displayed around the tepee, conveying a fair idea of a scene of primitive life as it was before civilization disturbed the customs of the savage race who inhabited its borders. Nearby adjoining the tepee was a large log shack, typifying the first step of progress of civilization. The shack sheltered a white hunter and contained the trophies of a successful hunt, in a number of well mounted wild animals, prepared by a skillful taxidermist. Here were also displayed many specimens of the work of the savages, men and women, after they had imbibed something from white instructors. Fronting the shack and the tepee was pronounced to be the most genuine of the novelties displayed in the entire exposition. It was a small circular park about forty feet in diameter, sodded with a new grass and ornamented with living trees. In the center of the park stood a true white buffalo, a most rare animal, the property of the Hon. James J. Hill, president of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railway. The park was a museum of wonderful curiosities, all gathered in Dakota, bleached buffalo heads, petrifications, prairie dogs, elk, deer, antelope, beaver, skunks, bear, wolves, foxes, coyotes, rabbits, prairie chickens, and birds of all kinds known to the Northwest, occupying this novel and attractive Dakota park, for so it was designated and known and commented upon by thousands of visitors. More fine specimens illustrative of natural history were seen here than elsewhere in the entire exposition. These specimens had been procured during the fall in Dakota by hunters employed by McKenzie for the purpose. In front of the park was a grand display of geological specimens so varied and attractive as to excite surprise and wonder even to many Dakotans who prided themselves on their store of knowledge regarding the resources and the geological treasures of the territory. A suggestion of the early exploration of Dakota was illustrated by a large and attractive boat, thatched with wheat, illustrative of the Lewis and Clark expedition under President Jefferson's administration in the early years of the nineteenth century, but the wheat decorations on the boat seemed out of time by several decades, but we are to bear in mind that Dakota's exhibit was wholly designed as an advertisement of the most valuable and attractive portion of the United States, which at that time was a subject of discussion in all sections of our common country. This Lewis and Clark expedition permitted the eloquent delegate from Dakota to tell a most charming story, founded on important historical facts, regarding the great territory that was then in everybody's mind and concerning which everyone knew a little and was anxious to learn more. The fine wheat in stalk gave emphasis and confirmation to the agricultural value of the country through which the intrepid and successful pioneer adventurers made their way amid many perils even to the shores of the Pacific three-quarters of a century earlier. It served as a declaration and proof of the value of the soil in the production of the world's most valuable and possibly indispensable food product, which many of the statesmen of Lewis and Clark's day pronounced as next to worthless, of no particular value to the United States, and in any event could not be utilized for settlement for several centuries. This grain, and the civilization which had produced scores of millions of bushels of it the same year from the soil of the territory, was a wonderful vindication of the wisdom which compelled the United States to purchase the entire Territory of Louisiana for a sum less than the money value of one-third its wheat crop of 1885.

What was termed the centerpiece of the territory's collection was a tall eight-sided tower, twenty feet square at the base, decorated with varieties of grain in appropriate designs, and surmounted by an ear of corn formed of sixteen varieties, fourteen feet high with a fine specimen of the American eagle perched on its pinnacle. This whole design because of its amplitude and excellence was one of the most conspicuous attractions to engage the attention of the thousands who thronged the hall. Tastefully designed placards affixed to the tower, informed the spectator that "Dakota has a $5,000,000 school fund" (meaning the value of her school land endowment), also that "Dakota has 75,000,000 acres of free Government land." "Free homes for the homeless" was another, but the appearance of those who read it did not indicate that they were in the homeless class; still, many halted long enough to ask an explanation of the generous promise. Fronting the tower were two pyramids, one of No. 1 hard wheat, the other of flour, and between these was a smaller pyramid enclosed by a settee where the weary sightseer might find a resting place amid scenes of charming plenty. A large corn crib completely filled was near by and near the crib a display of vegetables which challenged the world to excel. A separate division was fitted up for the display of hay and grasses, and the visitor read the legend that "Hay and grass make beef," which contradicted the popular impression in most urban communities that the packing houses furnished it ready-made, and to confirm the claim of hay and grass, a fine steer, whose weight might have been a ton, butcher's weight, stood in a small grass field under the shadow of the banner. The Indian Palace of Art was a very interesting exhibit. It was enclosed with logs covered with the hides and robes of such wild animals as could be obtained on the rapidly receding frontier of the territory. The floor of this bazaar was carpeted with the pelts of fur-bearing animals; and innumerable works of art, more or less admirable and skillful, the production of Indian labor, were tastefully displayed and were under the supervision of celebrated warriors of the Sioux tribe and their wives, including two or three from Sitting Bull's band, which tribe had sent some of the most cleverly executed specimens of painting, and work in porcupine quills and beads — work that had involved much time and commendable skill.

The display of minerals from the Black Hills was very creditable. It covered a greater variety of minerals than any other exhibit on the grounds, though the quantity was less. Dakota "tin quartz" attracted more attention and discussion than even the gold. Dakota was the only section of the country that displayed this metal, and miners as well as capitalists and scientific savants talked about it. The Black Hills also presented fine samples of petroleum and refined salt.

Dakota ingenuity has devised among other things a model of a grain elevator, showing through its glass sides the engine and all the machinery for elevating and cleaning wheat in actual operation. Models of grain fields, showing wheat, oats and barley as they appear when ready to harvest. A corn crib with thatched roof and cornice of the yellow grain. A lofty pyramid of hay, surmounted by a mammoth stuffed ox. A highly ornamented pagoda in the center of which were attractively displayed heaps of small sacks, each filled with No. 1 hard grain to be given away as souvenirs. A number of glass-like cylinders from five to eight feet high, and pyramids of bottles also containing grain, and a lofty pyramid of sacks also containing food grains. There were specimens of Dakota timber, one, the trunk of an oak four feet in diameter. Gold, silver, lead and tin from the Black Hills. Coal in abundance, building stone, rough and dressed, pumice stone, Black Hills marble. In fine arts there was an interesting display of women's work in the gallery which comprised paintings, carvings, needlework, hammered brass, and pictures of the loveliest spots in the great territory. The Indian chief Gaul, Sitting Bull's executive officer, with Mrs. Gaul and one of their children was in attendance at the Buffalo Park. They were among the rare attractions, and were decorated, but they speak no English, hence are not communicative, but they smile a great deal, and are having "the time of their lives." One of the Bad Land petrifications on exhibition weighed a thousand pounds, and there was also a quantity of round stones, four or five inches in diameter, remarkably smooth which were collected from the celebrated Cannon Ball River showing the origin of the name of that remarkable stream which divided the Indian reservation from the Government land for so many years. The eagles of Dakota have earned the right to scream most joyfully because of the natural wealth and remarkable progress the territory had made in all the elements of the highest and best civilization.

Sioux Falls made a magnificent display of jasper granite, which excelled any similar display from other quarries, and when the inexhaustible quantity of it was spoken of, there were many who appeared incredulous and insisted on a journey to Dakota in order to clear up their doubts that one small fragment of our great country could produce such a variety of the most valuable of all agricultural and mineral products. Bartlett Tripp, of Yankton, and Buffalo Bill, the famous Dakota scout, with General Miles, were enthusiastic visitors, and claimed that Dakota had the most valuable exhibit of any portion of the country and were proud to be numbered among Dakotans.

When the formality of opening Dakota's part of the great show came to be expressed, Col. Pat Donan celebrated as an orator and writer, made the address, acquitting himself with much credit.

Assistant Superintendent Grigsby, speaking of the exposition during a visit home in December, said:

The buildings and grounds are grand, and will all be in perfect shape before many of the exhibits will be ready for inspection. Exhibitors who were also in charge of exhibits at the Philadelphia centennial, contend that this fair will, in many respects, surpass the centennial. The states and territories are all there, and with much larger and more elaborately arranged displays than they had at Philadelphia. Mexico and the South American states are largely and finely represented, and also most of the governments of the eastern continent. This is the first time that Dakota has entered the exposition arena. The indications are that she will surpass the other territories and be fully up to many of the states in quality, quantity and variety of her exhibit. Her Indian goods and curiosities, such as implements of war and the chase, dressed skins, human scalps, and decorative work, are attracting much attention, as is also her artificial park, the only exhibit in which is displayed the animals, the birds, the petrifications and other attractions. The agricultural products of Dakota, notably wheat, corn, oats and flax, are very fine. No state will make a finer showing of corn. The mineral exhibit from the Black Hills will attract much attention. The polished Jasper from the Sioux Falls quarries and polishing works is absolutely the rarest, most expensive and most beautiful that the world can produce. All in all, Dakota, though denied admission to the Union, will have an exhibit that will far surpass many of the states. The interest already shown in this exhibit and the absolute ignorance manifested by people from all sections in regard to the extent and resources of Dakota, give proof that her people have done a wise thing in preparing such a full and attractive exhibit.

An observing and reliable pioneer citizen of the territory, Mr. Dan Scott, who visited the exposition in March, 1885, made public the following statement concerning Dakota's exhibit, after some general remarks regarding New Orleans and the attendance of visitors who were coming in at that time at the rate of from thirty thousand to fifty thousand a week:

Iowa, Nebraska and Wisconsin all have very creditable displays, but it is the universal verdict of all who have inspected their exhibits that Dakota is entitled to the blue ribbon for the extraordinary character of her kind of display. It is really grand for its immensity, artistic arrangement, and as showing the capabilities of the territory. It embraces all the natural, productive and indestructible elements of wealth for which Dakota is becoming so rapidly famous. It surely required an intelligent direction and a commendable industry to gather together and arrange the immense collection. Everyone who goes through the Dakota department is unsparing in their praise of the enterprise manifested by "that far-away wild territory," as many express it. They don't seem to realize that Dakota is not far away, on the contrary, that she is in the geographical center, east and west, of our continent. It's these states on the border that are distant.

Dakota's exhibit will prove worth ten times what it cost. It gives the millions who will view it an idea of the broad gauge, enterprising character of its people, and therefore, the taxpayers of the territory will soon realize that they are under obligations to the men who have been instrumental in getting up the magnificent show for them. It is a difficult matter to realize the grandeur of the display in question from a description, because a better comprehension can be conveyed by glittering generalities, which in this case do not need the embellishment that extravagant description might give. Those of Dakota's citizens who are entitled to great credit for procuring and arranging our exhibit so effectively are: Commissioner McKenzie, Deputy Commissioners, M. Grigsby, Sioux Falls; Col. R. E. Fleming, Fargo; Colonel Sterling, Huron; Farmer Wallace, Bismarek; and Judge T. L. Skinner, of Deadwood. The northern portion of the territory is giving more attention to advertising its advantages than the southern, though the commissioners are acting impartially, but many of the northern newspaper publishers send their publications regularly to the Dakota department, while very few of the southern publications are seen. This ought not to be. The corn belt should awake to the benefits which liberal publicity may at this time provide for them. "Let your light so shine," etc.

Alexander McKenzie became the most conspicuous citizen and celebrated character in the Territory of Dakota before it had run completely its territorial course. He became most widely known through his management of the capital removal scheme which transferred the seat of the government from the southern to the northern frontier, for which duty he appears to have been deputed by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company and Bismarekians. He was intimately associated with Governor Ordway in the capital matter, and possibly acted as his bodyguard during the period when the governor felt that evil-disposed persons might feel provoked to lay violent hands on him, for he appeared to have engendered antagonism in many places that had been disappointed in a county seat ambition or a capital location. As McKenzie made it a rule "never to go back on a friend," and as Ordway had rendered him obsequious and timely assistance in his plans, he did not shirk from acting as bodyguard to the physical giant who apprehended that some misguided person might be disposed to assail him.

McKenzie appears to have been regarded as an able intriguer, a faithful and trustworthy man when entrusted with a mission, and his customary manner and genial disposition warded off enmity, and won for him a reputation of being altogether a more moral man than his gubernatorial companion and business associate. McKenzie was never accused or suspected of being connected with the county seat deals which were charged against the governor.

As viewed by one quite well acquainted with his public career, as well as his personal qualities, "McKenzie was the versatile genius of his time and one of the most conspicuous characters in Dakota during the last decade of its territorial career." The same observing writer says that when Alexander Hughes deserted the Yankton colors and became a capital remover, and the confidential adviser of Governor Ordway he seemed to have obliterated by a single stroke the honorable record of a past made memorable by the effort and achievement of the brilliant political leader. In the popular estimation he had bartered away his honor. For the people he had served so gallantly as leader looked to Alexander Hughes to preserve the laurels placed upon his brow at the Grand Forks convention. And today "there is none so low as to do him reverence—no, not even in the home of his adoption."

With Alexander McKenzie, how different the case. He, the bright, companionable fellow, personally, who had never been credited with such a thing as scruples, may be said to have been without any moral responsibility in the matter. Brilliant in another direction, Alexander the Great of Bismarck actually gained in personal reputation by the coup d'etat at Yankton and the celebrated chase he gave the capital commissioners in search of reasons to justify the agreement entered into at the start by the great Modoc chief (McKenzie), principally with himself, and subsequently ratified by the Sioux chief (Ordway), and the medicine man of the Northern Pacific Railroad, that the capital should be located at Bismarck.

Although McKenzie is a democrat "personally," and although Dakota is practically a republican unit, it remains the fact, all the same, that McKenzie is the chief engineer, whenever he wants to be, of the domestic affairs of both parties. It was he who, at the republican convention at Huron, snatched from the jaws of defeat and humiliation a partial victory for Ordway. Aleck wasn't a delegate himself. He never is, or rarely is. He poses, smiling and serene, as a figure on the floor of your convention, and gayly proceeds to figure you out of your boots.

What is the secret of his success? Ah, there are more secrets than one, and it must be admitted that they are for the most part open ones. In the first place, Aleck McKenzie is, "personally," a man you would like. Tall, broad-shouldered, and of full proportions, with light sandy hair and moustache, and the round, ruddy face of the good-humored Scotchman, Alexander the Great, of the North, is everybody's friend on principle.

There is not a political or "public" enemy, to adapt a word to my meaning, against whom Aleck McKenzie finds himself arrayed, who stands without the pale of the adroit chieftain's speaking acquaintances. He can slap them all on the shoulder and sit down to a confidential chat, held "personally" with them. Aleck understands human nature, and always rubs the fur the right way—that is, down, of course. With the same clear insight into the human breast, he is free-handed to a degree. He always carries a roll of bills, among which the V is a small denomination and spends his money so freely and with such evident relish, that one fancies that some of the virtuous innocents from South Dakota, who now and then get taken in, secretly wish, at the bottom of their hearts, that there were only more chiefs like him—the merry, merry Modoc in the land of the Dakotahs.

McKenzie is always ready for a trade, and if he does not get the best of it he generally manages to make the other side feel he is well pleased for the time being. He pays the highest market price for everything and everybody he gets, and knows just exactly how to approach things and people. Aleck McKenzie is the type of a rustler who takes the world as he finds it, and employs the methods in popular use to his own advantage. He is generous to his friends and friendly toward his enemies, and upon the whole about as well liked, "personally," as Ordway is detested.

A CAR EXHIBIT OF FARM PRODUCTS

That the present and coming generations may know of the efforts made by their ancestors to attract attention to Dakota with the view of increasing immigration to its prolific acres and to share in its other superior natural resources, a mention is due to the enterprise of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company in providing a very creditable exhibit of Dakota products and exhibiting it in various parts of the United States during the autumn of 1884, and finally turning it over to enhance the attractiveness and value of the territory's unequalled exhibit at the World's Fair at New Orleans, which was held for half a year beginning in December, 1884.

This agricultural exhibit was made in an ordinary passenger car from which the seats had been removed with shelves ranged around the interior convenient for the display of the products of Dakota soil. The exterior of the car had been decorated with a finely painted and artistically executed picture of a Dakota harvest field, and landscape views on one side, and on the opposite side one could read, whether the car was running or halting the brief announcement:

Samples of Dakota Products, Along the Line of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway.

It has been elsewhere remarked that there had been a noticeable falling off in immigration to Dakota, and the railways had observed this, possibly with some concern, for they had reaped a bountiful harvest for four years from the immigrant business, and it was to their interest to stimulate the removal spirit anew. But the principal factor in inducing the eastern people hither had been the free lands of the best quality, east of the Missouri River. The cream of this alluring magnet had been skimmed off by the hundreds of thousands who had literally poured into the territory since 1879, and these new comers who had been among the most influential of our immigration agents through their letters to the old home people had been less enthusiastic of late, observing that the prizes in farm lands had been largely taken, which was true; though many thousands of good farms yet remained to be homesteaded, they were scattered here and there, and known professionally to the land and locating agents. Dakota had its day as a mecca for the American and foreign peoples who wanted a homestead, and henceforth the incoming was to be continuous but much more moderate in numbers in each year than that which had amazed the whole nation.

But this railway exhibit was a fine enterprise, and creditable in every feature. The interior of the coach was very inviting and inclined to stimulate the appetite of the visitor whether man or woman; it was all so cleanly neat and artistically arranged, and composed of such pleasing materials that it had a wholesome appearance—every article seemed to be inviting the spectator to "look at me." The roof of the car was ornamented with flax, grasses, and grains, skillfully wrought into numerous designs. Underneath this canopy were hung several varieties of corn in the ear—yellow dent, yellow flint, white flint, strawberry. A sample of white flint had grown to a length of $14\frac{1}{2}$ inches, completely filled. Still lower down were the shelves upon which the vegetables were exhibited. Here were sweet potatoes weighing three pounds each from Yankton, Irish potatoes grown in Union County or Elk Point, Union County, cucumbers, egg plant, musk and watermelons and canteloupes, squashes, beets, cabbage, and all kinds of fruits. Preserves from Sioux Falls consisting of native plums, blackberries, raspberries, gooseberries, currants. The vegetables were many of them of the colossal pattern. Beets grown in Brown County weighed from seventeen to twenty pounds each. On the floor were sweet pumpkins that would weigh eighty pounds, and one watermelon that weighed thirty-two pounds, too large to be placed on a shelf. The largest vegetable in the exhibit was a squash, raised by O. V. Knowles at Karam, Lincoln County. Its circumference was eight feet and one inch, and its weight 185 pounds. Samples of wheat, oats, rye, barley, flax of superior quality had an appropriate place in the setting. A separate room in the car was given up to a show of grasses, bunch grass, seven feet high, timothy with heads six inches in length, blue joint grass $7\frac{1}{2}$ feet tall, and red top five feet high. A sample of peanuts of the finest quality was shown, grown on the bottom lands known as the Vermillion bottom, and Sioux Falls granite, polished as elegantly as marble, and in the rough also.

As a companion piece to the display of natural products, there was a skillfully constructed model of a locomotive engine and tender and a baggage car and sleeper constructed entirely from Dakota grains and grasses and evergreens, and made wholly by a Dakota railroad man, the idea having been to link the great resources of the territory with their indispensable supplement which must be utilized in conveying the treasures of nature to the millions of homes where they are needed. The locomotive was eight feet long, and every part of the modern machine had been reproduced with fidelity and artistic skill, and all made from grasses, grains and evergreen bushes grown along the line of the Milwaukee Railroad in Dakota. The cow-catcher, bell, whistle, drive-wheels, steam chest, piston-rods, headlight, and everything belonging to the structure at rest, had been supplied. The figures "39" were painted on the headlight, indicating that Dakota would be the thirty-ninth state when admitted into the Union, and appearances justified the prediction, but "the nice laid plans of mice and men, gang aft a-glee," and we became the "fortieth" and "forty-first." The engine had been named the "S. S. Merrill," general manager of the company's properties, and a very enterprising citizen. The artist whose genius contrived and executed the work was William Sibben, of Aberdeen, a railroad man.

The entire exhibit was in charge of W. W. E. Powell, general immigration agent for the road, assisted by C. C. Henderson, and by D. H. Moses, the railroad company's Dakota immigrant agent. It was taken for exhibition to Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, and through New York, Pennsylvania and the New England states, and into Eastern Canada, and was visited and inspected by tens of thousands of people. Two months were passed in this itinerant show business, and multitudes of people learned more about Dakota than they could have done in any other way unless they were willing to go to the expense of a journey of some length. Finally the car was run down to New Orleans and its trophies transferred to the already complete and winning exhibit made by the Territory of Dakota.

RELIGIOUS AND EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS

The religious and non-sectarian educational institutions in Dakota at the close of the year 1884, of a territorial character and owned by the territory or by religious bodies, and open for the reception of students were the University of the Territory of Dakota at Vermillion, and the University of North Dakota at Grand Forks; the Agricultural College at Brookings; and the normal schools at Madison and Spearfish. Also the Congregational College at Yankton, the Baptist College at Sioux Falls, the Presbyterian College at Pierre. Prospectively at that time there was the Methodist University at Mitchell; and also one at Ordway. A Norwegian Lutheran College at Canton; the Baptist College at Tower City; a Presbyterian College at Jamestown; the Agricultural College at Fargo located by the last Legislature, and a college to be erected at Flandreau, endowed by the grandparent of Professor Perry, head of the Flandreau schools. A normal school had been opened at Madison, Lake County, and the Spearfish Normal in Lawrence County had entered upon its first term.

The cornerstone of Mitchell's new Methodist university, the Wesleyan, was laid on Wednesday, September 3, 1884. Bishop Andrews in charge of the Dakota Mission made the principal address, and other speakers were Mrs. J. Ellen Foster, Doctor Brush, Doctor Pardee and Rev. Wilmot Whitfield.

The Territorial University at Grand Forks provided for by the Legislature of 1883 was so nearly completed that it began its work as an educational institution of the first class in September, 1884, with Doctor Blackburn as president, Professor Montgomery as vice president. The enrollment of students at the opening of the school was in the neighborhood of fifty. Four of the professorships were occupied.

THE PRESBYTERIANS

The Presbyterian University of Southern Dakota which had been established at Pierre was rechristened in October, 1884, and thereafter was called Pierre College. The presbytery of the territory had quadrupled in number to four presbyteries in eighteen months, and a synod was organized and officered at Pierre in October, the university taken over, its title changed and the following controlling bodies elected: Trustees, W. S. Peterson, Huron; H. O. Fishback, Pierre; H. P. Carson, Scotland; and John P. Williamson, Greenwood, for the term of three years. J. D. McLain, Groton; C. A. Bliss, Aberdeen; R. B. Farrar, Volga; and J. B. Pomery, Huron, for two years. Robert E. Ewart, Mitchell; G. F. McAfee, Pierre; and Judge Wm. E. Church, Deadwood, for one year. The synod selected Pierre as its meeting place the next year and the dedication of McCormick Hall and the inauguration of Rev. T. M. Findley as president of the college were appointed for that synodical assembly.

In Southern Dakota there were seventy-eight Presbyterian churches at the close of the year 1884, forty-one of them having houses of worship, all paid for, the whole property being valued at $71,800. Besides these was the Pierre University, owned and controlled by the Synod of Dakota, valued at $40,000, all paid for, making a total of $111,000. There were fifty-seven ministers in the synod. The largest contributions to foreign missions in 1884 came from the Indian presbytery of Dakota amounting to $715, an average of $1 per member. In Northern Dakota there were forty-five Presbyterian churches and thirty-five ministers. In the entire territory there were 133 Presbyterian churches and ninety-two ministers. Value of church property $225,000.

CATHOLICISM IN DAKOTA

The condition of the Catholic churches and societies in the Territory of Dakota in 1884 was very fully and entertainingly set forth in a statement made by Rev. Geo. L. Willard, V. G., of the Dakota Diocese in May of that year. It exhibits the results of the zealous and efficient labors of the various representative bodies of that denomination of Christians within the territory, among both the Indian and white population:

Dakota, as the objective point of a large immigration from the states farther east, excites the attention of the public, and among other things, the Catholic people wish to know the status of the church in the western territory. It is the object of this short sketch to give a truthful statement of the matter.

The bishop of Dakota, Rt. Rev. Martin Marty, D. D., is the right man in the right place. Pious, even saintly in his own life, his greatest desire is to advance the interests of the church throughout his vast vicariate. Learned, accomplished and polished in his exterior address, he fascinates all with whom he comes in contact. Humble as a child, he seems to forget self, and is equally at home in the city, in the sod shanty of the poor immigrant, or when wrapped in his blanket he lies in the tent of the wild Indian. His whole life is devoted to his work. He is assisted by some very excellent and efficient priests. Several of them speak the language of the Dakotahs. The work of the church among the Indians is in a successful condition. One of the most zealous priests in the whole territory, also most devoted to the conversion of the Indians, is the saintly Father Malo, who resides at Turtle Mountain. In the extreme northern part of the territory, Devil's Lake Agency, as also Standing Rock Agency, are in the care of good Benedictine fathers, whose well known zeal is a sure guarantee of success. Father Bushman is at Pine Ridge Agency near to the Black Hills, and Father Craft at Rosebud Agency. These two agencies are near to each other. There were 15,000 Indians in them. Father Bushman baptized Red Cloud, chief of all the Dakotahs, last month. The work of instruction and conversion is going on very rapidly at these two agencies, where, within the past few months, over five hundred have been baptized. They are thoroughly instructed in the Catholic religion before being baptized.

A school for Indian boys has recently been started in Yankton by Bishop Marty. A beginning was made with thirty-nine boys. Probably, on the 1st of July, the number will be increased to fifty at least.

Cities have sprung up in quick succession over a large portion of Dakota, and as fast as possible churches have been built. The bishop lives at Yankton. It is a mistake in Sadler's Catholic Directory to place him at Jamestown. There are several churches in Yankton County. Quite a number of Catholics have settled in this county during the past year, as they found land good, near to a church and market, at from eight to twelve dollars per acre, which they considered far better than to go a long distance west and take their chances in the growth and settlement of the country, whether they should be near a church.

Clay and Union counties, also in the extreme southern part of the territory, are well supplied with priests and churches. Bon Homme County, adjoining Yankton on the west, has several churches. There is a large settlement of Bohemians on the borders of this and Yankton counties with a resident priest. There are also resident priests at Mitchell and Bridgewater on the line of the Milwaukee Railroad. These attend the other villages on that line, in most of which churches are already erected.

At Sioux Falls is a beautiful brick church, where a very energetic priest lives. At Montrose is another church and priest. These two attend the other missions in their part of the country. North of this is the Southern Minnesota branch of the Milwaukee road. Father Flynn lives at Madison, and Father Abern at Miner, and attend all other places on this road. Twenty-five miles north runs the Northwestern Railroad from east to west. Priests are stationed at Huron, Elkton, DeSmet and Pierre. Again north we meet another branch of the Northwestern from Watertown to Redfield and on to Gettysburg, with more priests in its principal towns. Then comes the Hastings & Dakota from Big Stone to Aberdeen and beyond, which is fairly well supplied, though most of it is only quite recently settled and is now rapidly filling up. We then reach the Northern Pacific and find a priest at Fargo, Jamestown, Bismarck and Mandan, besides a number who are not on the railroad mentioned. Farther north we have the best church in the territory at Grand Forks, while the Red River country is well supplied with churches and priests. In the Black Hills we have three priests, at Deadwood, Rapid City and Lead.

Although we have not a sufficient number of priests, and large congregations which should have resident priests are only attended, nevertheless the spiritual wants of the Dakota people are pretty well attended to. While land is very cheap we are securing good locations for church buildings all over the territory. Congregations are forming, churches are building, and everything is assuming an orderly condition in all parts. We have religious brothers assisting in teaching the Indians. The Grey Nuns of Montreal are in the territory at Devil's Lake. The Presentation Nuns are at Fargo. The Ursuline Nuns are at Grand Forks. The Benedictine Sisters are at Standing Rock, Bismarek and Yankton. The Holy Cross Sisters are in the Black Hills, and the Sisters of Sainte Agnes are at Yankton. In all these places are good schools. Wherever a few Catholic families are settled they can have mass and the services of a priest. They have only to notify the bishop or their nearest priest and their wants will be attended to. They cannot settle outside of the range of priests. It will not be long before Dakota will be a good home for Catholics. A great many people come into Dakota poor, but the soil is rich and the opportunities of making a good living are many.

EVANGELISTS AT BIG STONE

The Dakota Conference of the Evangelical Association was organized at Big Stone City, Grant County, May 9, 1884, under the auspices of Bishop R. Dubs, D. D., of Cleveland, Ohio.

The conference was divided into two presiding elder districts known as the Yankton and Fargo districts, the first being under the direction of Rev. A. Knebel, P. E., and the latter under Rev. A. Huelster as the leader. A hearty welcome was extended to the conference by a committee of citizens of Big Stone, to which the conference before adjournment replied by adopting the resolution hereto appended:

Whereas, A very hearty welcome has been extended to us as a conference by the citizens of Big Stone City, therefore be it

Resolved, That the welcome of the inhabitants of Big Stone City is highly appreciated by this conference; that we listened to the speeches with great delight; that we accept their kind offer of a pleasure ride upon the clear waters of Big Stone Lake, surrounded by its romantic and beautiful sceneries; and that we invoke the choicest blessings of God upon the people of Big Stone for the hearty welcome and kind hospitality we have received at their hands. God bless you, ye citizens of Big Stone City.

The clergymen appointed to have charge at the different stations in the territory were the following:

Yankton District—A. Kneble, presiding elder. At Yankton, F. G. Sahr. Scotland, G. W. Hielscher. Big Stone City and Milbank, O. Knederling and one to be supplied. Aberdeen, J. Fandrey. Frankfort, S. Hoy. Elkton, H. Loewen. Yorktown, F. F. Meyer. Sioux Falls, Ph. Laux. Centerville, F. C. Jenney. Madison, A. Berreth. Hand, W. Bates.

Fargo District—A. Huelster, presiding elder. Casselton, W. Fritz. Fargo, L. S. Koch. Wahpeton, C. Oerth and H. Oerth. Tower City, W. Suchow. Jamestown, W. Tesch. Grand Forks, W. Blanchard. Crookston, R. Teichmann.

These itinerants as they were called were recommended as strong and healthy men having the will, meeting the demands of a Dakota climate, and filled with a love of God, yearning for the salvation of their fellowmen. Casselton, Cass County, was selected as the place for holding the conference in 1885.

THE OUTPUT OF THE FARMS

There was prosperity for the Dakota farmer in the harvest of 1884. Prices were what were termed low, but the yields in field and herd were fully up to the standard. In some instances the quality of staple products was below the average. A great deal of the farming was done by "tenderfeet," and their lack of agricultural knowledge was reflected in the product. As has been stated elsewhere, there had not been anything like the immigration during the year that Dakotans had been accustomed to for several years, but the acreage of planted ground in the territory showed a large increase over previous years. As Dakota had become something of a wonderland in all America and was furnishing the country with its most interesting intelligence concerning the activities of the human race almost, and as it was likewise the garden spot of the Agricultural Department of the United States, whose reports had been growing in interest to the people of the country in proportion to the care and completeness of the Dakota department, much of value was given out to the public through that official channel. The month of August is regarded as the most reliable period for gauging the quality, extent and amount of the several staple products, and the report for that month in 1884 was exceptionally favorable, having but one shadowy feature and that was caused by the low market prices. But it had been observed that the general prosperity was in a much healthier condition with an abundance of the necessities of life at reasonable prices than a scarcity of these commodities and high prices. The shadow on the harvest caused by very reasonable prices had a silver lining. In Dakota the month of August brought some heavy rains which interfered somewhat with harvesting work in the southern portion, but still there was little damage inflicted. In the northern counties harvesting was not completed. In Walsh County harvesting did not begin until the last week of the month but the crop turned out one of the best the Red River Valley had produced for four years. Some alarm was created by a report that there was considerable smut in the wheat. Until 1883 no complaint was made of injury to wheat from smut in Dakota, but in 1884 it became a subject of frequent comment. It was observed more particularly in the soft varieties. As all wheat in which smut was discovered was graded as No. 3, the loss to the farmers in a section where the injury was widely prevalent would amount in the aggregate to an immense sum, hence the utmost precautions were taken to prevent it, but poor seed, first, and an excess of moisture at an unseasonable time, combined, had been inimical to an otherwise bountiful crop of wheat in 1884.

It was insisted upon by the department that as much care should be taken in selecting seed wheat as in selecting animals for breeding purposes. Some of the new colonies which had immigrated to the territory direct from Europe and Asia by repeatedly planting a poor quality of seed wheat had deteriorated the product of their fields until it was unmarketable. Stutsman County had unusually fine crops, and the small grain crops of the northern counties averaged higher than those of the southern portion. In 1883 this partiality favored the south. Threshing in 1884 was under full headway in the southern counties during the first week of September, and was just beginning north. The yield generally in the south did not meet the expectation of the farmers but the quality was superior to that of 1883. The prevailing low prices had determined the farmers not to market their wheat, unless they were obliged to in order to meet pressing obligations.

The yield of corn was one of the most satisfactory ever produced in the territory, and a large acreage had been devoted to it in the south. Potatoes had been neglected owing to the low prices prevailing for the old crop. It was observed that the first seed planted in new soil gave remarkably large yields of fine tubers. It was not a "potato year" however, due to dry spells when moisture was most needed.

Regarding hay there was an abundant crop of blue joint and other native prairie grasses. It was remarked that in the valleys of the Missouri, Big Sioux, Vermillion, James or Dakota rivers hay can be put in the stack at a cost of 75 cents per ton. The flax crop had become an important one and two million bushels was the estimate for the territory, largely in the central counties. The price paid at the elevators varied from one dollar to one dollar and ten cents, and was satisfactory to the producer.

There had been an increase of 20 per cent in the number of hogs, and these animals were selling at a profitable figure, notwithstanding the low price of grain used in preparing them for market.

Cattle were in a healthy condition. There were no reports of pneumonia. The average condition of crops at the close of harvest was the highest of any year since the territory was settled, and was given as follows, 100 being the highest that could be attained: Corn, 93 per cent; wheat when harvested, 96; rye, 94; oats, 97; barley, 96; buckwheat, 94; potatoes, Irish, 94; flax, 93.

ADDITIONAL JUDGES

Congress made a further addition to the associate justices of the Supreme Court of Dakota by an act approved July 4, 1884, declaring that thereafter the Supreme Court should consist of a chief justice and five associate justices, any five of whom should constitute a quorum. The territory was divided into six judicial districts, and until changed by the Legislative Assembly of the territory, the Fifth District shall consist of the following counties, namely:

Brookings, Kingsbury, Beadle, Deuel, Hamlin, Grant, Codington, Clark, Day, Spink, Brown, Hand, Hyde, Hughes, Sully, Edmunds, Faulk, McPherson, Potter, Campbell, Roberts and Walworth, and the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indian reservation; and the Second District and the Fourth District shall consist of the remainder of the territory, which now constitutes said Second District and the Fourth District, respectively, as defined by the statutes of said territory.

That until changed by the Legislature of said territory, the Sixth District shall consist of the following counties, namely:

Bowman, Villard, Billings, Dunn, McKenzie, Allred, Buford, Flannery, Wallace, Mountrail, Williams, Stark, Hettinger, Morton, Mercer, McLean, Stevens, Renville, Wynn, Bottineau, McHenry, Sheridan, Burleigh, Emmons, McIntosh, Logan, Kidder, Wells, DeSmet, Rolette, Towner, Benson, Foster, Stutsman, La Moure, Dekey, Griggs, Steele and Barnes.

The additional justices to be appointed were assigned to the Fifth and Sixth districts, but the District Court for the Fifth District had no jurisdiction to try and determine any cause in which the United States was a party. This was not the case with the Sixth District which was clothed with jurisdiction to hear and determine all matters and causes that the court of any district in the territory possesses. And it was provided that two terms of said court were to be held annually in the City of Bismarck, and a grand and petit jury summoned therein in the manner provided by law in the United States courts in said territory.

COUNTY ORGANIZATION

There was much public complaint during Governor Ordway's term of delay in county organization. The governor was privileged by the territorial law to appoint the county commissioners for a new county, and it was made his duty to do this upon receiving a petition from fifty legal voters of the county requesting organization. There was never more occasion for prompt action in these matters than during Ordway's term, when unorganized counties were receiving in many cases as many as fifty new settlers within a week during the immigration season, and a county organization was not only of great value to them in various ways but absolutely necessary for the peace and safety of the inhabitants and the transaction of important business affairs. Governor Ordway had a custom of holding up these petitions on various pretexts.

One method employed by the governor in organizing the new counties was regarded with much disfavor and possibly with suspicion, and was not sanctioned by the letter of the law. In 1883 just prior to going to Washington he sent to the secretary's office for record the customary notices that he had appointed the commissioners for a number of new counties, and so far as the record told the story the counties were organized. In all, or nearly all the cases, as it transpired, he had not sent the commissions appointing the county commissioners to the persons selected but to his son at Bismarck or Pierre, whom it was presumed knew why they were sent through his hands. There were two other parties connected with the governor's son in these matters, one a Mr. Tebbetts, and it appears that the commissions were taken by one of the trio to the county or counties, but not delivered to the parties named until certain assurances were given regarding the location of the temporary county seat, a prerogative belonging to a new board of county commissioners in newly organized counties. When the assurances were satisfactory, or made so, the commissions were handed out. Some very scandalous stories were printed in the county newspapers at the time regarding these transactions.

In having these appointments recorded the governor could forestall any action on the same cases by the acting governor during his absence. On this occasion his visit to Washington was presumed to be urgent, and it was said that it had to do with securing the appointment of the right kind of a man to succeed Judge Kidder, deceased. The right kind of a man in this case was one who would stand with Ordway when the Supreme Court came to pass upon the capital commission case. C. S. Palmer, of Vermont, who then held the office of assistant United States attorney in Dakota, was appointed, and it was claimed that the appointment was satisfactory to the governor.

Quite a scandalous report was current in 1881 and later, that had had for its subject the organization of Douglas County. Douglas County embraced a territory lying adjacent to the Yankton Indian Reservation and for that reason had been for many years avoided by the immigrant, who, as a rule, was prejudiced against the native American or the aboriginal American rather, as a neighbor, so that while north, south and east of Douglas, thousands of new settlers had located and opened farms, the lands of this county remained largely tenantless, and it was not until 1881 that certain bold and possibly reckless spirits ventured upon its fertile soil, and began the work of settlement and county organization in a manner that awakened much interest mingled with surprise and indignation, when the character and volume of their enterprising proceedings became publicly known. While these proceedings involved the integrity of the governor to some extent, and became mingled with the conflict which existed between the governor and the delegate to Congress, wherein it was charged that his excellency had endeavored to use the earliest organization to strengthen his political fences, it was the reckless extravagance of the earlier Ordway organization that interested the public. The whole affair was subsequently ventilated in the courts, and two years elapsed before it was finally composed. A concise history of the case is presented in the following preamble and resolution adopted by the board of county commissioners of the second organization which the governor made in 1882, based upon the opinion of United States Attorney Campbell, who had been from the organization of the territory recognized as the proper official to advise the governor when called upon.

Immigration came in such increased and increasing numbers as to rapidly advance the borders of settlement. The Legislatures had never failed in their important duty of defining the boundaries, and bestowing their family names on an ample number of new counties strung along the frontier of settlement to supply the new arrivals with the necessary information regarding the breadth and length and appropriate nomenclature of their fraction of the great territory, which was as far as the lawmakers could go with the uninhabited land. The simple duty of starting the work of organization for the county was left to the governor who was authorized and required by the law to appoint county commissioners for new counties upon the petition of fifty actual settlers who were legal voters. On various pretexts, and for reasons best known to the governor and those persons directly interested, these petitions did not receive the prompt attention which their importance demanded, which gave rise to many complaints and much ill feeling on the part of the new comers, to whom the delay was a serious handicap. An organization was absolutely essential to provide for laying out and opening roads for the establishment of justices' courts, for the organization of school districts, for the construction of bridges, the recording of legal papers. The hindrances experienced became a matter of public notoriety in which the governor suffered much serious criticism, charging him with delaying the organizations for ulterior and unlawful purposes, also that he might assist in the location of county seats in which it was alleged he had an indirect interest of considerable money value.

There were six counties organized in 1880; seven in 1881; three in 1882; and twenty-six in 1883.

The provision of law under which the governor was authorized to act in the organization of counties in force at the time, which time included the entire period of Ordway's administration and many years prior, reads as follows:

Whenever the voters of any unorganized county in this territory shall be equal to fifty or upwards, and they shall desire to have said county organized, they may petition the governor, setting forth that they have the requisite number of voters to form a county organization and request him to appoint the officers specified in the next section of this act.

Sec. 2. Whenever the voters of any unorganized county in the territory shall petition the governor, as provided in the preceding section, and the said governor shall be satisfied that such county has fifty legal voters, it shall be the duty of the governor, and he is hereby authorized to appoint three persons, residents thereof, county commissioners for such county, who shall hold their office until the first general election thereafter, and until their successors shall be elected and qualified.

The law then authorizes the county commissioners to appoint all the other county officers, and to locate the county seat temporarily, which location may be changed or affirmed by the voters at the next succeeding general election, when all the officers of the county are to be elected.

As will be seen, the governor's authority extended only to the appointment of the three persons to be county commissioners. Very properly this exhausted his authority in that direction. The location of the county seat was a matter entirely foreign to his official duties, but his officious interference therewith caused a great deal of scandal, and must have been a serious detriment to the progress and prosperity and peace of the new communities.

These county seat transactions in connection with the organization of new counties became so notoriously scandalous through publicity given to the affidavits made by parties who had been required to pay money and valuable lands in return for the appointment of county commissioners who would favor their selection for county seat, that the attention of the law department of the Government at Washington was directed to it in such a manner that it must have instructed the United States attorney of Dakota to have the matters investigated by a United States grand jury, and in the spring of 1884 rumor was busy with the report that the grand jury convened for the Second Judicial District, which included nearly all of Southern Dakota east of the Missouri River, and which met at Yankton, was considering testimony in these county seat cases. Governor Ordway, himself, in some of his newspaper interviews had admitted that his acts were to be inquired into, and the following telegraphic correspondence which was published in the newspapers in April confirmed the reports. The first note is a copy of a telegram from Ordway to Attorney General Campbell as follows:

Bismarck, Dakota, April 17, 1884.

To Hugh J. Campbell, U. S. Attorney, Yankton, Dakota Territory.

I am advised by Attorney General Brewster that you have been directed to give a full and impartial hearing upon matters before the grand jury affecting my executive action. I, therefore, for the fourth time, request that you delay final action upon matters pertaining to my executive acts and allow me to be heard with the executive record before the grand jury now in session at Yankton. I also request that a subpoena be sent for Wm. B. Tebbetts, to Bennington, Vermont, if he has not appeared.

N. G. ORDWAY, Governor.

United States Attorney Campbell returned the following reply by telegraph to the communication of the governor:

Yankton, Dakota Territory, April 18, 1884.

Governor Ordway, Bismarck, Dakota Territory.

Replying to your telegram of April 17th, your request to me to summon you before the grand jury as a witness on your own behalf, as to matters in which your own acts are being inquired into, is now made for the first time, and not the fourth, as you state. Your former requests were to be summoned as a witness, not in your own behalf, but against Mr. Crennan, on the charge of forging a territorial commission. That request I declined, because I could find no law making that act an offense against the United States laws. Your present request to be summoned as a witness before the grand jury as to matters in which you yourself are defendant, is not in my power to grant, because it is contrary to law. In no case in the United States courts is it legal to summons defendants as witnesses in their own behalf.

The attorney general's direction that I should give the matters inquired into a full and impartial hearing has been fully obeyed. All the witnesses you have named for yourself have been summoned, and all have appeared and testified except Tebbetts, who up to this time has not been found though process has been in the hands of the marshal for him for weeks and every effort made to find him. If he appears before the grand jury is discharged he shall be heard.

I have submitted my view of the law as above stated to the court, who alone has the right to direct me on such matters.

HUGH J. CAMPBELL, U. S. Attorney.

Governor Ordway was indicted by this grand jury for criminal practice connected with the Faulk County organization. In his newspaper interview at St. Paul at this time he was quoted as saying that he had "no doubt he had been indicted by the present grand jury at Yankton, as it was constituted for that purpose." Gen. Harrison Allen was United States marshal at this time and had summoned the grand jurors. He resided at Fargo, and was personally and politically friendly to Governor Ordway. He would not have been a party to constituting a jury for his indictment.

It might have been supposed that the governor would now take advantage of this opportunity to have the criminal charges laid against him investigated by a competent court, and his innocence proven. The sequel proves that he escaped from the legal net by a process much easier and more simple, under the guidance of some of the ablest criminal lawyers in the country.

The Mr. William B. Tebbetts who had been sought for as a witness for weeks had some time before left Dakota, and it is claimed that his departure was caused by a desire to avoid appearing as a witness in any litigation growing out of the county seat locations. Prior to coming to Dakota he had been associated with the governor's son in business in Denver.

United States Attorney Campbell had been investigated officially during 1884 by the Department of Justice, on complaint of Governor Ordway charging him with many acts of wrongdoing in his official capacity, and particularly charging that Campbell had been actuated by malicious motives in the matter of Ordway's indictment by a United States grand jury for corrupt and criminal practices in connection with the organization of new counties. The investigation of Campbell failed to justify the accusation, and in order to show that he acted simply in accordance with the law and evidence which was presented to the grand jury, Campbell found it necessary to produce a transcript of the evidence before the grand jury upon which their action was based. And later the entire matter was put in form for publication. Concerning the basis for the indictment, Campbell states the facts that were developed by the testimony, with the comment that they would be found sufficient to justify an indictment in any court in this country, namely: (During the progress of these proceedings, Ordway's term expired and he was succeeded by Pierce.)

The facts were these.—Governor Ordway was entrusted by law with the organization of new counties. The County of Faulk had for over a year the legal number of inhabitants entitling them to an organization.

These inhabitants had during that time made repeated applications in the legal manner to the governor for such organization. Upon these applications he had neglected or refused to act for over a year. Finally about a year after the first application, a young man named Tebbetts, a former partner of Ordway's son, and an acquaintance of Ordway, suddenly appeared in Faulk County, where he did not reside, and gave notice to the people that he was there to inquire into the facts relating to their demand for an organization.

It appears also from the evidence before the grand jury, that he gave those people to understand that he had influence with Ordway, and that upon his report, if favorable, an organization would be made.

It appears further, that the members of the two town-site companies, rivals for the county seat of that county, upon the strength of his representations, made up a fund of land and of money, which they offered to Tebbetts to procure for them an organization favorable to their towns as county seats.

That he (Tebbetts) finally accepted the offer of LaFoon Townsite Company, which was 440 acres of land valued at $10 an acre, and half of the townsite of LaFoon, and some money. That the land was deeded by the members of the Townsite Company, first to Tebbetts, then to Miller, in trust for Tebbetts, and by Miller to Tebbetts, and that it was the understanding with these men who thus deeded their lands that it was for the purpose of influencing Governor Ordway in his action.

And that almost as soon as the deeds were made to Tebbetts, or as soon thereafter as he could have an interview with Ordway, Tebbetts did procure from Ordway, and Ordway did make the organization as requested by the LaFoon Townsite Company.

The evidence was also relative to other counties and county seats, that similar methods were used by Ordway in their organization. This testimony was competent as going to motive, guilty knowledge, and showing the system of operation. (See Wharton on Evidence.)

Now the question is, whether the grand jury was justified in finding an indictment upon this state of facts, and whether in presenting this testimony to the grand jury I could properly be chargeable with malice. My answer is, that if the facts submitted to the grand jury convinced them in their judgment that there was corrupt action on the part of the governor in this matter, then that finding of theirs relieves me thoroughly and completely from any charge of malice or improper action in bringing before them the testimony.

Concerning the action of the court in quashing the indictment against Ordway on the ground that his acts as governor could not be inquired into by a grand jury, Campbell contended before Judge Edgerton, who heard the case and granted the motion to quash, that the act of asking or receiving a bribe for the performance of some act under the territorial law, was not an act performed by virtue of the territorial law. The act of being bribed was separate and distinct from any act he did in the organization of the county. And the language of the statute is "with intent to have his decision or action on any question, matter, cause or proceeding which may at any time be pending or brought by law before him in his official capacity, influenced thereby." So that if the indictment alleged that Ordway did ask or receive a bribe with intent to have his decision or action influenced thereby, upon any matter which was pending before him, or brought before him by any law, in his official capacity, the indictment was good and the United States court had jurisdiction of the matter.

I state further that in my whole experience of eight years in this territory, there has been no case brought before me in which there has been such a universal demand and outcry for investigation, from all classes of the community, and from the best men in it, as in this case.

Further, I solemnly add, that in my judgment the demoralization and corrupting influences which have flowed from the prevalent belief in the corruption and fraudulent action of Ordway in this and other official matters, have exceeded that which has flowed from all other causes combined during that period.

And I further state that I was governed in my action, by a most serious and profound conviction, that unless some judicial investigation was made of these charges, there was the gravest danger that the tide of corruption and bribery which seems to have been let loose over the territory by these examples in high quarters, would sweep everything before it, and reach and imperil the administration of justice in the courts themselves.

I add further, as to the dismissal of the indictment by the court that Judge Edgerton informs me that he has stated to the examiners, and will I think, so state in writing if asked, that he was, and is, in grave doubt, as to the questions of law raised by Ordway's counsel, and gave the defendant Ordway the benefit of the doubt.

The trial or proceedings upon the trial of the governor indicted by the United States grand jury for corruption and bribery in connection with the organization of Faulk County took place at Yankton on the 13th of June, 1884, before Chief Justice Edgerton. Governor Ordway had for his counsel, Gov. C. K. Davis, of St. Paul, Minn., Hon. I. W. Lansing, of Detroit, Mich., ex-Chief Justice Shannon, of Yankton, and Col. W. H. Parker, of Deadwood. It was an able and formidable array of counsel, all experienced criminal lawyers, and an interesting contest was promised. The prosecution, which was by the Government, was in charge of the United States attorney, Gen. Hugh J. Campbell.

Governor Davis after the indictment was read, opened the proceedings with a motion to quash the indictment upon the ground that the grand jury had no jurisdiction over the defendant, Ordway, that under the law men occupying the position of governor were not indictable for offenses committed within the jurisdiction of their official duties—that no matter how guilty the defendant might be in the direction charged, he could not be punished by a court, and could only be punished by removal from office by the President—that the governor in being convicted and sentenced for this offense would be removed from office by such conviction and sentence, and that such removal was contrary to the law, which provided that only the power which appointed could remove. In the states governors were punished by impeachment in cases of this nature, and in the territories by removal from office.

The argument of the prosecuting attorney held that the removal from office would be no adequate punishment for a flagrant offense of the character alleged against the governor, and that justice demanded that he should, if guilty, be required to pay the penalty of his offense just the same as other persons who had wrongfully possessed themselves of the property of other people.

After the arguments the presiding judge took the case under advisement, and later the same evening granted the motion to quash the indictment on the theory that a grand jury has no jurisdiction over the transactions of a territorial executive when conducted as a part of his official duties.

Had the governor been mindful of his reputation, which he frequently declared was without stain of corruption, he might have insisted upon a trial in order to prove by valid testimony that he had been unjustly accused, and it was most astonishing that he avoided an investigation of his complicity and perfidy upon the plea that the offenses committed by the governor in the line of his official duties were not within the jurisdiction of the courts of the territory, but could only be reached by impeachment by Congress and removal from office. A friendly judge sustained this view of the case and the distinguished county seat manipulator who by virtue of his high office was declared immune from the lawful consequences as applied to non-commissioned thousands of settlers who had been despoiled of their rights and property and lawful privileges, and who, had they been found guilty of the criminal practices such as were charged against the governor, would have been deprived of their liberty, mulcted with heavy fine and sent "over the road." They would have been all allowed to escape trial by pleading "guilty but immune."

Governor Ordway's administration was not creditable to his intelligence, saying nothing of his other qualities. The Missouri River, one of the great navigable waterways of the world, coursed a thousand miles through Dakota, and about all that the governor seemed to know about it was that it was wet and muddy. Its importance as a navigable highway, which had enlisted the earnest attention of Thomas Jefferson, and later Senator Benton, and had become an enterprise that was engaging the earnest attention not alone of enterprising Dakotans but of the state and congressional officials of half a dozen great states, and was being promoted by thousands of the public spirited business men of these states as well as those of Dakota. This grand national project, nor the annual destruction of millions of acres of our most valuable farming lands did not appeal to him. There was no political patronage in it for him. He gave no attention to the public land question. The vast and valuable resources of the territory did not obtrude their importance upon his leisure hours as worthy of study and publicity. His mind was absorbed in such grave and momentous problems as to the best method to "down Pettigrew," influence the appointment of Federal officials in his own interests, and remove the capital to some point where he could have a proprietary access to the acres upon which it was located.

Beginning with a people ready and anxious to stand with him and back of him in all laudable efforts to promote the welfare of Dakota and hasten the development of its resources he forfeited their respect and confidence by pursuing a thoroughly selfish policy that looked to the aggrandizement of but one person, and that himself. Besetting greed cost him the support and confidence of the people. His career as governor was constantly on the declining scale. Those who conceived an early dislike for him were most gratified as the months slipped away drawing to their ranks new recruits until there were few left to recruit from except such as could profit from his partiality and purchased favor, not shown them from any laudable motive to benefit them or serve the people, but because they were the subservient human implements he needed in his efforts to build up an Ordway dynasty. His administration was devoid of anything that could commend it. Its progress in religion, morals, education, and material welfare, in immigration and development was remarkable and substantial, but one looks in vain to find him engaged in anything but petty intrigue in the organization of counties, or to thwart the desire of the people for a division of the territory. His administration was intensely personal and selfish—to enrich and promote the fortunes of himself and members of his family.

He did little for Dakota except to stir up strife and spread abroad scandalous reports regarding the integrity of the people. He started banks where he could make gains from the industries of the people, and share in the heavy deposits from the territorial treasury, but it is not known that he made two blades of grass to grow where but one grew before. He had no aspirations in that direction. He preferred to grovel in the dark, looking for some evil indications that would make a sensation when revealed by him through his frequent newspaper interviews which became a settled feature of his administration. And if he could gain his point in no other way, he would manufacture a straw evil and then proceed to demolish it in his plausible manner. He was not a brave man, and was harassed by a suspicion that harm would come to his person in certain sections of the territory unless he was escorted and guarded by men of notorious personal courage.

Ex-Governor Ordway returned to Washington after his discharge in the matter of Faulk County, and reported there that he had made arrangements for the organization of a very strong land, loan and trust company in Dakota with branch offices in Washington and New England, through which he intended to push the building of the connecting links in the North and South Dakota railway lines.

Dakota at this time had a population of over four hundred thousand, and probably eighty thousand claim holders, the majority of them, possibly the great majority, poor men in worldly wealth, which condition made the Dakota field an inviting one for the loaners of money upon real estate, and particularly farm lands, as security, and under these conditions were sown the seeds of misfortune to a multitude of these claim holders, who found the opportunity thrust into their hands, without any effort on their part, to borrow a small sum of money to tide them over a more or less "hard-up" period, or with the purpose of improving their claims. These loan companies multiplied until every little hamlet had one or more of their representatives, and mortgages were made so rapidly that the recorders of deeds had their records printed upon established forms, to facilitate the work of recording the mortgage papers.

Buffalo County was the only unorganized county in Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel at the close of the year 1884. This refers to counties upon the ceded domain and subject to the legal jurisdiction of Dakota. It was one of the oldest counties, had been twice organized and at one time its northern boundary extended beyond the Northern Pacific Railroad and south to Brule County. Bismarek (or Edmonton) was located in Buffalo County, and its first elections were held under its authority. The heart of the vast county consisted of the rich Crow Creek country, and was claimed by the Indians (Yanktonnais Sioux) as the Crow Creek Reservation. In the legislative progress of the territory, and to meet the demands of immigration, the original county was shorn of its vast and unwieldy proportions until little was left of it except the claimed Indian reservations, and this was permitted to retain the ancestral name of Buffalo. But there were only twelve full townships and three fractional townships left within its shrunken boundaries, and all of these save five were included within the Indian lands. The five townships did not furnish sufficient taxable property to maintain a county organization, and Buffalo was compelled to retire from the ranks, allow its organization a period of desuetude until the reservation domain, which was then in a tangle as to ownership, should come under the lawful jurisdiction of Buffalo County. In the meantime the county would contract no liabilities, and would lose nothing material except the fertile acres which crumbled and fell into the Missouri River each year as the result of the erosive action of its flood waters. The county finally came into its own about the time that statehood came to the old territory.

The democrats throughout the territory made the welkin ring with their triumphant huzzahs following the national election in 1884. To many of the young men it was the first democratic victory they had any recollection of, and one of their favorite marching chants was this:

Grover, Grover
 Election now is over,
 Out they go (referring to republican office holders),
 In we go,
 Then we'll be in clover.

RAILROADS

In the spring of 1884 the railroads entering Dakota put on extra trains to accommodate the large moving class who were leaving the older settled sections in the East and making their new homes on Dakota soil. This addition to the facilities of the railways did not indicate the increase of population more rapidly than before, for in fact it was thought to be falling off to some extent, but the competition for Dakota travel had awakened the enterprise of our common carriers, and this special improvement, affording more comforts to the family than the mixed trains, was the commendable result.

There was little railroad building in Dakota in the year 1884. The opening of the Fargo Southern gave the Milwaukee a line from Sioux City to Northern Dakota. The Burlington, Cedar Rapids & Northern reached Watertown in the fall and was projected to Aberdeen. The Milwaukee completed its line from Scotland to Mitchell, giving it a continuous road up the James Valley to Jamestown. Neither the Northwestern, nor the Milwaukee, intended to build any new road in the territory during the year, but it was conjectured that the coming into the Dakota field of the Rock Island and the Minneapolis & St. Louis would stimulate some branch lines and extension construction in 1885.

A daily stage and freight line company began operations between Medora, in Billings County, on the Northern Pacific Railroad, and Deadwood in August, 1884. The distance was 190 miles and the stage schedule was thirty hours between terminal points. The Northern Pacific was, conjecturally, the principal promoter of the enterprise.

The Fargo & Southern Railroad was completed and opened for traffic from Fargo to Ortonville, on the Minnesota State line, at its intersection with the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, in September, 1884. This line furnished the connecting link between the extreme southern boundary and the extreme northern boundary of the territory—from Sioux City via Yankton, Mitchell, Redfield and Aberdeen, thence to Ortonville, and thence to Fargo and on to Winnipeg.

The railway business into and through Dakota had become of such volume in 1883-84 that the railways found considerable difficulty in handling it. Frequent complaints of a shortage of rolling stock were made: elevator people complained that they could not get cars to relieve the overcrowded condition of storage capacity, and as a result they were compelled to refuse the grain coming in from the farms, which greatly exasperated the farmers. It did not appear that blame could be attached to any party for this condition—it was simply a case of too much prosperity for the time being. At Fargo, on the 13th of April, 1884, 173 cars of general freight went west, 100 empty cars were sent to various points, and 593 loaded and empty cars were standing in the railroad yards. One hundred and forty-two cars loaded with freight and merchandise were received. At the same time there were 345 cars of general freight in the Fargo yards, consigned to Fargo merchants.

The unfinished work of construction on the James River Valley Railroad between Jamestown and LaMoure, a distance of fifty miles, was completed in 1884.

The Town of Wakonda, Clay County, was the new station on the Centreville-Yankton branch of the Northwestern Railroad, laid out in 1884, twelve miles from Yankton. Its site occupied the summit between the terminal points of the railroad, and was therefore assured of excellent drainage for all time.

ORGANIZING THE G. A. R. DEPARTMENT OF DAKOTA

The Grand Army of the Republic for the Department of Dakota was organized at Yankton, February 26, 1883. A provisional organization had been made the year before with Thomas S. Free, of Sioux Falls, commander; Alexander Hughes, of Elk Point, senior vice commander; W. A. Bentley, of Bismarck, junior vice commander; W. S. Potter, of Sioux Falls, assistant adjutant general; N. C. Nash, of Canton, assistant quartermaster general.

Preparations having been made for a permanent organization, Gen. Paul Van der Voort, of Nebraska, the commander-in-chief of the Grand Army, came up from Omaha to Yankton, where the representatives of the various G. A. R. posts of the territory were gathered, to institute a permanent departmental organization. The proceedings were had in the hall of Phil Kearney Post, where the following subordinate organizations were represented:

Ransom No. 6, Mitchell; Phil Kearney No. 7, Yankton; Miner No. 8, Vermillion; Stephen A. Hurlburt No. 9, Elk Point; Joe Hooker No. 10, Sioux Falls; General Lyon No. 11, Canton; Sully No. 12, Pierre; C. C. Washburn No. 13, Egan; No. 15, Scotland.

The ample ceremonial of the order was well observed in the proceedings of instituting the department organization, and the following departmental officers elected for the ensuing term:

Thomas S. Free, of Sioux Falls, commander; Alexander Hughes, of Elk Point, senior vice commander; S. M. Laird, of Pierre, junior vice commander; J. E. Snyder, of Egan, medical director; Rev. J. G. Travis, of Yankton, chaplain; W. S. Potter, of Sioux Falls, assistant adjutant general; council of administration: J. A. Wallace, Elk Point; J. E. Elson, Huron; J. L. Jolley, Vermillion; G. W. Harlan, Canton; J. M. Adams, Mitchell. S. A. Boyles, of Yankton, was chosen delegate to the national encampment which would meet at Denver, and M. B. Kent, of Elk Point, alternate. A camp fire banquet closed the meeting and the festivities.

The Northern Dakota posts were not represented and were preparing for the establishment of a separate department when the territory should be divided, an event that was confidently looked for during the Congress then in session.

The first annual encampment of the Department of Dakota, Grand Army of the Republic, met at Sioux Falls on Tuesday, April 29, 1884, at the hour of 11 o'clock A. M., in the rooms of the Leisure Hour Club. There were representatives present from twenty-seven posts, giving a membership to the encampment of over sixty. The ceremony of calling to order was conducted by Commander Thomas S. Free, and prayer was then offered by Rev. A. P. Lyon, of Sioux Falls. A committee on credentials was then appointed, consisting of W. S. Potter, of Sioux Falls, assistant adjutant general; O. N. Russell, of Canton; Capt. B. F. Payne, of Miller; E. O. Parker, of Highmore, and E. T. Cressey, of Huron. A recess was then taken until 2 P. M., when the credentials committee reported the several posts entitled to the following representation:

Kilpatrick No. 4, Huron, 7 votes, Capt. J. E. Elson, E. T. Cressey; Phil Kearney No. 7, Yankton, 7 votes, Gen. J. B. Dennis, W. H. Munroe; Miner No. 8, Vermillion, 4 votes, Col. John L. Jolley, J. R. Reede; Stephen A. Hurlburt No. 9, Elk Point, 6 votes, Capt. William Duncan, W. J. Himes; Joe Hooker No. 10, Sioux Falls, 6 votes, Capt. E. Parlman, William Beckler, L. D. Henry, A. F. Force; General Lyon No. 11, Canton, 6 votes, Capt. O. N. Russell, N. C. Nash; Canby No. 12, Miller, 4 votes, Capt. B. F. Payne, R. F. Willett, P. H. Anderson, J. H. Snoddy; C. C. Washburn No. 15, Egan, 5 votes, E. Anderson, R. Brennan, J. H. Eno, George R. Lanning, James Wilson; Carlton No. 17, Parker, 4 votes, T. W. Gage; Colonel Ellsworth No. 21, Lemox, 4 votes, O. D. Gray, J. Johnson; Gen. James Shields No. 22, Madison, 3 votes, John Huntamer, R. C. McCallister; Burnside No. 24, Cavour, 3 votes, Maj. H. G. Wolfe, James Connelly; Sedgwick No. 26, Salem, O. C. Potter; Gen. John A. Rawlins No. 27, Plankinton, C. S. Deering, M. T. Locke; John A. Dix No. 30, Highmore, 4 votes, Edson O. Parker; Edward S. McCook No. 31, Hurley, 4 votes, Dan Dwyer, T. B. Buchanan; McKenzie No. 34, Chamberlain, 5 votes, Maj. R. H. Hendershott, J. F. Sisson, Capt. W. V. Lucas, E. W. Spaulding; Anson McCook No. 39, Centreville, 4 votes, O. D. Hinckley, J. B. Leak; Baker No. 39, Lake Preston, 3 votes, E. E. Needham; Gordon Granger No. 43, Alexandria, 3 votes, A. R. Brown; John F. Reynolds No. 44, Fargo, 1 vote, I. E. West; General Wadsworth No. 50, Flandrau, C. W. Tobin.

Commander Free submitted his annual report, a most admirable document, setting forth the purposes of the order, its encouraging growth in Dakota and the necessities that confront the encampment. This annual report was referred to a committee consisting of I. E. West, Col. J. L. Jolley, R. C. McCallister, Capt. B. F. Payne and R. M. Hawley.

Assistant Adjutant General Potter submitted his annual report, showing the following facts:

February 27, 1884, the department was organized, including thirteen provisional posts numbering 240 members. At this date there are sixty-two posts, numbering 2,000 members. The increase in the number of posts has been 500 per cent and 800 per cent in the number of membership, an increase the most remarkable in the history of the order, the significance of which is most complimentary to the commander and adjutant general, when it is remembered that the department commenced without a cent in the treasury, they furnishing the funds. There have been issued ten general orders, three circular letters, and forty-three special orders. There have been promulgated twenty general orders from national headquarters. The labors of the office are also indicated by the fact that there have been 300 letters written, and the same number received and filed.

The report was adopted without reference.

Quartermaster General Beckler made his report, showing the following facts:

The value of the supplies on hand, February 27th, was $20.45, and there have been purchased since supplies amounting to $242.27. There is permanent property on hand amounting to $92.45. The financial statement shows the receipts of the department to have been $600.73, and the expenditures $783.18, leaving a deficit of $122.45, which Commander Free and Adjutant Potter have met out of their private funds. The possession of permanent property amounting to $92.45, leaves the deficit in current expenses only $30.00.

This report was referred to a committee consisting of Capt. W. V. Lucas, Capt. J. H. Bridgman, Capt. William Duncan, Roger Brennan and N. C. Nash.

Maj. H. G. Wolfe, chief mustering officer, presented his report, showing that there have been forty-eight new posts mustered during the year, the charter members of which numbered 981. The report was referred to L. D. Henry, W. L. Sherman, E. Anderson, T. W. Gage and A. R. Brown.

The committees to whom reports were referred reported favorably upon each.

The following officers were then elected for the ensuing year: Department commander, Maj. Thomas S. Free, of Sioux Falls; senior vice commander, Capt. W. V. Lucas, of Chamberlain; junior vice commander, Maj. R. E. Fleming, of Fargo; medical director, Dr. D. Frank Etter, of Yankton; chaplain, Rev. George A. Cressey, of Huron; council of administration, Walter I. Himes (Elk Point), N. C. Nash (Canton), G. R. Lanning (Egan), O. C. Potter (Salem), C. S. Deering (Plankinton); delegates to national encampment in June at Minneapolis, Capt. B. F. Payne (Miller), I. E. West (Fargo), R. M. Hawley (Parker); alternates, W. H. Munroe (Yankton), Roger Brennan (Egan), O. N. Russell (Canton).

The encampment was then closed.

CHAPTER XCV

GROVER CLEVELAND, PRESIDENT—NEW TERRITORIAL OFFICERS

1885

GROVER CLEVELAND, PRESIDENT—LEGISLATURE IN 15TH SESSION—MEMBERSHIP INCREASED TO TWENTY-FOUR COUNCILMEN AND FORTY-EIGHT REPRESENTATIVES—MESSAGE OF GOVERNOR—BILL TO REMOVE CAPITAL TO PIERRE PASSED—GOVERNOR VETOES IT—PRESIDENT CLEVELAND EXPLAINS HIS POSITION REGARDING TERRITORIAL APPOINTMENTS—LOCAL DEMOCRATIC VIEW OF THE SAME MATTER—GOVERNOR VETOES WOMAN SUFFRAGE BILL—DIVISION AND ADMISSION IN CONGRESS—LOUIS K. CHURCH APPOINTED JUDGE—OTHER APPOINTMENTS—BARTLETT TRIPP, CHIEF JUSTICE—ROOSEVELT A RANCHMAN IN DAKOTA.

The fifteenth session of the Legislature of Dakota Territory convened at Bismarck, the new capital, on Tuesday, January 13, 1885, at the new capitol building.

The full text of the law increasing the membership of Dakota's Legislature to double the number heretofore allowed, approved June 12, 1884, reads as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that the Legislature of the Territory of Dakota shall hereafter consist of twenty-four members of the Council and forty-eight members of the House of Representatives, and that there shall be elected at the next general election in said territory, two members of the Council and four members of the House of Representatives in each of the twelve legislative districts provided for in chapter seven of the territorial statutes of 1883 of said territory.

The Council was called to order by Mr. Henderson, secretary of the Council in 1883, who called the roll. Since the last session in 1883 the membership had been doubled by act of Congress, the Council now consisting of twenty-four members and the House of fifty-two. Upon the call of the roll the following members of the Council-elect responded to their names: First District, Clay, Union and Lincoln counties—A. C. Huetson, Canton; William Duncan, Elk Point. Second District, Yankton, Hutchinson and Turner counties—J. R. Gamble, Yankton; A. S. Jones, Olivet. Third District, Bon Homme, Charles Mix, Douglas, Aurora, Jerauld, Davison, Brule, Buffalo and Hanson counties—A. M. Bowdle, Mitchell; B. R. Wagner, Springfield. Fourth District, Minnehaha, McCook and Miner counties—George E. Farmer, Howard; R. F. Pettigrew, Sioux Falls. Fifth District, Brookings, Kingsbury, Lake and Moody counties—H. H. Natwick, Brookings; W. B. Cameron, Madison. Sixth District, Hamlin, Clark, Spink, Beadle, Sanborn, Hand, Faulk, Potter, Sully, Hyde and Hughes counties—J. H. Westover, Pierre; J. P. Day, Mellette. Seventh District, Deuel, Grant, Codington, Day, Brown, Edgerton, McAuley, Inman, McPherson, Edmunds, Campbell, Roberts and Walworth counties—A. B. Smedley, Milbank; V. P. Kennedy, Columbia. Eighth District, Lawrence, Pennington, Custer, Butte and Fall River counties—F. J. Washabaugh, Deadwood; S. P. Wells, Rapid City. Ninth District, Barnes, Stutsman, Griggs, Foster, Wells, Kidder, Burleigh, Sheridan, Stevens, Renville, Montraille, Walette, Howard, Williams, Mercer,

MAP OF DAKOTA TERRITORY, 1885

The latest authentic map. The counties of Pierre and Church were added in 1887, but Pierre, near Devil's Lake, only remains. Meade County was segregated from Lawrence in the last year of the territory, 1889.

Morton, Stark, Billings, Emmons, Logan, Benson, DeSmet, Rolette, Bottineau and McHenry counties—Johnson, Nicks, Jamestown; Charles Richardson, Valley City. Tenth District, Cass, Richland, Ransom, Sargent, LaMoure and Dickey counties—D. H. Twomey, Fargo; C. D. Austin, Lisbon. Eleventh District, Grand Forks, Nelson, Traill and Steele counties—George H. Walsh, Grand Forks; John Plittie, Mayville. Twelfth District, Pembina, Nicks, Cavalier, Walsh, Harvey and Ramsey counties—Judson LaMoure, Pembina; P. J. McLaughlin, Pembina.

Following the roll call, prayer was offered by Rev. C. B. Austin, of Bismarck. The oath of office was then administered by Judge Francis, of Bismarck.

The caucus nominees were then elected to the several offices, to-wit: J. H. Westover, of Pierre, president of the Council; A. W. Howard, of Yankton, secretary; W. G. Eakins, assistant secretary; Andrew Thompson, of Minnehaha, sergeant-at-arms; Rev. C. B. Austin, of Bismarck, chaplain; M. B. Kent, of Union County, enrolling clerk; F. S. Rudsell, of Brown County, messenger; John Todd, of Bon Homme County, assistant sergeant-at-arms; D. S. Waldo, watchman; J. M. Preston, of Lake County, clerk Judiciary Committee.

After the appointment of the usual committees to wait upon the House and inform them of the organization, and to notify the governor of their readiness to receive any communication he might wish to make, the Council adjourned.

The House organized at the same time and with the like unanimity that prevailed in the Council. The organization was preceded with a prayer offered by Rev. H. Claire. The calling of the roll of members revealed the following list: [The House districts were made up of the same counties as the Council districts, to which the reader is referred.]

First District—Ole A. Helvig, Canton; John Larson, Spink Postoffice, Union County; Eli B. Dawson, Lodi, Clay County; Hans Myron, Meckling, Clay County. Second District—A. L. VanOsdel, Yankton; Hugh Langan, Centreville; J. P. Ward, Parker; J. H. Swanton, Menmo. Third District—A. J. Parshall, Alexandria; C. E. Huston, Huston, Douglas County; Mark Ward, Chamberlain; H. M. Clark, Plankinton. Fourth District—W. H. Riddell, Valley Springs; H. W. Smith, Sioux Falls; P. L. Runkle, Salem; J. M. Bayard, Canistota. Fifth District—George Rice, Flandrau; John Hobart, Egan; V. V. Barnes, DeSmet; J. C. Southwick, Denver, Kingsbury County. Sixth District, M. L. Miller, Altoona; John T. Blakemore, Highmore; George W. Pierce, Castlewood; John A. Pickler, Faulkton. Seventh District, G. H. Johnson, Columbia; F. A. Eldridge, Milbank; E. Huntington, Webster; M. T. Dewoody, Ipswich. Eighth District—H. M. Gregg, Spearfish; Eben W. Martin, Deadwood; A. L. Sprague, Custer City; A. McCall, Sturgis City. Ninth District, E. A. Williams, Bismarck; H. W. Coe, Mandan; Julius Stevens, Cooperstown; W. F. Steele, Kidder County. Tenth District—S. E. Stebbins, Wahpeton; P. J. McCumber, Wahpeton; H. S. Oliver, Lisbon; T. M. Pugh, Ellendale. Eleventh District—John W. Scott, Gilby Postoffice, Grand Forks County; C. W. Morgan, Portland; W. N. Roach, Larimore; E. T. Hutchinson, Lakota. Twelfth District—H. H. Ruger, Donald Stewart, H. Strong, P. McHugh.

The House then organized by the election of the following officers: Speaker, George Rice, Moody County; chief clerk, Cassius M. Reed, Sully County; assistant clerk, J. G. Hamilton, Grand Forks County; enrolling and engrossing clerk, H. H. Pierce, of McCook County; assistant engrossing and enrolling clerk, Edward A. Smith; sergeant-at-arms, John A. Munro, Roberts County; messenger, W. A. Carr, Morton County; watchman, M. Flick; pages, Fred Lounsbury, of Burleigh County, and Frank Armstrong, of Beadle County.

The committees to notify the governor of the organization, and also the other legislative body, were appointed, whereupon the House adjourned until 10 o'clock the following morning.

The organization had been preceded by a caucus of the members south of the forty-sixth parallel, and the organization of both houses was then agreed upon, giving to the counties north of the forty-sixth slight recognition.

The first annual message of the new governor, Pierce, was delivered by the executive in person on Wednesday, the second day of the session, as follows:

Gentlemen of the Council and House of Representatives.

In accordance with a recognized custom I transmit herewith the reports of divers territorial officers, accompanying their statement with such suggestions and recommendations as seem to me pertinent and timely. The treasurer's report shows the finances of the territory to be in a very satisfactory condition. The receipts and expenditures for 1883 and 1884 were as follows:

RECEIPTS FOR 1883

Balance in treasury, December 1, 1882.....	$ 43,463.90

Exchange, etc.....	289.08
Balance in treasury, November 30, 1884.....	218,667.66
Total	$650,763.66

The total indebtedness of the territory is $392,500, divided into $100,000 in bonds bearing 5 per cent, $292,500 in bonds bearing 6 per cent. These bonds are payable in 1901-2-3-4, or sooner, at the option of the territory, the option beginning on $90,000 of the bonds after May 1, 1886.

The voluminous report of the territorial auditor shows transactions in detail of his office for the two years ending November 30, 1884. The total amount of the warrants issued by the auditor for the biennial period is $572,996.04. Of this amount, $248,305.03 were expended for the construction of public buildings, leaving the current expenses of the territory $324,691.01 for the two years, an average of $162,345.50 per year. The report shows 174 insurance companies doing business in the territory, of which all but three are outside corporations. The total premiums paid to these companies for the two years ending January 1, 1884, were $1,094,157.70. Total losses paid, $379,288.13, showing a gross profit to the companies of $714,869.57. The tax levied on companies under the law and paid to the auditor, amounted to $10,102.23, and the fees from April 7, 1883, to November, 1884, $7,185.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—The report of the superintendent of public instruction (W. H. Beadle) makes a very interesting and encouraging exhibit of the condition of the public schools in the territory. There are eighty-five organized counties, but only sixty-five of these have made the returns required by law, the remainder being comparatively new. From the returns made the following facts and figures are gained:

Number of children, January 1, 1884, over seven and under twenty years	77,499
Number enrolled in public schools.....	59,931
Per cent of attendance of those enrolled.....	65
Average cost for tuition per month for pupil.....	$2.29
Total number of teachers employed.....	2,914
Number of male teachers.....	863
Number of female teachers.....	2,048
Average pay of teachers per month, males.....	$38.43
Average pay of teachers per month, females.....	$31.72
Number of schools graded.....	69
Number ungraded	1,930
Whole number of schoolhouses.....	1,929
Sittings in schoolhouses.....	60,590
Schoolhouses built during year.....	722
Value of permanent school property.....	$1,089,958.00
Receipts by treasurers of school corporations from April 1, 1883, to June 30, 1884.....	$1,003,562.99
Total expenditures	$1,309,878.72

This does not include sums paid to county superintendents, expended for county and territorial institutes or for the erection of the university, Agricultural College or Normal School Building. The grand total, including all expenditures for educational purposes by the territory (not private institutions) is $1,786,670.00.

The report of the regents of the University of Dakota is incorporated in the superintendent's report and gives an exhibit of the expenditures in the building of the university and its maintenance for the past year. The regents say, "in accordance with the purposes of the act organizing this board, we have expended nearly five thousand dollars to complete the wing of the building which was partially built by Clay County. We have also erected and enclosed a main building, the walls of which are of Sioux Falls quartzite and the trimmings of stone from Stone City. The extreme size of the building is 68 by 116 feet. It is three stories with tower 111 feet 6 inches high from the grade line. It is roofed with iron shingles. Not having money to complete the second and third stories, the board ask an appropriation for the ensuing biennial term of $59,450.00 for that and other purposes.

THE NORTH DAKOTA UNIVERSITY.—In a clear and comprehensive statement, the regents report what has been done and what they expect to do for that institution. The construction fund appropriated by the last Legislature, will fall about $5,000 short of paying in full for the main building that has been erected. A further appropriation will be needed for other necessary buildings, heating apparatus, pay of president and professors, fuel and janitor's services, the amount of which will have to be ascertained later. The building which has been completed is 150 by 54 feet, three stories and a basement, and I am told is admirably adapted for its purpose. An observatory 22.6 by 15.8 has been constructed in fulfillment of the bond given to the territory.

THE AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE.—The trustees of the Agricultural College at Brookings are required under the law to report directly to the Legislature. I am informed that the institution has opened under flattering auspices. A building 60 by 80 feet, three stories and a basement in height has been erected, which when entirely finished will accommodate 300 pupils. School was opened in September last.

THE NORMAL SCHOOLS.—No report has been received from the Normal School at Madison or at Spearfish. The building of the Madison school is of frame, two stories high, 70 by 50 feet, with a side projection for entrance. It is planned to veneer the structure with brick. It will accommodate 200 students. There were fifty-four in attendance last term.

The Spearfish school building is of brick, 45 by 30 feet, two stories high. Three terms of the school have been held.

THE DEAF AND DUMB SCHOOL.—The Deaf Mute School at Sioux Falls has an attractive site, and the new building provided for by the last Legislature has been completed and occupied. No communication has been received from the governing board. It is 57 by 99 feet on the ground, and two stories and a basement, with pressed brick trimmings. There is an attendance of thirty-one, and the superintendent has the names of over eighty additional deaf mutes now resident in the territory. The management suggest the desirability of constructing an additional building.

PENITENTIARIES.—The report of the directors of the penitentiary at Sioux Falls shows the following.

Total receipts from January 1, 1883, to November 29, 1884.....	$87,547.00
Total expenditures for same period.....	$86,598.70

The prisoners have performed 7,379 days' labor in the quarry and construction of new buildings, and 5,570 $\frac{1}{4}$ days in and about the prison.

No complete report has yet been received from the directors and this vexatious delay renders it impossible to summarize many facts which might prove interesting and require comment. It seems that the prisoners have performed 7,379 $\frac{1}{4}$ days' labor in the quarry and in the construction of new buildings, and 5,570 $\frac{1}{4}$ in and about the prison. I am unable to say what this latter service consisted of, but taking it for granted that it was labor, which represents the earning capacity of the prisoners, if under a contract, there was a total of 12,949 $\frac{1}{2}$ days' work represented, from which an income may be estimated. It seems that the directors have been offered 45 cents a day for the labor of prisoners, and at this rate the labor performed during the past year would amount to \$5,827.27. I am inclined to think the labor of the prisoners in the quarries for the past year would amount to considerably more than this, but the directors seem to think that this labor can not be profitably continued.

The total appropriation of 1883, for the Sioux Falls prison, for two years, excluding buildings, repairs and improvements, was $77,625.00.

The total amount expended for maintenance, officers, employees, fuel, medicine, clothing, etc., was $54,462.46.

The average number of prisoners for the two years being 59 $\frac{1}{2}$, it will be seen that the total cost per prisoner per year, was \$477.48 and per week, \$9.18. The cost of keeping the prisoners at the House of Correction was \$78 per year, or \$1.50 per week per man. The expense of transporting, however, was much greater, averaging about \$4.66 per man, while to the present prison it averages but \$1.01. With a small number of convicts, a penitentiary is an expensive institution to maintain, and though the time had come when the territory demanded a place of her own for the reception of prisoners, this expense is considerably greater than when they were sent to a neighboring state. The expenditure per capita will diminish of course as the number increases, and it does not appear even now that the cost is very much greater than in states east, having something like an equal number of convicts.

The estimate of the directors of the Southern Penitentiary for the ensuing two years is $68,800. This is for the ordinary running expenses of the prison, and is made on the basis of 130 prisoners. No calculation is made for the earnings of the prisoners.

The estimate of the directors of the Bismarck Prison for the same purpose, is $56,652. This is based on an estimate of sixty prisoners and eighteen employees for two years. The directors of Bismarck Prison also ask for an appropriation to make certain improvements amounting in all to $47,900. Some of these improvements, such as a workshop, heating and plumbing, temporary yard wall, sewerage, etc., are necessary to the occupation of the prison. The directors also submit a full report of their expenditures in constructing the prison, with such recommendations and suggestions as they have thought necessary. The building seems to be well adapted to its purpose, and is a fair beginning to what will ultimately be made, no doubt, when the wants of the territory require it, a structure of harmonious design and finish.

The prison at Sioux Falls is of an imposing design, and would be regarded anywhere as an admirable structure for the purpose. The completion of the United States wing and the warden's residence adds much to the appearance of the structure and makes it altogether one of the most complete penitentiary buildings in the West. The whole edifice is capable of accommodating 200 prisoners, but the possession of the wing constructed for the general Government is still uncertain. If the United States wing can be controlled by the territory, the accommodations thus furnished, together with those by the Bismarck Prison, will in my judgment be sufficient for the necessities of the territory until the next meeting of the Legislature. It is important, however, that this question be settled and a careful estimate be made in order that the present Legislature may make such preparations as appear necessary.

ASYLUMS.—One building of the North Dakota Insane Asylum at Jamestown, provided for by the last Legislature, has been completed and the report of the trustees is presented herewith. This asylum, which is designed upon the modern cottage plan, can of course be enlarged to any extent. The present building will accommodate fifty patients. The increase in the number of insane is very large, and although accommodations are already provided in the territory for 250, I fear that additional provision must be made to meet the necessities of the next two years. There are already fifty patients or more (the full capacity of the Jamestown building) in the institution at Yankton. The trustees of the Jamestown hospital ask for an appropriation for an additional building, and submit an estimate therefor. They also ask for an appropriation of $98,500 for the maintenance and improvement of the present hospital. This amount can be materially reduced in my judgment without seriously impairing the efficiency of the institution. The building which has been erected is a plain but neat and substantial structure, and is well adapted, I believe, to its purpose. It seems to have been erected also with a fair regard to economy, but the land on which it stands has cost a much larger sum than was anticipated. The trustees make a full explanation of the matter in their annual report, and the reasons which induced them to select the present site.

A very full and complete report is submitted by the trustees of the Dakota Hospital for the Insane, at Yankton, containing tables of much interest. The full capacity of the present building, including the wing which has lately been completed, is 200. It appears that 108 patients, from South Dakota alone, were admitted to the asylum in the past year, a gain of sixty-eight over the year previous. At the same rate of increase there will be 291 patients in South Dakota at the end of two years. If the fifty belonging to the north are removed, there will remain room for ninety-seven at Yankton, which will of course furnish accommodations for a year yet. From a hasty examination, however, it would appear necessary, as I have already stated, to make arrangements for enlarging both asylums by the close of 1886.

The present institution seems to have been managed with judgment and economy. The average cost of caring for patients has been but slightly over $2.22 per week per patient. At Rochester, Minn., the cost has been $3.44 per week, and at St. Peter, Minn., $3.54.

PUBLIC LANDS WITH RAILROAD LIMITS.—There is a widespread feeling in the northern part of the territory that the Government lands lying along the Northern Pacific Railroad, within what is known as the railroad limit, ought to be placed on the market at the regular Government rate of $1.25 an acre. Such action has been taken by Congress in other cases of reserved lands, and there seems no good reason why it should not be done in this. The Government is not a speculator and railroads are not built to enhance the public revenue, but to open the country up to settlement and cultivation.

EXAMINATION OF PRIVATE BANKS.—Up to July, 1883, the private banks of the territory had to make returns to the United States collector of internal revenue and were subject to examination as often as the officials thought necessary. Since these reports ceased there has been no way of determining the standing or condition of private institutions of this kind, our own laws making no provision therefor. I call the attention of the Legislature to matter, both in the interest of sound and reliable houses of this kind, who will esteem it an advantage to have their condition known, and in the interest of the people at large to whom such knowledge would prove a protection.

SCHOOL OF MINES.—It has long been thought that our educational systems should be supplemented by a school of mines to be established in the great mineral regions of the Black Hills. The industry which contributes from eight to ten millions annually to the precious metals of the country is worthy of development, and deserves your fostering care and encouragement.

I have been requested also to call the attention of the Legislature to the advisability of providing for a territorial geologist, it being deemed important to begin the work of a geological survey.

THE CAPITOL BUILDING.—The commission appointed by the last Legislature notified me on the 10th of November last that the capitol building provided for by the act of the Legislature was ready for occupancy, and in obedience to the requirements of the law I issued a proclamation reciting that fact. Under the terms of the law the commission is issued to report directly to the Legislature. A few facts and suggestions, however, may be given here.

The commission report the total cost of the present building, exclusive of the pay of the architect, the commissioners, etc., to be $145,000. They have received from the sale of lots $38,000. The whole number of lots belonging to the fund was originally 1,000 appraised at $123,415. Seven hundred and fifty of these lots remain unsold, besides 100 acres of land adjoining the townsite south of the city. I am informed that the commission owe on the building, and for divers services performed, about twenty thousand dollars. This does not include the heating and furnishing, which the citizens of Bismarek do not regard as coming within their contract to erect a capitol building. The appraisement of the real estate, conveyed to the territory by the City of Bismarek, was made at a time when property values were high. When the times became less prosperous this property would not sell at the price fixed by the commission, and as there was no authority of law for a revaluation or selling at a figure below the minimum appraisement, the commission found themselves embarrassed for lack of funds, hence the debt of $20,000 alluded to. I advised the commission to issue warrants on the building fund for this amount, but there being no balance in this fund, of course the creditors must wait. The real estate named is the property of the territory. It was intended to be disposed of to pay for the erection of this building. The fact that it has depreciated in value is a misfortune, but it does not alter the obligation entered into to pay the men who contributed time and material toward the structure and to pay them promptly. I am told that some of this amount is due to laborers who depend on their daily earnings to support their families. It may involve a sacrifice to sell the property now, and some of the creditors may feel disposed to wait, but they should not be compelled to do this under protest. They did their work in good faith. They knew only the single fact that a Legislature of the territory had authorized the work, and relying upon this authority they went forward. The act of one Legislature may be overturned by a subsequent one, but the faith, and credit and reliance that the outside world place in the law-making power should not be shaken by any failure to comply with contracts honestly performed under the color of law and under the direction of those chosen to administer it. I therefore recommend that the Legislature confer upon the present or any future commission that may be appointed the power to re-appraise and sell the lands remaining to the capital commission, and pay their debt. As I have said, the heating apparatus is not included in the debt of $20,000. The steam, of course, takes the place of stoves, except that so large a structure could hardly be made comfortable with the latter. The property remaining unsold ought to be amply sufficient, and will be, I doubt not, under proper management, to pay all the debts, including the expense of lighting, heating and furnishing. Such expenses, however, as properly belong to the territory should be liquidated by the Legislature with the provision, if thought best, that the amount be charged to the building fund, and paid out of the future sales of real estate. I take occasion to say here that the lights and furniture placed in the capital are not furnished under any contract or stipulation, but are here simply for the inspection of the Legislature and for their use if they wish to secure them. So far as I know, no assurances of purchase have been given to the firms who have undertaken the work, for the Legislature can consider the subject without the slightest embarrassment, growing out of any promises, though I hope with perfect justice and fairness. I may say further, because the subject has been discussed somewhat in the newspapers, that I understand this building to be the free gift of the people of Bismarck to the territory. I have accepted this assurance in good faith and with no thought of any mental reservations or evasions. I am sure the thought of asking for any return of the money expended has not entered the minds of the donors, and that no scheme or device for such return is contemplated. And I hope, I need scarcely assure this Legislature and the people of the territory, that, relying on the terms of the law under which this work was undertaken, no measure for repayment will meet with the approval of the executive, while I occupy the office and Bismarck remains the capital. * * *

The governor then commends the New Orleans Exposition.

GRAIN AND RAILWAY COMMISSION AND AGRICULTURAL AND IMMIGRATION AGENT.—The territory needs an effective grain and railway commission. It needs an agent of immigration, and it needs an agricultural bureau. The grain commission provided by the last Legislature amounts to very little practically, because the agents appointed to that board have not been willing or competent, but because they are provided with no adequate means to carry out the necessary improvements. The question of securing a fair grading of grain, and reasonable facilities for transporting it to market is one of much moment, and one beset with many difficulties. The matter has been widely discussed and has no doubt secured the careful consideration of many members of the Legislature who will have measures of relief to propose. I need not dwell on the importance of a change in the present condition of affairs. Such a change has become an absolute necessity to the growth and continuance of an agricultural industry. I am glad to learn that the Legislature of Minnesota is disposed to co-operate with the legislative department of this territory in an effort to devise means for the relief of the people of both sections, and I hope committees of conference may be appointed by the two bodies, and that their deliberations will bear satisfactory results. If our present grain commission, reorganized and clothed with larger powers, can be of service in this connection, you will doubtless see fit to continue it. As constituted under the present law, however, it might as well be abolished. The advantage of having an agricultural agent for the territory is apparent. Dakota is pre-eminently an agricultural region. No body of men is more fairly entitled to representation in the territorial government than the farmers and stock raisers. Information regarding the condition of the crops, the acreage, aggregate and average yield, experiments with various seeds, success with diverse crops and manner of cultivation, and many other matters upon which it is desirable to have full information, are now unobtainable in anything like a reliable form. Experience with crops in other states, even those immediately adjoining us, is in many instances or wholly inapplicable here. The country and the conditions are new. Success with any given crop in the territory, cultivated in a given way or with some new variety of grain, is a matter of great importance to the farmers of the territory, and all information on this subject ought to be speedily gathered and widely disseminated.

I earnestly hope that provision will be made for the appointment of such an agent, and that whatever appropriation is needed to make a bureau of this character effective and of signal service to the farming interests, will be promptly furnished.

The states about us have commissioners of immigration and find them profitable adjuncts to the state governments. There is certainly as much, and it seems to me more reason and reason for the employment of such an agent in Dakota than in any of the neighboring states. Three boards to look after the three interests named seems hardly justifiable and scarcely necessary. But it has occurred to me that the three departments, so clearly defined, might be united under one effective board through which the entire business could be transacted. If these three interested can be grouped together, each with a member specially adapted to one of the departments named, acting separately in their collection of data, etc., but together in their final action on questions of moment, it might prove to be an economical as well as practical arrangement.

I believe that it is the experience that one board properly constituted, with business enough before it to keep its members employed and fairly paid for its services, will accomplish more than half a dozen, assembled at long intervals, possessing little authority and handicapped by the fact that their own private business must suffer while they give their time to the public, practically without compensation.

Difficulties may be found in the way of practical application of this suggestion, and I shall only be too glad to have a better way pointed out to gain the end in view.

ORGANIZING COUNTIES.—The organization of new counties is beset with many difficulties. I believe that many of these difficulties can be avoided by an intelligent amendment of the law. When fifty voters petition for the organization of a new county the governor is required to appoint commissioners. The number is too small. At least one hundred ought to be required. Again, if there is any valid reason why the voters in a new county should not choose their own commissioners, decide upon their own county seat, and generally enjoy the privileges and responsibilities of their fellow citizens in other counties I do not know what that reason is. Surely there is nothing in the Organic law to prevent. If provision were made authorizing a special election to be called on the petition of 100 persons possessing the qualifications of voters, and surround such special election with safe guards to insure a fair vote and an honest count, I believe the interests of all parties would be served. At any rate the present law demands some rational amendment. It is simply impossible for the executive to avoid committing frequent mistakes, and he is liable to commit grave errors under the statute as it now stands. I have appointed commissioners for but two counties since my term of office began. These are McIntosh and Buffalo, the latter with much doubt as to the wisdom of organization. The statute leaves the governor no discretion however when satisfied that fifty of those petitioning are voters. I have required sworn evidence that those asking for organization possessed the qualification of electors; but it still follows that fifty persons may secure the organization of a county if the law is obeyed, though 150 persons in the same county may protest against it. It is desirable that new counties be organized as fast as they possess the necessary population, but the minimum number now required should be doubled at least. Various difficulties and complications exist in some counties organized in the past year or two. In certain cases the people complain that the commissioners have not done their duty, and these cases demand attention and such remedy at your hands as can be applied and which seems advisable. In some of these cases I presume justice would be advanced by undoing the work of organization, if the power exists, and taking the task of reorganization into your own hands.

A number of local quarrels, growing out of the permanent location of county seats, have arisen, and in two instances I have been called upon for assistance to protect the officers of the law in the discharge of their duty.

THE MILITIA.—In this connection, I wish to call the attention of the Legislature to the militia laws of the territory which require amendment to make them effective and thoroughly practicable. The law requires the adjutant general to perform various duties, to keep extensive records and forward certain returns to Washington. He is the only person in any way authorized to act as the custodian of arms and accoutrements, and this authority is limited and is to be gained by inference rather than by direct grant. It is not necessary in my judgment to devise any elaborate plan for militia organization or to incur any considerable expense in the maintenance of military companies, but we cannot ask the adjutant general to contribute of his private means, as well as of his time, to carry out the requirements of the law. I therefore recommend that there be appropriated for the expenses of this office $1,000 annually. This sum to cover the necessary expense of traveling, storing and caring for arms and accoutrements, procuring and keeping the necessary records and blanks, and for such other expenses as properly and legitimately belong to his office. I recommend that a small sum be appropriated for uniforms, and for the rental of armories for each of the various volunteer companies regularly mustered into the territorial militia. It should be remembered that every able-bodied man in the territory, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, is required to be enrolled in the militia and that all such persons are subject to call in case the volunteer companies are insufficient to meet an emergency. Organized and active militia, therefore, are not only convenient in case of trouble but they save other citizens from the annoyance of a demand upon their time and services and are a protection to those subject to call as well as to those threatened with disturbances.

There are six companies in the territory that have been mustered into the service for two years. There are several more organized, one or two of which are uniformed and equipped. The others are awaiting arms and muster.

The guns at present in use by our militia were secured by my predecessor from the war department, he giving, as I understand, his personal bond for their safe keeping and return when demanded. I ask the Legislature to authorize the governor to execute a bond in the name of the territory, for such arms and any others which it may be necessary to secure, requiring him in turn to take a good and sufficient bond from each company to whom such arms shall be issued.

THE QUESTION OF ADMISSION AND DIVISION.—I suggest that steps should be taken by the present Legislature to acquaint Congress, through a memorial or otherwise, with the true sentiment of the territory regarding admission and division. The members of the General Assembly are fresh from the people. Nothing except the individual expression of the people themselves at the polls could be so reliably indicative of their sentiments and desires, as the public expression of their chosen representatives. The very wide attention which the subject of admission and division is attracting, and the fact that it has been deemed of sufficient importance for comment in the message of the governor of our neighboring State of Minnesota, who alludes with great kindness to the merits and desires of the people of the territory, induces me to refer to this question in this communication.

The territory either as a whole or divided is populous enough, even if the maximum of population hitherto required is demanded, for the formation of a state government or governments. Of course if precedents are to be ignored and new conditions attached to Dakota, we may not only be unable to get into the Union now, but may remain out indefinitely. But I believe that with a full knowledge of our population, resources and development, Congress will at least afford the territory an opportunity of joining the sisterhood of states. Whether an offer of this character, which contemplated admission without division would be accepted by the people is not for me to declare.

I do declare this, however, that it is more important that territories be divided as their people desire than that their boundaries should be fixed by strangers who are liable to misunderstand their necessities. A happy Union is made up of willing members, and contented communities make prosperous states. But nothing could be more entirely conclusive as to the desires of the people of Dakota than an opportunity to vote upon the question of admission in any form that Congress may submit it. Whether they accept or reject the proposition, the opportunity to do the one or the other should be afforded them. It is easier to decline an honor than to accept a wrong.

There were 86,703 votes cast in the territory at the recent election. There are 130 counties in the territory, but only seventy-eight were organized in time to hold an election in November. That the number of persons in Dakota possessing the qualifications of voters aggregate 100,000 will be disputed by no one, I think, familiar with the facts. That these voters are not transient persons is evidenced first, by the fact that nine months residence is required under our laws as a qualification of suffrage, and by the further fact that the returns made under the law by the school officers to the superintendent of public instruction show that in sixty-five counties out of the eighty-five organized (all that have furnished census returns), there were on the 1st day of June, 1884, 77,499 children of school age (seven to twenty years).

The presence of the family proclaims the absence of the adventurer.

The assessed value of property for the year 1884 is over eighty-four million dollars, and the receipts of the treasurers of school corporations alone amount to over one million six hundred thousand dollars. The total expenditures of the whole territory for educational purposes, beginning April 1, 1883, and ending June 30, 1884, were nearly two million dollars.

I might make comparisons which would exhibit the territory in a most favorable light beside many old and well settled states, but this need not be done. The one fact that so large a sum was expended for common schools dispels the notion that the population of the territory is in any manner fictitious or that the country is not peopled by honest voters who abide in honest homes.

The ordinance of 1787 provided that territories should be admitted as states when the population reached 60,000, and might be admitted with less, and although Dakota is not a part of the Northwest Territory therein described, yet the Congress has applied its wise and patriotic provisions to the regions afterward acquired, and has recognized the vast region which is now the West, as coming under that salutary and beneficent enactment. We have six times the population as a maximum number necessary to admission. We have 2,000 schools and a half dozen higher institutions of learning. We have permanent and costly structures erected for benevolent and penal purposes, and all built by the territory without the aid of the general Government.

It is the policy of the nation to encourage the settlement and development of the public domain. Generous laws have been enacted and many inducements given to open the wide region to civilization. I submit that this liberality of the Government in granting free homes ought not to be defeated by an illiberal exclusion of those privileges of self-government which like many others grow dearer when they are denied.

With all this it is not wise to look on admission as the ultimatum, the open gateway to everything desirable. We are liable to magnify the advantages of admission as well as the disadvantages of exclusion.

The machinery of a state government is expensive and for this reason the sentiment that a territory should be fully prepared for statehood before admission is one to be commended. The territorial tax of Dakota is light and its general expenses do not approach those of neighboring states of about the same and smaller population. For the two years ending November 30, 1884, the expenditures of the territory, including interest on the public debt, were but $597,025.01 and over $292,701.28 of this amount went toward the erection of public buildings. For the same period Colorado expended $1,158,949.14. Nevada expended during 1883, with no outlay for buildings and with a population of but 62,000, $571,931.83; and New Hampshire spent $1,016,217.44 with no expense for public improvement. The states of Minnesota, Nebraska and Kansas far exceed these amounts, showing that the inevitable result of statehood is largely increased taxation.

There are benefits to be derived from admission, however, that should also be considered. More speedy justice would be secured in our courts, the present number of judges being insufficient for the business before them. With votes in Congress, some attention would be paid to improving our waterways, so necessary to the development of the country. If precedent is followed, Dakota would be entitled, on admission, to a percentage on the sale of public land within her borders, which would largely increase her revenue. I am informed, also, that the territory suffers because of her exclusion from the Union. Those who have negotiated our bonds announce that such as have sold at par would have readily commanded a premium had Dakota been a state.

But aside from the financial advantages to accrue, there are the accompanying rights of self-government dear to every community of American citizens. Among these is the power of the people to choose their own rulers and to determine who shall administer their affairs. Such a sentiment does not grow out of any narrow-minded exclusiveness. It does not mean that all are not welcome to Dakota where all are so new and the field so large, but it is a part of that natural and independent spirit which the fathers have transmitted to us, and which can be easily understood and appreciated by the country.

I realize fully that the time has come when the people of Dakota should speak and act and decide for themselves; and I cannot but believe when the Congress of the United States fairly understand, as one who resides here must understand, the justice of heeding the appeals of this great territory, a prompt, cordial and general recognition will be extended to her. Till then, it is our part as good citizens to abide in peace and patiently await the action of the Government. I am sure however that Congress will listen with that respectful consideration which each member of the national body expects to receive for his own people, to the candid representations of this legislative assembly, speaking by the authority of the people of the territory and asking justice at the hands of the Union they honor and obey.

NECESSITY FOR ECONOMY.—It will be necessary to use care and economy in the appropriations to be made. Communities, like individuals, should retrench their expenditures when their income decreases. The times are hard, and it is feared the revenues for the present year will be materially reduced. Our public institutions must be fairly supported, of course, and if additions are found necessary, provision must be made for them; but a consideration of the universal financial distress and the unprofitable returns which have greeted the toil of all classes for the past twelve months, will show the necessity of cutting down expenses to the lowest practicable points and should make us hesitate about undertaking new and expensive ventures which it will be difficult to meet.

I need hardly remind the Legislature that we are at a critical period when harmonious, dignified and well considered legislation will do much to advance the interests of the territory. You are in the main of one political faith. It is meet that you should be one in the important work before you. The unfortunate disagreements of the past have injured the territory seriously. No member of the Legislature can fail to realize this. Our quarrels, whether of the town, the county, or the territory, seem to be taken up and magnified a hundred fold all over the land. I ask the members to use all possible forbearance in the proceedings of the session now begun to the end that the whole people may be benefitted and the whole territory exalted. You compose, probably, the last Legislature which will assemble in Dakota as at present comprised. I hope and believe you will adjourn, conscious of work well done and with the thanks and plaudits of your constituents.

GILBERT A. PERCE,
Governor of Dakota Territory.

The corrupt methods that had been employed to secure a removal of the capital at the session of the Legislature held at Yankton in 1883 had been rankling in the minds of the people who resided south of the forty-sixth parallel during the two intervening years, together with a wholesome sympathy from a large element in the Red River Valley of the North, therefore it is not surprising that one of the first measures introduced after the Legislature organized was a bill to remove the capital from Bismarck and relocate it at Pierre. The preliminary votes concerning this measure indicated that the members south of the forty-sixth parallel were united in its favor with the exception of Wagner, of Bon Homme, who through the Ordway influence had been made a trustee of the insane hospital and superintendent of the work of construction at that institution. There was no question of the success of the bill so far as the Legislature was concerned, but the governor's position was questioned, though his early utterances made soon after his appointment favored the opinion that he would not veto. The bill was introduced by Representative John A. Pickler, of Faulk County. It had about two-thirds majority on the main question of removal, but this majority was not united in favor of Pierre. Huron was also a strong candidate, as were Mitchell, Chamberlain, Redfield, Aberdeen and Watertown. Still the demand for removal was a common platform that all points agreed upon, hence the vote on the passage of the bill through the House gave to Ordway, McKenzie and the Northern Pacific interest great perturbation. The vote on final passage was twenty-seven for to twenty against. A majority of the Council also strongly favored the measure, but the bill was not acted upon until early in March, when it was passed without amendment. It is probable that motives of policy in which the success or defeat of other measures was connected was responsible for the delay.

When Governor Pierce was appointed he first came to Yankton and took the oath of office. A public reception was given him during which he made a responsive address, in which he made the following reference to the capital removal, which was then the subject of legal proceedings:

I have not discussed the legal proceedings which are pending because I must act solely upon what I find before me, upon the law as it stands, until altered by the Legislature or the courts. * * * I have no plans to push or theories to advance against any competent authority which may direct me to modify or reverse my action. I am the subject of the law. Let the law and the people who make the law express clearly what they require me to do, and I shall cheerfully obey.

Following is the text of the bill introduced by Major Pickler, of Faulk County, providing for the removal of the capital. The bill was introduced on the 17th of January, two days after the Legislature organized:

AN ACT TO RELOCATE THE CAPITAL OF THE TERRITORY OF DAKOTA

Be It Enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota:

Section 1. The seat of government of the Territory of Dakota is hereby removed from the City of Bismarck in the County of Burleigh, Territory of Dakota, and said seat of government is established and located at the City of Pierre, in the County of Hughes, in said territory.

Sec. 2. Any and all interest and title which the said territory may have acquired in any real property under or in pursuance of "An act entitled an act to provide for the location of the seat of government of the Territory of Dakota, and for the erection of public buildings thereat, approved March 8, 1883," and all interest or title whichever said territory may possess in or to any building or buildings that may have been constructed on said real property, with the appurtenances therunto belonging, is hereby released and transferred to the said City of Bismarck; provided, however, that the said City of Bismarck pay and discharge any and all liabilities or indebtedness accrued or which may hereafter accrue on account of the erection and construction of such building, such indebtedness to be paid by said city within one year.

Sec. 3. This act shall take effect and be in force on and after its passage and approval.

Councilman Kennedy, of Brown County, introduced a bill of like purport in the Council the same day, the apparent intention at the time being to remove the capital forthwith and adjourn the Legislature of the present session to such new location.

In the Council, on the 19th, Kennedy's bill was considered and passed after being amended to strike out Pierre and insert the name of the Town of Ordway, in Brown County. All the northern councilmen joined in this movement from motives that will be apparent. The vote on the passage of the bill included the eight northern councilmen and Kennedy, of Brown; Huetson, of Lincoln; Wagner, of Bon Homme, and Bowdle, of Davison.

A bill changing the name of the Town of Ordway to that of Independence, introduced by a Brown County House member, passed both houses, but was vetoed by the governor, who had apparently come to the conclusion that it was the duty of governors to stand by one another.

While a good majority of the members favored the removal of the capital as a measure of rebuke to the flagrantly dishonest scheme which had first accomplished it, it became quite evident that the question of a division of the territory and its bearing on capital location was being considered by a number of the members who had no other personal interest in the matter. If the territory was divided the location of the seat of government would go to a vote of the people, and such would probably be the case if there should be no division. That one or two states were on the eve of succeeding to the territory was as certain as the happening of any future event could be. Both proposed divisions of the territory had already secured population enough to entitle them to admission, and Mr. Springer, in the House of Representatives, was perfecting a plan that would bring into the Union four new states from the Northwest and Southwest. Under these circumstances there was less desire to make any change in the capital except that which sprung from sentimental reasons to rebuke the Ordway and McKenzie element, and to let the world know that the people of Dakota did not approve their buccaneering operations. And so far as the masses of the voters were concerned, south as well as north, the sentiment regarding the removal act of 1883 had not changed. The great majority of the voters would have applauded removal to any point as the most forcible protest that could be made against the corrupt and unlawful bargaining which resulted in its removal from Yankton.

The proceedings of this session of the Legislature centered quite largely in a sectional strife. The effort of the Mitchell members to remove the United States Court from Yankton to Mitchell was a disturbing element, and led to a combination of the Mitchell influence with the northern members, who, in return for support given to prevent capital removal, threw their votes for the removal of the court, and although the plan failed, it remained a disturbing element during the entire session.

Ex-Governor Ordway remained at Bismarck during a part of the session, ostensibly looking after his interest in the National Bank, in which he owned a controlling interest. He also figured somewhat to his discomfiture in the legislative proceedings. He seemed obnoxious to many of the members; he was treated with indifference and left the city some time before the session ended. The membership of each body had been doubled, but the sectional differences were well defined. There were two Dakotas represented. The removal of the capital having been made a question of conscience by the governor, which involved the sanctity of his oath of office, his veto did not leave an ineffaceable scar.

The veto message of Governor Pierce, explaining his reasons for declining to remove the capital, is here presented:

Executive Office, Bismarck, D. T., March 9, 1885.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

Sir—I have the honor to return herewith House Bill No. 7, which has been submitted to me for my concurrence and approval. This bill provides for the removal of the capital from the City of Bismarck to Pierre. If there are questions of equity involved in this measure I will not now discuss them. If there is something like retributive justice, growing out of past wrongs, either fancied or real, I do not here and now consider them. I pass by the question of expense and taxation in the construction of a new building at Pierre. I pass by the fact that $200,000 worth of property now belonging to the territory is donated by this act to private individuals. I pass by the allegations of impropriety and charges of corruption which have been made, to come to the consideration of the one question—"Is this measure legal?"

We have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. Section 10, of Article I, of that Constitution prohibits the passage of any law impairing the obligation of contracts. Does the arrangement consummated between the agents of the last Legislature, as well as individuals, come within the constitutional prohibition? Then none of us can break it if we would, and none would break it in violation of our oaths if we could.

In the case of Mills vs. Williams, 2 Ind. 105, Justice Pearson declared that while there are some grants conferred at the will of the Legislature and subject at all times to be modified or repealed, there are others that assume the nature of contracts and cannot be molested. "The Legislature," says the learned justice, "is not the only party interested, for although it has a public purpose to accomplish, it chooses to do it by the instrumentality of a second party. These two parties make a contract. The Legislature for and in consideration of certain labor and outlay of money confers upon the party of the second part certain powers and capacities. The expectation of benefit to the public is the moving consideration on one side; that of expected remuneration for the outlay on the other. It is a contract and therefore cannot be modified, changed or annulled without the consent of both parties."

The Legislature of 1883 directed a commission to select a site for a capital and declared that in consideration of a large amount of money to be paid and land to be given, said site should become the permanent seat of government. The wisdom of that law has been much questioned, and it is no part of my duty to modify, justify or defend it. It is sufficient to know that Bismarck was chosen; that it accepts the proposition made by the authority of the Legislature; that it paid the money demanded and contributed the land required. There is no allegation that the city has not complied with the spirit and letter of its agreement. If the contract was between individuals, no one would question the binding force of the obligation. Shall the rule be changed because one of the parties is a great territory with honor to defend and dignity to maintain? Such an interpretation, in the words of the judge above quoted, "would shock the public conscience." "There is not one law for the sovereign and another for the subject," says Judge Allen (71 N. Y. 549), "but when the sovereign engages in business enterprises and contracts with individuals, the rights and obligations of the parties must be adjudged upon the same principles as if both parties were private persons. A state may repudiate its contract; it may refuse to perform them, but its sovereign rights to destroy or impair them is limited by the Federal Constitution. It may refuse to respond in damage, and leave a claimant without any remedy, as it may refuse to pay its bonds, but the obligation remains. No legislative feat can destroy that."

(See Dunolds vs. The State, 80 N. Y. 36.) The court says: "It has been settled so as to be beyond controversy that the constitutional provision which denies to the state the power to pass laws impairing the obligations of contracts, applies to all laws passed within its limits, contracts made by the state as well as contracts made by individuals. The sovereign can construe, and has many occasions to do so. It must be governed by the same rules of common honesty which binds individuals. It is true that as a rule the Legislature is sovereign and may modify or abolish acts of its predecessors, but this rule has a plain exception, and this exception seems to be itself without an exception." "There is no modes," says the court, in a case reported in 5 McLean, 161, "by which a legislative act can be made irrevocable except that it assumes the form and substance of a contract," and commenting on this Judge Cooley says: "Legislative acts are sometimes in substance contracts between the state and party who is to derive some right under them, and they are not less under the protection of the Constitution because of having assumed that form." (See work on Constitutional Limitations, 126.) The book seems to be full of such cases, but Judge Cooley has laid down a principle in his great work on the Constitution which seems to cover the measure under consideration entirely and completely. Says the great commentator (see section 1374, Story on the Constitution): "It has been made a question whether it (the constitutional prohibition) applies to contracts and grants created directly by law or made by some authorized agent in pursuance of law. It has been suggested that in such cases it is to be deemed an act of the legislative power, and that laws are repealable by the same authority that enacted them. But it has been decided upon solemn agreement that contracts or grants made by a state are not laws within the reach of the prohibition other than the contracts and grants of private persons. The Legislature may make a contract with individuals by law, and when it is accepted it is equally under the protection of the Constitution, and it may be laid down as a general principle, that whenever a law is in its own nature a contract and absolute rights have been vested under it, a repeal of that law cannot divest those rights or annihilate or impair the title so acquired." "No court of justice in this country," continues Justice Story, "would be warranted in assuming that any State Legislature possessed the power to violate and disregard such a contract, or that such power is so repugnant that the common principles of justice and civil liberty lurked under any grant or ought to be implied from any general expression of the will of the people." (See also sections 1339, 1385, 1394 and 1395.)

In my mind there is no doubt but that this bill plainly violates the Constitution we have sworn to support. The rule may be a hard one in some cases and under some circumstances, but we did not make it and we did not enact the law which makes its application necessary. Our only duty is to take the case as it is and act with a solemn regard for our oath. But it may be asked, "Has the Legislature no power to change the location of the capital?" Undoubtedly there are certain ways by which a state can resume its sovereignty, it being in the interest of public policy that this shall be done, but it must do justice before it asks justice.

There is another phase of this question which seems important to be considered. It greatly adds to the difficulties surrounding this bill. The act provides that the property shall be disposed of, the indebtedness paid and the remaining proceeds distributed among those who have contributed to the erection of the capital building. I understood that the land on which the capitol was built was deeded to the territory by the Northern Pacific Railway Company for capitol purposes only. That a condition of the grant is that it shall be devoted solely to such purposes, or failing to be so used shall revert to the grantors. This being so the provision for distribution is of no avail for there will be nothing to distribute, the building being part of the realty passes with the grounds, and the result of this law would be to enrich the corporation which gave the land, while the men of small means who were induced to subscribe to the fund, and some of which owe a large portion of their subscription, must absolutely lose everything. In the same way the provision regarding the payment of debts contracted by the commission is idle because there will be no assets out of which those claims can be liquidated. I am sure the Legislature does not desire to place the parties who have had no lot nor part in this unfortunate conflict, at such a disadvantage. It seems to me, apart from other considerations, that this agitation is unwise and timely. Its inevitable result will be to plunge the territory into renewed and distracting litigation of which the people are tired and weary. If I rightly interpret their wishes they are saying to us: "Let us have fair laws wherever they are enacted. Let us have an honest government wherever it is administered, and in the name of a patient and long suffering people, let us have peace." I cannot approve the bill.

GILBERT A. PIERCE, GOVERNOR.

The veto of the capital bill occasioned but little surprise, though the reasons assigned were generally viewed as untenable. Freed of its verbiage, his veto asserted that the Legislature of Dakota had the lawful power and authority to repeal a provision of the organic act, which had been done by the enactment of the capital commission bill and the subsequent proceedings of the capital commission under it, and that the legislative authority over the location of that institution had been virtually exhausted by the contract made with the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. It was a humiliating position for the great territory to occupy, but there did not seem to be any remedy for it. The contract with the Northern Pacific Railroad Company for land at Bismarek and other donations had erected a perpetual bar to further capital removal even if the territorial government remained in existence for a century. In other words, the Territorial Legislature had provided a way by which a portion of the organic act had been nullified—the same organic law under which the Legislature itself was given authority to make laws, and which declared that:

At the first session of the Legislature, or as soon as it may deem expedient, the governor and Legislative Assembly shall proceed to locate the seat of government, but such place shall thereafter be subject to be changed by the governor and Legislative Assembly.

The governor had previously voluntarily and unqualifiedly declared in his public addresses that he should not oppose the wishes of the people in respect to capital location when declared by the Legislature. The veto therefore placed him in a rather equivocal position.

The general expectation of an early division of the territory, however, deprived the matter of much of its importance, and the subject was not at all prominent as an issue during the few remaining years of the territorial government. It might have been lost sight of altogether but for the persistence of the old capital commission syndicate in promoting the one state propaganda.

The more prominent enactments at this session of the Legislature were the following:

To authorize a territorial department of agriculture and relating to agricultural fairs; relating to the North Dakota Agricultural College, reviving the act of organization; to authorize the county commissioners of Minnehaha, Lake, Miner, Kingsbury, Faulk, Hyde, Richland, Beadle, Sully, Aurora and Potter counties to aid certain persons whose crops were destroyed by storms; appropriating $25,000 for the New Orleans Industrial Exposition; to regulate caucuses or primary meetings in Dakota; to provide for taking the census of the territory in 1885; providing for a state constitutional convention for that portion of the territory south of the forty-sixth parallel of latitude; to provide for the incorporation of building and loan associations; to provide for the organization of new counties; to regulate the practice of dentistry in the territory; acts to amend the laws on the subject of drainage; to amend the exemption law; to regulate the transportation of fuel on railroads; establishing territorial and county boards of health; providing for the office of commissioner of immigration; relating to the North Dakota Hospital for the Insane; authorizing the organization of county mutual insurance companies; to provide for the appointment of sheep inspectors; to provide for struck juries; declaring the 30th day of May a legal holiday (Decoration Day); to establish a board of railroad commissioners; to locate and establish a school of mines in this territory; to provide for the collection of territorial statistics; to promote the planting of forest trees on the prairies; to provide a standard of weights and measures; a memorial to Congress praying for the division of Dakota and the admission of the southern half as a state.

The following persons were appointed and confirmed to various positions connected with territorial institutions and on various boards, namely:

Territorial Institution of North Dakota, or North Dakota University—W. N. Roach and F. B. Fulton, of Grand Forks County.

Trustees North Dakota Hospital for the Insane—F. E. Jones, Lewis Lyon and M. E. Foley, of Stutsman County; V. P. Kennedy, of Brown County, and D. S. Fry, of Cass County.

North Dakota Reform School—John Haggart, of Cass County, and Judson LaMoure, of Pembina County.

Trustees Normal School at Spearfish, Lawrence County—Albert Powers, Samuel Cushman and T. M. Gregg.

Trustees School of Mines at Rapid City—Edwin Van Cise and Charles W. Mather, of Lawrence County; A. J. Simmons and John W. Nowlin, of Pennington County, and George Boland, of Custer County.

Trustees School for Deaf Mutes at Sioux Falls—Frank L. Blackman, E. P. Livingston, R. H. Runkle, S. H. Bronson, Alexander Hinckley, of Minnehaha County.

Trustees Normal School at Madison—J. A. Trow, C. B. Kennedy and Wesley Hill, for four years, and J. M. Jenks and F. B. Coffin, for two years.

Trustees Dakota Hospital for the Insane at Yankton—William Powers, Benjamin S. Williams and Robert Cox, and A. E. Cobby, of Yankton County, and Alfred A. Hutchinson, of Lincoln County.

Trustees Agricultural College at Brookings—W. H. Skinner, George Morehouse and J. P. Day, of Brookings County; Thomas Reed, of Kingsbury County, and B. R. Wagner, of Bon Homme County.

Supervisors of Census, North Dakota—A. W. Edwards, of Cass County, for North Dakota, and Robert B. Fish, of Hughes County, for South Dakota.

Railroad Commissioners—William M. Evans, of Grant County; Alexander Griggs, of Grand Forks County, and W. H. McVay, of Yankton County.

Commissioner of Immigration—Lauren Dunlap, of Beadle County.

Board of Dental Examiners—S. J. Hill, of Cass County; C. W. Stutenroth, of Codington County; W. H. Williamson, of Burleigh County; W. H. H. Brown, of Yankton County; W. B. Steele, of Hughes County.

University of Dakota at Vermillion—C. E. Prentice, A. Anderson, of Clay County; N. J. Wallace, L. P. Sabin, of Union County, and A. Sherman, of Lincoln County.

Territorial Board of Health—President, Henry C. Reno, of Richland County; vice president, C. J. Cummings, of McCook County; superintendent, E. M. Darrow, of Cass County.

An act authorizing the people of the southern half of the Territory of Dakota to hold a convention and frame a constitution and state government for that part of the territory south of the forty-sixth parallel was passed, in response to a memorial numerously signed, from citizens of the territory. Both the memorial and constitutional convention act will be found in the chapters on statehood for the year 1885.

Next in importance to the constitutional convention bill was a bill providing for the appointment of three railroad commissioners, which would enable the territory to have a voice in certain features of the rapidly growing railway traffic. The rights of the people and the rights of the railroads in their business and lawful relation were but dimly understood at the time, but it was apparent that there were burdens imposed on the people that called for relief. The Farmers' Alliance doubtless initiated the movement for state supervision of the railways and continued to foster it until the older political parties found it expedient to favor reforms in the field of transportation. The subject grew larger and somewhat more intricate under successive legislative measures, and promises to occupy a debatable position in the industrial welfare of the territory, state and nation for an indefinite period; and in the opinion of many students of political economy, can never be harmoniously settled until the government acquires possession of the transportation lines and operates them on a cost basis.

The iniquities that had grown up under the Ordway administration in the organization of new counties called for legislative relief, though the present administration had shown no inclination to pattern after its predecessor. A new law was enacted requiring the governor, when properly petitioned by 150 voters of an unorganized county, to issue a proclamation calling an election for county officers and the temporary location of the county seat. Great abuses in the form of law are often agents of reform, and were found illustrated in this case.

This Legislature initiated the legislation having to do with the law's regard for the health of the people. Territorial and county boards of health were provided for, the pure-food enactments made their initial appearance.

Insurance corporations, territorial and county, were provided for. Decoration Day was made a legal holiday at this session. A militia law with an annual salary of $1,000 for the adjutant-general was enacted. The law establishing the School of Mines at Rapid City was passed, and $10,000 of territorial bonds authorized for defraying the cost of buildings. A law for the collection of statistics by the assessors and other public officers was enacted. A bill conferring the right of suffrage upon the female population above the age of twenty-one years was passed, but the governor was able to defeat it by a veto. There was a large volume of county legislation, city and school district incorporations, and acts authorizing the issue of bonds. There were 216 special and private acts passed. It was a busy session, notwithstanding the sectional and individual strife.

The Mitchell councilman, Mr. Bowdle, labored the entire session, and made many combinations with the north to secure the removal of the United States Court to that point from Yankton. In this struggle the merits of the respective points did not exert any influence of importance, but success perched upon the banner of the councilman who could form the strongest combination. Hon. John R. Gamble was the councilman from Yankton.

Concerning the woman suffrage bill vetoed by the governor, the objections urged by the executive were not based on opposition to the main principle, though his message has the flavor of opposition on general grounds, but he found enough defects in the framing of the bill to condemn it. As there had been no demand for the measure, no valid test to show that the women wanted it or the sentiment of the territory favored it, and considering also the near approach of statehood and probable division of the territory, his excellency was able to pile up quite a formidable array of objections, sufficient to deter the legislators from making any unusual effort to pass it over his veto. His regard for the sentiment of the people as to this measure and his disregard of the same sentiment as expressed in the capital removal bill were in striking and questionable contrast.

Regarding a leading attorney of the territory, and a comparatively young man who was then coming into prominence as one of the leaders in public affairs, and who represented the Third Legislative District in the Council, the Journal of Bismarck, near the close of the session, said of him:

As chairman of the Judiciary Committee Mr. Gamble has had most frequent occasions to take the floor in explanation of measures reported from his committee. In this important line of legislative work he has been prominent in the Council and a working member of great value. On occasions he has been sharply opposed on legal propositions by other lawyers of the Council, but his presentations of the features and effects of bills which had been considered by his committee have not been questioned, and they have greatly assisted in expediting business, having been always concise but comprehensive and clear. Among important acts of the session, promising great benefit to the territory, is the enactment of an improved general law for the organization of new counties, which may be credited to Mr. Gamble. The summary rejection of the House bill for removing the United States Court from Yankton was a legislative triumph for Mr. Gamble, and was in good part due to the esteem in which he is personally held by his associates in the Council.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE—PIERCE VETO

Governor Pierce vetoed the bill admitting women to the privileged class of voters in Dakota Territory, which had been passed by the Legislature. His reasons therefor are fully set forth in the message following:

Executive Office, Bismarck, D. T., March 13, 1885.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

I hereby return House File No. 71 with my objections to its becoming a law. A measure of this kind demands candid and careful consideration both because of its importance and because of the acknowledged sincerity and high character of those who favor it. There are certain reasons, however, why I cannot approve such a measure at this time, and other reasons why I cannot approve this particular bill. It is desirable, in my judgment, that we act, so far as possible, as if we were governed, restrained and guided by a constitution adopted by ourselves. If we had a constitution modeled after the states, an extraordinary proposition like this would be submitted to the people. If Congress thinks woman suffrage wise it has the power to establish it. It is unfair to shift the responsibility on the territory and then hold them responsible for alleged imprudent legislation. I am assured the enactment of this law will delay our claims to statehood, and also in so critical a period it is better that no pretext whatever be given for such postponement. It is doubted by many if a majority of the women of Dakota want the franchise. The point is made, and a very good one, that the fact that one woman does not want a right is not a justifiable reason for refusing it to another who does, yet it must not be forgotten that the enfranchisement of woman confers not only a privilege but a grave burden and responsibility.

We condemn the man who neglects to vote as recreant to his duty. If women are enfranchised the right conferred becomes an obligation as imperative to them as to men, as on those who oppose as on those who favor the act. The women of Dakota should have a voice in determining whether they should assume this burden or not. So much for the general proposition.

There are two other features of this bill which I can scarcely think satisfactory to the advocates of woman suffrage themselves. I am satisfied they should appear in a measure claiming to advance the rights of woman. If the vote of a woman is needed anywhere it is in our cities. In many existing city charters a distinct clause appears providing that males alone shall possess the qualifications of electors. In this bill the word "male" is stricken out of one chapter of the code, leaving the disability still standing against hundreds of women equally entitled to recognition. The women of Sioux Falls, the women of Mitchell, the women of Brookings, the women of Chamberlain, of Watertown, and a great many of the most important cities of Southern Dakota would be disqualified from voting under these special enactments, even though this bill became a law at this very session. Charters have been created with that provision retained, and they would make this bill abortive and largely inoperative. A still more objectionable feature, and one deliberately inserted, is the clause debarring women from the right to hold office. If the word "male" had been stricken out of the code, and no other action taken, they would have been eligible, and I believe there is a wide feeling that many offices, particularly those connected with penal and benevolent institutions, could be most appropriately filled with women, but this clause, practically forbids their appointment. If women are good enough to vote they are good enough to be voted for. If they are qualified to choose officials, they are qualified to be chosen.

I don't say that I would approve this measure were it otherwise worded, but I certainly would not endorse a bill which thus keeps the word of promise to the ear and breaks it to the hope. Which deliberately and avowedly debars and disqualifies women while assuming to exalt and honor them.

These objections are apart from the abstract right of women to the ballot, but they show how necessary it is to approach such a subject with deliberation. If women are to be enfranchised, let it be done, not as a thirty days' wonder, but as a merited reform resulting from mature reflection, approved by the public conscience, and sanctioned by the enlightened judgment of the people.

GILBERT A. PILGEL, GOVERNOR.

GROVER CLEVELAND, PRESIDENT

The change which occurred in the passing out of the old and the coming in of a new President, on the 4th of March, 1885, was a different change from any the republican party and the democratic party of Dakota had known. The territory from its birth had been under a republican administration even the episode of Johnson's term had disturbed this situation very slightly. In 1885 a real democrat came into the presidency in the person of Grover Cleveland, of New York, who proved to be an able, fearless and independent man, and easily was accorded the leadership in his party. He had convictions regarding his duty that were not disturbed by the clamor of multitudes of his party people who desired official favors at his hands quite early after he had assumed the duties of President, but it was soon discovered that he did not regard the "spoils of office" the most important of the fruits of the victory his party had won. He was not disposed to make wholesale removals of the republicans who were holding the subordinate offices throughout the country, but let it be known that all worthy officers should continue until their commissions expired. This was not in deference to public sentiment, for public sentiment among the great non-office-holding class rather favored a change. The republicans who held on to their offices were looked upon with a degree of suspicion by their fellow republicans, and were regarded as usurpers by the democrats. Regarding the territories, the President let it be known at an early day that all appointments to territorial offices would be made from the territory from residents of the territories. This was most encouraging to a number of democrats in Dakota, for though they had uniformly been in a minority in territorial contests, there were enough of them, as was early apparent, to fill all the Federal positions and have some left over, who, to use a Jacksonian phrase, "fell outside the breastworks." But Mr. Cleveland may not have intended this declaration to bind him in every instance, or he may have found it expedient to modify it.

A delegation of prominent men, connected officially or by leadership in the democratic parties of all the territories except New Mexico, met by agreement at Washington on the 14th of March, ten days after Mr. Cleveland had been inaugurated, and made a formal call upon the President, for the purpose of laying before him their views regarding territorial government. The persons composing the delegation were M. H. Day, member from Dakota of the Democratic National Committee; John Hailey, of Idaho; Judge J. A. Kuhn, of Washington Territory; Delegate to Congress Toole, of Montana; Judge Mead, of Arizona; Judge Merritt, of Utah, and J. W. McCormack, of Montana. All were democratic national committeemen, except Delegate Toole. Mr. Hailey acted as speaker for the delegation, and after the usual formalities of introduction, the speaker, in appropriate words, stated to the President that in addition to a desire to pay their respects to the chief magistrate, they had come to learn what the administration was going to do in territorial affairs.

Mr. Cleveland replied briefly but clearly that he should appoint to territorial offices men from the territories. He also clearly pledged himself to listen to the recommendation of democrats within the territories, and not be decided in his choice of men for governors by outside pressure. At this time there was an almost unanimous sentiment among the democrats of Dakota, and it was largely shared in by republicans, that Capt. Frank M. Ziebach, of Bon Homme County, should receive the appointment of governor, and the democratic hosts were greatly encouraged with the statement made by the President.

President Cleveland did not call an extra session of Congress following his inauguration, therefore Washington was largely relieved of the Dakotan lobbyists with their demand for division and admission, though their places were abundantly supplied by democratic office-seekers, but the statehood and division questions were allowed no rest in Dakota. The sentiment of Northern Dakota regarding division had apparently suffered some modification since the capital was transferred to Bismarck, though the Red River Valley region seemed to defend it as stoutly as ever.

The democrats of the territory had also become infected to some extent with a sentiment of opposition to any change in the existing order, and while Mr. Cleveland had given out no intimation of his views on the Dakota questions, there was an organized movement made to discourage the democrats from any participation in the primary caucuses and elections called for the year 1885 to frame a state constitution. There was in view all the Federal and territorial offices to be appointed by the President and governor, and the division and statehood movements were viewed as inimical to the interests of the democratic party. This policy found expression in formal publications by democratic committeemen advising the democrats to abstain from participation in the meetings or election. The defection of many of the democrats and the antagonism of the element that had been briefly named the Ordway crowd was responsible for the light vote cast at the elections held during the summer and fall. There was, however, no change in the attitude of the recognized leaders of the democratic party in the territory. Bartlett Tripp, Captain Ziebach and National Committeeman M. H. Day continued their public advocacy of division and statehood.

The opinion governing many leading democrats who now opposed the statehood plan appeared to be connected not so much with the welfare of the people of the territory, but rather with the prosperity of the democratic party, national as well as territorial, and singularly enough this new attitude joined them with the zealous efforts ex-Governor Ordway was making in Washington to defeat both division and statehood. And it will be observed that thereafter Mr. Ordway made some use of his allies from the territory in delaying and obstructing congressional action. In line with this plan the Democratic Territorial Committee was called together on two or three occasions to give formal expression to the sentiment. This committee was divided, but the chairman was a zealous promoter of the new idea, and an Ordway man. In some instances the county committees gave formal public notice that the "democratic party will in no manner participate in the election of delegates to the constitutional convention." And while these incidents show a disposition on the part of many of the democrats to oppose statehood, they did not represent the majority democratic sentiment. The democrats were broken up into factions, just as the republicans were. And while they were loyal supporters of Mr. Cleveland and his policies, in territorial matters many of them continued to support the division and admission plans which they had espoused as a party prior to the coming into power of the democratic administration.

The situation in Dakota, taken in connection with the divided party control in Congress (the republicans having a majority in the Senate and the democrats controlling the House), suggested the importance of nonpartisan action in the political construction of the membership of the constitutional convention. A convention composed of members of both parties was the desire of the friends of the constitutional movement.

The division of the territory, as the reader has seen, had been a ruling purpose with the people, openly expressed and advocated, regardless of party predilections, as early as 1870, and the first expression of the settlers of the northern section, where settlement began in earnest in 1872-73, was a demand that the territory be divided. No one suggested that this purpose might ever be opposed within the territory, and no opposition to it appeared until the Hon. N. G. Ordway was appointed governor in 1880.

The population of the territory was gradually mounting up to the half million mark. The official report of the special census taken by order of Congress in 1885 by Col. A. W. Edwards, of Fargo, gave North Dakota a population of 152,- 199, and Southern Dakota 261,000—a total of 413,199. There were ten small districts in Southern Dakota from which no returns were received. These figures gave to each part of the territory sufficient population to entitle them to statehood, the north to have one member of Congress and the south two members.

There was no longer a presidential election pending, and many of the democratic congressmen as well as republicans were desirous of giving Dakota her rights as soon as it could be accomplished. All parties ostensibly recognized it as a duty to lay aside partisanship and clothe their fellow citizens of the great territory with the sovereignty of statehood, hence considerable activity will be observed in the proceedings of the House regarding Dakota measures during the first year of Mr. Cleveland's administration, with Hon. William Springer, of Illinois, a democratic leader of the House and chairman of the Committee on Territories, taking a conspicuous and favorable part. What to do with Dakota? had become the most important question before Congress and before the country, and the only question, and the vital one, to be answered, was whether to make of it one state or two. In the solution of this problem both partisanship and sectionalism were influential factors. The conscience of Congress was aroused as it seldom is because of the apprehension that a great injustice was being done the nearly half a million American citizens in Dakota who were being wrongfully withheld from participation in the national Government. The politician had been subordinated to the patriot. It was something like that touch of nature that makes the whole world kin.

The surprising gain Dakota had made in population, as shown by the census above quoted, settled the matter of the admission of the state. The only question that remained at all doubtful was that of dividing the territory, and whether the democrats would oppose it.

The republicans of the Senate, led by Senator Harrison, of Indiana, were now strongly in favor of division, and would openly oppose the admission of the territory as one state. This position had also been taken by a number of the influential journals, therefore it began to appear that Dakota must accept division and the admission of two states and no territory. This was the situation when Congress convened the first Monday in December, 1885. Dakota was the leading topic before that body.

The Sioux Falls constitution, which had been framed and adopted during the year under the authority of the Territorial Legislature, though it had been inaugurated under circumstances that indicated a weakening of the division sentiment, proved to be one of the strongest arguments before Congress, reaching the "fair play" sense of members without regard to party. More encouragement for division appeared to come from outside Dakota; the result of the Sioux Falls convention, with the unobjectionable and able state constitution it had produced, and which gave Dakota an uplift in popular estimation the entire country over.

LOUIS K. CHURCH APPOINTED JUDGE

Louis Kossuth Church was appointed associate justice of the Supreme Court of Dakota Territory, to succeed Judge Seward Smith, of the Fifth, or Huron District, in November. Judge Smith had not expected him, and had appointed a term of court at Milbank, for which point he left about a half hour after the arrival of his successor. Judge Church came from Hicksville, Long Island, New York, where he had been engaged in the practice of law. He distinguished himself as a member of the New York Legislature, while Grover Cleveland was governor, by his opposition to all jobs, thus attracting Cleveland's favorable attention because of his honest devotion to the public service. Mr. Cleveland wished evidently that this young attorney was a citizen of Dakota, and he possibly concluded that it would not be a serious breach of his declaration to appoint him to a judgeship in the great territory that was at the time attracting the world's attention.

Mr. Smith bore an irreproachable character and a reputation for learning and ability that had earned for him the confidence of the people of his district. Mr. Cleveland was a civil service reformer, and cherished the honor of doing something to restore the practice in vogue in the early days of the republic when Federal servants were allowed to retain their places during good behavior, and men held office for a quarter of a century or more without thought of being removed because of their political party associations. While entertaining such unselfish and patriotic sentiments, the President's career disclosed a purpose to build up a substantial foundation for the new system by placing a major portion of the subordinate offices of the country in possession of the democrats.

Judge Church was born in New York in 1846. His education was received at Claverick Institute, near Hudson, and the Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn. He studied law with Judge Nathan B. Morse, later a judge of the State Supreme Court. The father of Judge Church was a lawyer. For three successive terms Judge Church had represented his district in the General Assembly of the state, and was a member at the time of his judicial appointment. Theodore Roosevelt was a member at the same time, and the twain worked in unison for reform.

Judge Smith was said to have been removed on charges other than political, one of which charges being that he was lazy and held court while abed. The foundation of this charge was explained by the judge. His district included twenty-three of the forty-eight counties south of the forty-sixth parallel, and contained 150,000 people. Judge Smith found the duties so pressing on his circuit that he could not attend to them by daylight, and was obliged to hear motions in his lodgings, when he was so nearly exhausted that he would lie down on a bed or lounge while the attorneys were speaking. There is no doubt that this condition existed in nearly all the judicial districts, and Congress at the current session added three additional districts and judges to the Supreme bench. Laziness may have been assigned as the reason for Smith's removal, but the fact was that many of the republican hold-over officials were tardy about resigning, which was expected after a reasonable time had elapsed. Secretary Teller tarried too long and was "elbowed out" for that reason. Democrats average up well with the rest of mankind, but they can't stand quietly and patiently by and see a republican holding office under a democratic administration.

In the meantime the President had been issuing commissions to his new appointees in Dakota as the terms of the former occupants expired, and in some cases of extreme tardiness he hastened the expiration by a few months.

W. B. McConnell, of Fargo, was appointed to succeed Judge Sanford A. Hudson, of the First Judicial District, in May, 1885. McConnell had resided at Fargo five years and was engaged in the practice of law. He removed from Indiana to Fargo, and had been an attorney of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company.

Maris Taylor, of Yankton, was appointed surveyor general about the same time, to succeed Cortez Fessenden, formerly of Michigan.

John E. Carland, of Bismarck, was appointed United States attorney, to succeed Hugh J. Campbell. Campbell had sent his resignation some time before. Carland was a son of Major Carland, stationed at Fort Abraham Lincoln.

E. W. Miller, a prominent Elk Point attorney, was appointed receiver of the Huron Land Office, relieving George B. Armstrong, and John S. McFarland was appointed register, to succeed Major Lowery.

In December the President appointed William W. Anderson, of Bardstown, Ky., Indian agent at Crow Creek and Lower Brule, Dak., vice John G. Gassman. Gassman had been an efficient, honest, but somewhat unpopular, as agent among the whites of the country involved in the dispute over the rights of the Indians. Gassman understood this unfriendly sentiment, but was not disturbed by it; he said that he had tried to be an agent of the Indians, not of the whites. About the same time C. E. McChesney, of Brown County, Dak., was appointed agent at Cheyenne agency. Israel Greene, of Davison County, agent at Sisseton; J. W. C. Ramie, agent at Devil's Lake, and James McLaughlin, agent at Standing Rock. J. S. McFarland, of Illinois, was appointed register of the Huron Land Office.

Mark W. Sheafe, of Elk Point, was appointed receiver of the Watertown Land Office, to succeed Charles G. Williams. Downer T. Bramble, of Yankton, was appointed register of the Watertown Land Office, to succeed L. D. F. Poore.

The Legislature of 1885 enacted a law establishing a railroad commission, and Governor Pierce appointed Capt. William M. Evans, of the Black Hills; W. H. McVay, of Yankton, and Alexander Griggs, of Grand Forks, as commissioners. Isaac E. West, of Bismarek, was appointed secretary.

Nathaniel T. Harris, of Vicksburg, Miss., was appointed register of the land office at Aberdeen, vice Charles T. McCoy. Harris was not a native southerner. He was a son-in-law of Judge Maccalister, of Iowa, formerly of the Court of Claims. Harris was a man of prominence in the democratic party south, and had been an unsuccessful candidate for Congress.

There was, comparatively, a large element of the republican party that had openly supported Mr. Cleveland for President, who were nicknamed "mugwumps," and it was not doubted that he owed his success to this element. New York cast the vote which decided the contest with Blaine, and gave Mr. Cleveland less than fifteen hundred majority, and he received all the republican votes that such leaders as Henry Ward Beecher and Harper's Weekly, edited by George William Curtis, could carry with them. None of the mugwump element, however, made an open fight in Dakota.

The political situation in Dakota was a novel one. The territory was overwhelmingly republican. A clause in the organic act gave to the governor of the territory the authority to appoint all officers of the territory which the laws of the territory established, and this number amounted to several score at the time Mr. Cleveland assumed the presidency, and indirectly but surely placed it in the power of the President to influence the appointment of this numerous official body. Governor Pierce's appointments, as a rule, were quite satisfactory to the people, who, anticipating the early admission of at least the southern half of the Dakota empire as a state, gave the matter little attention.

Hon. E. C. Caldwell, of Minnehaha County, was appointed territorial auditor in place of George L. Ordway. This was among the early acts of Pierce's administration, and accorded with public sentiment. J. W. Raymond, of Bismarek, was appointed territorial treasurer to succeed Mr. W. H. McVay, of Yankton, whose private business required the greater part of his attention at Yankton, where he resided. Mr. McVay, however, was given a place on the first board of railway commissioners, which had been authorized by the laws of 1885.

A change in the United States marshalship for the District of Dakota was made by President Cleveland in October, 1885, and Daniel W. Maratta, of Bismarek, was appointed to succeed Gen. Harrison Allen, of Fargo. Captain Maratta was connected with the steamboat interests of the Missouri River as the active representative of the Coulson line, which operated a fleet of the finest freight and passenger boats on the river. Maratta was a native of Ireland, but came to this country at an early age, and had become thoroughly Americanized and also westernized by a residence at Bismarek beginning in 1872, when that point was known as Edwinton, and the railroad had not reached it. Captain Maratta was forty-eight years of age, and in the prime of an active and busy life. He had for many years been identified prominently with the transportation business of the Missouri, and also with the energetic life of Bismarek. His appointment to the marshalship was not due to the leaders of the democratic party of Dakota, but to the personal recommendation of Gov. Samuel J. Tilden, of New York, an old personal friend, and also to his own excellent qualifications and character. Maratta's friends and long-time acquaintances predicted for him a successful administration of the office. He proved to be one of the best of President Cleveland's Dakota appointments. The contest for the appointment for this office had been between two of the eminent democrats and excellent citizens of Dakota, Capt. Dan Maratta, of Bismarck, and Hon. M. L. McCormack, of Grand Forks. Maratta won and McCormack was the first to congratulate him after his appointment.

Hon. M. L. McCormack was appointed secretary of the territory, to succeed Hon. James H. Teller, republican, November 27, 1885. There were no charges against Mr. Teller, a fact of which he was assured in a letter from the Secretary of the Interior. Michael L. McCormack was born in Susquehanna County, Pennsylvania, November 26, 1847, and located in Grand Forks in the spring of 1871. He was captain of the steambot Alpha, of the Red River Transportation Company, when all the freight and passenger business for that portion of the northwest country was transported down the Red River from Moorhead and Fargo. In 1873 Captain McCormack went into the mercantile business, under the firm name of Griggs, Walsh & Co., at Grand Forks, which firm, after doing a successful and prosperous business, sold in 1879 to Lyons & Doheny. In 1882 the Grand Forks Roller Mill Company was organized, of which Captain McCormack was made president and general manager, he owning a large share of the stock. He was president of the Grand Forks National Bank, organized in 1884, and was the nominee for Congress on the democratic ticket in 1880. The appointment of Mr. McCormack met the approval of the people, though he succeeded one of the ablest and most efficient officers Dakota had ever been favored with in any capacity.

Hon. Bartlett Tripp, of Yankton, was appointed chief justice of the Supreme Court of Dakota Territory on Monday, November 23, 1885. He succeeded Judge Edgerton, who had resigned. Mr. Tripp was a Dakota pioneer, coming to the territory first in 1861 with an elder brother, also a lawyer and an Iowa pioneer of the early '50s. A later visit resulted in Mr. Bartlett Tripp's becoming a permanent settler and citizen in 1869.

Mr. Tripp was a democrat and had nearly landed the delegateship to Congress in 1878, when he ran against Judge Bennett, and came nearer a victory than any democrat that ever tackled the republicans, except Todd, in 1862, and Armstrong, in 1870-72, who had the advantage of a divided republican party. His appointment as chief justice was greeted with honest satisfaction by the people; in truth, there was little partisan rejoicing over it, but there was an unanimous and hearty approval of it.

At this time, as has been noted, there was manifested a disposition on the part of some of the democratic leaders of the territory to oppose the division of the territory. This was directly in conflict with the earlier and for all past time position of the democrats, and Mr. Tripp had been largely instrumental in the promotion of every step that had been taken to promote division and statehood, and he still adhered to his position, in which he was ably sustained by Ziebach, Day and others. But there was considerable democratic opposition which had become mixed in with the Ordway and McKenzie influence in favor of one state, and the democratic ingredient in the combination was not pressing even one state—they appeared quite well satisfied with the status in quo, so long as the democrats held the reins of government.

About this time a very judiciously worded circular letter was issued by a number of democrats, none of whom were politicians, and appeared to have been actuated by the most commendable and patriotic motives, showing that Mr. Tripp and his party friends who were with him on the division and statehood questions, had the support of much of the substantial strength of that party. This circular letter appears to have been prepared in Sanborn County, and was addressed to members of Congress of the democratic party, and was signed by numerous democratic citizens, led by George W. Corkings, president of the Sanborn County Bank, at Woonsocket, Capt. G. S. Nave, a leading business man, and scores of others. We give the letter in full:

Woonsocket, Dakota Territory, November 20, 1885.

Dear Sir:—As citizens of Dakota and members of the democratic party, we would call your attention to a bill which will doubtless be presented to your next honorable session of Congress, for the division of this territory on the forty-sixth parallel, and the admission of the south half as a state. It is needless to state to you that our population is over a quarter of a million, or the many reasons why it is due to the citizens of Dakota that favorable legislation on this question should be given us. The fact that a few of our party are opposed both to division and admission is accounted for by the reason that nearly every one of them is a candidate for some political favor under the present administration. We, as voters of the party protest against the impression which is being made that as a party the democrats in the territory are opposed to division and admission. The facts are indisputable, that of the rank and file of the party, three-fourths at least are favorable to the passage of a bill by Congress to divide the territory on the forty-sixth parallel, and for the admission of the south half. Believing that our party in Congress will rise above partisan motives and do justice to the whole, we ask your support of this measure. We believe that it will not only be doing by us that which we are entitled to, but will also be of great advantage to our party in this territory or state in the future.

It is a fact that to-day in South Dakota, on any national issue, the parties are much more evenly divided than is generally supposed, and that hundreds of democrats voted at the late election with the republicans, for the reason that we had no democratic ticket in the field, and that they were favorable to the admission of South Dakota.

We further believe that within the next four years, if we are admitted under a democratic administration, South Dakota will go democratic. We, the representative men of the party in this territory, having invested our means here with full faith in its bright future, believe our interests should have consideration. Eastern capitalists look with much disfavor on investments here, particularly on account of our territorial government. This, with numerous other good reasons well known to you, is why we ask that you give this question your honorable consideration.

This Sanborn County circular was sent direct to congressman by citizens who had an acquaintance with the official, and could give the best references back in the states from whence they came. Hundreds and possibly thousands were sent from all parts of the territory, in a quiet businesslike way. It will be observed that at the next session and following session there was encouraging activity among the democratic congressmen in the matter of Dakota's division, and particularly its statehood.

Mr. Springer, the leader, set to work to induce a democratic territory to prepare for admission as an offset to Dakota's staunch republicanism. There were Montana and New Mexico that were presumed to favor the democratic side, and the plan to admit more than one state became plainly manifest before the session was half concluded. Mr. Springer and his compeers in Congress could have facilitated the passage of bills at an earlier day, but the existing situation, viewed from a party standpoint, with the democrats enjoying all the patronage of the great territory, as well as national, did not suggest any necessity for undue haste. It would seem to have been a part of Mr. Springer's wise plan to make a conspicuous parade of his industry in the matter, having due regard to a very moderate progress, which was unavoidably impeded by obstacles that required time to surmount. But there was no backward step.

Delegate Gifford was quite sanguine, before the session opened, that he would be able to get his measures through providing for admission and division. He said:

It will require only twenty-one of the forty-two democratic majority to carry my bill through. I think I can count twenty-five democratic congressmen, at least, whom I am sure are interested enough in the general welfare of the country to turn aside from the path of partisanship and vote to give the citizens of Dakota their rights.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT A DAKOTA LIVE STOCK GROWER

Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, of New York, visited Dakota in 1883, early in the fall, with the purpose of taking part in hunting the buffalo. He was fond of the chase, and found the exercise a promoter of health. He came into the territory as a passenger on the Northern Pacific, and finally located his hunting camp on the eastern edge of the bison range in the Little Missouri Valley, in Billings County. He had never before engaged in this exciting and exhilarating sport, but he greatly enjoyed it, being an expert with the rifle, and during his first hunt was able to bring down one of the finest in the herd, which in fair numbers had their feeding grounds in the northwest portion of the territory and Montana adjoining.

At that time the section of Dakota in which Mr. Roosevelt was a sojourner was thinly populated, and its few scattered ranches were those of the live-stock men who fattened their animals on the nutritious buffalo grass which covered the plains, and Mr. Roosevelt, perceiving that the growing of cattle there was a profitable industry, was induced to engage in it. The result was that he bought out a company already established, employed some experienced and trustworthy overseers, and became a live-stock man. He did not remain in the territory during the winter, but left his interest in charge of his overseers; and during 1883 and for two seasons following, added largely to his herd, until it numbered about three thousand head, which he divided into two herds, and established a separate ranch some thirty miles below the first, which was near Medora, the postoffice on the Northern Pacific crossing of the Little Missouri.

During his subsequent several visits to his ranches, which usually covered several months, he took an active part in the work of the employes, thus becoming familiar with all the details of the business. He also gave valuable assistance to the law and order element of the country, was widely known and highly regarded. He did much by example and precept that was of permanent benefit to the morals of the inhabitants of a wide scope of Dakota and Montana. No one did more. It was during this time that he became acquainted with Seth Bullock, of Lawrence County, who was also a live-stock grower, and owned a ranch on the Belle Fourche, eighty miles distant from the Roosevelt ranches; but the twain exchanged occasional visits. The acquaintance ripened into a friendship that was never broken, and gave birth to incidents of considerable importance to Dakota.

In 1885 Dakota had passed through the first session of the Legislature held at Bismarck, which had been fruitful of much useful and commendable legislation, and the future famous American, from his ranch in the Bad Lands, wrote as follows to the Century Magazine:

I have had opportunity of knowing something about the workings of but few of our State Legislatures. From what I have seen and heard, I should say that New York stands about on a par with those of Pennsylvania, Maryland and Illinois; above that of Louisiana, and below those of Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Dakota, as well as below the National Legislature at Washington.

Mr. Roosevelt experienced almost every phase of frontier life during his long sojourn in Dakota, and one of these being strikingly characteristic of the man is here given in his own language. He had previously commented upon the free and easy custom of the Indians and an occasional frontiersman, in treating the ownership of personal property, particularly horses and cattle, and then proceeds:

On the other hand, parties of savage young bucks would treat lonely settlers just as badly, and in addition sometimes murder them. Such a party was generally composed of young fellows burning to distinguish themselves. Some one of their number would have obtained a pass from the Indian agent, allowing him to travel off the reservation, which pass would be flourished whenever their action was questioned by bodies of whites of equal strength. I once had a trifling encounter with such a band. I was making my way along the edge of the bad lands, northward from my lower ranch, and was just crossing a plateau when five Indians rode up over the further rim. The instant they saw me they whipped out their guns and raced full speed at me, yelling and flogging their horses. I was on a favorite horse, Manitou, who was a wise old fellow, with nerves not to be shaken by anything. I at once leaped off him and stood with my rifle ready.

It was possible that the Indians were merely making a bluff and intended no mischief. But I did not like their actions, and I thought it likely that if I allowed them to get hold of me they would at least take my horse and rifle and possibly kill me. So I waited until they were a hundred yards off and then drew a bead on the first Indian and, for the matter of that, white men—do not like to ride in on a man who is cool and means shooting, and in a twinkling every man was lying over the side of his horse, and all five had turned and were galloping backwards, having altered their course as quickly as so many teal ducks.

After this one of them made the peace sign, with his blanket first, and then, as he rode toward me, with his open hand. I halted him at a fair distance and asked him what he wanted. He exclaimed, "How! Me good Injun, me good Injun," and tried to show me the dirty piece of paper on which his agency pass was written. I told him with sincerity that I was glad that he was a good Indian, but that he must not come any closer. He then asked for sugar and tobacco. I told him I had none. Another Indian began slowly drifting toward me in spite of my calling out to keep back, so I once more aimed with my rifle, whereupon both Indians slipped to the other side of their horses and galloped off, with oaths that did credit to at least one side of their acquaintance with English. I now mounted and pushed over the plateau on to the open prairie. In those days an Indian, although not as good a shot as a white man, was infinitely better at crawling under and taking advantage of cover; and the worst thing a white man could do was to get into cover, whereas out in the open if he kept his head he had a good chance of standing off even half a dozen assailants. The Indians accompanied me for a couple of miles. Then I reached the open prairie, and mounting Manitou, resumed my northward ride, not being further molested.

In 1896 Mr. Roosevelt sold his cattle and ranches and retired from the plains, thereafter devoting his time to national affairs.

DEMOCRATIC CONVENTIONS

The democrats held no state convention in 1885, therefore had no ticket in the field at election time. In addition to the opposition of the Democratic Central Committee, as indicated at the Mitchell meeting, a democratic convention was held at Huron at the time of the holding of the Republican State Convention, which had been called by the Democratic Central Committee of Beadle County. The attendance was quite general. It was a mass convention. R. S. Haliday, of Spink, was elected chairman; Major Howe, of Brown, secretary. Seats were given to all the delegates present.

A motion was made by Delegate Brown, of Beadle, to indorse the recommendation of the Territorial Constitutional Committee regarding voting at the constitutional election. Two hours' debate followed, and the motion was finally voted down.

The Resolutions committee offered the following resolutions, which were adopted:

1. That it is the duty of democrats to oppose the partisan constitution framed at Sioux Falls, to be submitted to a vote of the people of Dakota, November 3d, after the refusal of the republican party to incorporate minority representation into the body of the constitution, and because the republicans threaten to defeat minority representation at the polls.
2. That we consider it the duty of every democrat in South Dakota to vote for minority representation and against the said constitution.

A committee of five, consisting of C. C. Frost, of Beadle, J. W. Hatch of Potter, George Henry of Brookings, Major Howe of Brown and P. S. Runkle of McCook, was appointed to organize and secure as full a democratic vote as possible in opposition to the constitution.

[The constitutional convention of 1885, and in fact all the conventions having to do with the state movement, including conventions that nominated the state ticket, will be found in the chapters giving an account of the prolonged effort to secure admission to the Union.]

DAKOTA DEMOCRATS NOT UNITED

As a rule the democrats as well as the republicans had supported the movement in the territory which favored its division on the forty-sixth parallel, and the admission of the southern half into the Union as a state. This was the desire of the people generally regardless of party and was based on the general belief that the territory was too large and unwieldy for one government, that the interests of the two sections were diverse and would always remain so, which would entail perpetual wrangling and hostility between the sections in its Legislature, its conventions of whatever kind, and would be a continual source of intrigue. All this had grown up naturally enough during the long territorial career of Dakota, and this condition was not in the least the result of party politics, for the partisanship question, on the lines of democracy and republicanism, had never cut any figure whatever in the career or the development of the territory. The over-weighted republican party had been responsible for about all the unpleasant incidents that had checkered the territorial annals, and it may be said that strictly party influences had never intervened to establish a territorial institution, define or organize a county or a judicial district, or secure any sort of a public improvement. The conclusions of the people regarding the issues of statehood and division had been reached by considerations almost wholly based on the public welfare, and would indicate the slight importance of party predilections when a matter of that kind engages the serious attention and study of the people.

But the incoming of a democratic administration awakened some new thoughts and ambitions among a portion of the people of the territory. And these new-born fancies took possession of the minds of many of the active and leading democrats of the territory who saw in the declaration of Mr. Cleveland regarding the political patronage of the territory opportunities they had never before enjoyed, and opportunities that the early success of division and admission of a state would entirely dissipate and destroy—a very reasonable conclusion. Hence it was observed that a remarkable lukewarmness had supplanted the former devotion to division and statehood in many democratic hearts, and the discovery that many evils that would, if permitted to germinate and become rooted in Dakota, seriously afflict the people, and a patriotic regard for the general welfare moved them to call a halt and sound the alarm before the people had become enmeshed inextricably in the traps of a divided territory and a state government.

In order to give authority and due solemnity to this public welfare movement the Democratic Territorial Committee was summoned in October, 1885, at Mitchell, a few weeks before the election when the new state constitution framed at Sioux Falls was to be voted upon. Mr. D. M. Inman, of Vermillion, was chairman of the committee, and presided at the Mitchell meeting, which was attended by a number of prominent democrats not members of the committee, the purpose being to give it the character of a representative body, which it was, though it did not have the support or sympathy of such leaders as Bartlett Tripp, Captain Ziebach, M. H. Day and their followers. The incident brought out the fact that the democracy of the territory was not united.

The committee also took up the subject of Federal patronage, which it was claimed was the strong underlying purpose for calling the meeting. A committee was appointed and given authority to represent the democracy of Dakota before the President and at the departments in Washington in the matter of appointments, and Mr. Inman was made chairman. This action meant a conflict with the democratic appointment bureau already established and doing business at Washington under direction of National Committeeman M. H. Day.

President Cleveland had said that he should appoint the Federal officials for Dakota from the citizens of the territory. The governorship of the territory was the most important office, and the democrats of the territory had united, with remarkable unanimity, in recommending Capt. Frank M. Ziebach, the pioneer, and the pioneer squatter governor, for the place. Mr. Day had undertaken, in connection with his work, to secure the appointment of governor for Mr. Ziebach, and had secured petitions with thousands of signatures appended urging the President to appoint him, and Mr. Ziebach had visited Washington, mingled with the luminaries of his party in the nation, paid his respects to the President, and returned to his Dakota lodge in an excellent frame of mind, confident that whenever the President made a change in the governorship of the territory the new incumbent would be the head of his own family. It was rumored that Mr. Inman, the Vermillion banker and also a New Yorker, would have been glad to have stepped into Ziebach's place as a promising candidate at this time, hence the Mitchell meeting.

The address, however, was mainly directed against the Sioux Falls constitution, then pending, and many of the points and faults alleged against it had already been promulgated by ex-Governor Ordway, who was fighting the two-state movement to the best of his ability at Washington, which would indicate a community of interest and an understanding between the ex-governor and the Inman democracy. The Ziebach men and the two-state people named the Inman phalanx the "Ordway democrats," and thus they were distinguished for years, or until statehood was accomplished.

Addresses sent out to the people denounced the Sioux Falls Constitutional Convention, in words and phrases, as follows, namely:

First. The entire proceedings are revolutionary and antagonistic to the best interests of the people of Dakota.

Second. We deny the right of one part of the territory to separate itself from the other without the expressed consent of the people of the whole.

Third. The attempt to force a recognition of a part of Dakota as a state, and appropriate the name of the whole for a part, is a proceeding unauthorized by law and a flagrant injustice to those of our citizens who are deprived of the privilege of being heard for or against the measure.

Fourth. The act passed by the last Legislature authorizing the convention at Sioux Falls and appropriating $20,000 to defray the expenses thereof was, in our judgment, unauthorized by the Organic Act of the territory, or by any law of Congress, and therefore void.

Fifth. The fact nine-tenths of the voters of the proposed state declined to join in the election of delegates to said constitutional convention indicates that the people are not in sympathy with the constitutional movement.

Sixth. We believe that the interests of the people of the territory of Dakota will be best subserved by awaiting the proper action of Congress in passing our enabling act, authorizing the holding of a state convention to frame a state constitution embracing such territory as the people, not the politicians, shall determine. We believe this action will be taken by Congress soon to assemble. We, therefore, as a committee, decline to call a convention for the nomination of officers of the proposed state, believing as we do, that the whole proceeding will prove to be a gigantic farce, and recommend that the democrats of Dakota and all law-abiding citizens generally decline to take any part whatever in the proceedings.

Resolved, That an Executive Committee, consisting of the following named persons, be and they are hereby appointed: D. M. Inman, chairman, Vermillion; P. B. McCarthy, First District, Rapid City; J. S. Foster, Second District, Mitchell; W. F. Joy, Third District, Grand Forks; A. Boynton, Fourth District, Lennox; G. J. Smith, Fifth District, Miller; John C. Holleback, Sixth District, Bismarck.

Second. That said committee shall have power to represent the democrats at Washington, and that all recommendations for federal appointments be made by and through it.

Third. That said committee, in making recommendations, shall confer with the local members of the Democratic Central Committee in the several districts in which said appointments are to be made, and shall in all cases, unless some grave objection appear, be guided by and act in accordance with the endorsement made by said local members.

Under the circumstances and granting to selfish human nature its ordinary influence in matters of this nature, it is not at all remarkable nor censurable that the democrats, after twenty-four years of waiting in the lonesome camp of the reserves, charitably and respectably known as the minority, should feel reluctant to give up the present and prospective benefits that would come to them from all the Federal positions, and the one hundred or more territorial offices that a democratic governor could appoint, with much of the patronage of the territorial institutions. There will be no harsh judgment passed upon them because of their refusal to join in a movement that if successful would surely sever the only tie that secured to them all the fruits of victory, and voluntarily return to their barren board with scant hope of ever again being so near a sumptuous party banquet. Such patriotism might have been commended, but—put yourself in their place. Had conditions been reversed, there is no reason to believe the republicans would have displayed the heroic spirit, and turned their backs upon the power, as well as perquisites, which were assured by continuing the territorial government.

A territorial democratic convention was held at Aberdeen on the 22d of December, called by L. C. Johnson (Ordway Johnson), for the committee. The purpose of the gathering was not given out, but owing to the turbulent condition of political party matters and the anxiety felt in the matter of Federal appointments in Dakota, which were in the transition stage from the republicans to the democrats, these conventions were of occasional occurrence. There were 135 delegates in attendance at Aberdeen. It appears, from subsequent revelations, that the purpose Mr. Johnson had in calling the convention was to get an authorized expression from the party regarding Federal appointments in the territory, the Hon. M. H. Day, democratic national committeeman, having so far assumed to direct the matter of endorsing all Dakota candidates for Federal position, and he had either designedly or with "malice aforethought" neglected to recognize Mr. Johnson. Johnson expected to control the convention—in fact, he did not expect anyone would attend it except his friends—and he had his program all laid out on that theory, but Day's friends had learned of Johnson's program and enough of them attended to control, and elected Bartlett Tripp as chairman, a friend of Mr. Day, and defeated Mr. Walsh, the Johnson candidate. George Henry, of Brookings, and W. S. Montgomery, of Brown County, were elected secretaries. The convention was expected to give an expression in opposition to a division of the territory, the election of Mr. Cleveland having put a new face on that proposition, and the convention had been called to meet in the central portion of the territory in order to get the advantage of a large local attendance, the anti-division sentiment being quite pronounced through the central portion of the territory for obvious reasons.

A committee on resolutions was appointed, composed of Messrs. Bowers, of Brown County, Foster, of Beadle County, Boynton, of Lincoln, McCormack, of Grand Forks, Wynn, of Minnehaha, Lewis, of Grant, Inman, of Clay, Ziebach, of Bon Homme, Redick, of Cass, Walsh, of Spink, and Keith, of Brookings.

A committee on permanent organization was also appointed, consisting of Inman, McCormack and Bowers, which reported at once in favor of making the temporary organization permanent, and the report was adopted.

A committee was also appointed later to report a plan for organizing the democratic party in the various counties of the territory, in very few of which an organization existed. This committee consisted of Messrs. Pierce, of Codington, Dunn, of Sanborn, Hughes, of Hughes, Eagle, of Brown, and Rawley, of Davison.

The resolutions committee reported as follows:

Resolved, That we most heartily endorse the course of the present administration, touching territorial and national affairs.

Resolved, That we favor and fully endorse the action taken by our National Convention and followed by President Cleveland with reference to selecting federal officers from actual residents of the territory, and earnestly implore the President to ignore carpet bagism and enforce the democratic resolution.

The other resolutions favored the opening of the Sioux Reservation, a tariff for revenue only, and sanctioned the action of the President in ordering cattlemen from the public lands.

The committee also reported a resolution tendering the thanks of the convention to both the territorial and national committees for service to the party. This resolution brought out strong objection from a number who objected to and who denounced the action of National Committeeman M. H. Day. And the resolution was finally placed on the table. It was clearly the sentiment of the members that Bartlett Tripp should succeed Judge Edgerton as chief justice, but no action was taken or sentiment expressed regarding the governorship.

After the adjournment, in the evening Hon. Bartlett Tripp made a public address, which was well received.

CROP REPORT

The official report of the wheat crop of the territory for 1885 was favorable to the farmers. Prices were fairly good, with an upward tendency. During October the prices paid the farmers were from sixty-four to seventy-two cents. The September report of the Department of Agriculture had Dakota's wheat average 96; Minnesota, 78; Iowa, 88, and Wisconsin, 77. The total crop yield in Dakota was about twenty-five million bushels, and the crop throughout the country and in Europe was below the average. The corn crop was larger than in 1884, but suffered materially from early frosts, except in the southern counties bordering on the Missouri River.

Dakota was credited by Immigration Commissioner Dunlap, territorial commissioner, with an increase of 20,000 people in 1885, making the total population 430,000. Of this number he gave to North Dakota 160,000, and South Dakota 270,000.

Another way of stating the marvelous growth and development of the Territory of Dakota, which would seem to make the notable subject not difficult of comprehension by those not resident of the territory at the time, and will also furnish food for healthful and valuable reflection to the intelligent generation of native Dakotans who were then in their infancy, childhood and youth, and not observant of the remarkable activities transpiring around them, to say nothing of the then unborn multitude who will feel an interest in some of the ultra-progressive years their ancestors experienced. The facts and figures and statements are all of the most reliable character, and were compiled and furnished by the department of agriculture maintained by the National Government at Washington. It was given to the public in October, 1885.

The progress of settlement in Dakota has been a marvel of activity and enterprise. In 1880 the population was 135,177. The present territorial census makes it 415,664, of which there is in Southern Dakota 262,515 and 154,149 in Northern Dakota. The number of farms in 1880 was 17,435. They are now reported at 82,477, of which 44,656 are in the southern section and 37,811 in the northern section. So eager has been the quest for free farms in this easily cultivated and fertile region that the territory outranks seventeen of the thirty-eight states in the number of existing farms. It will be a surprise to many that the number of farms in Dakota in 1885 is greater than was the number in Nebraska in 1880. It exceeds the number in Maine, and, of course, that of every other New England state. It surpasses the aggregate of California at that date, and of Maryland, and of Delaware. It is greater than the combined number of Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut, and more than all the farms of Oregon, Nevada and Colorado in the West, and Rhode Island, Delaware and Florida in the East, the six states taken together—nor are these farms all skeleton homesteads. There are five times as many people in the territory as there are farms, and production looms grandly. In the estimates of this department of more than five hundred million of bushels of wheat last year, Dakota took position as the eleventh in rank in wheat production. No state east of the Alleghenies or south of the Ohio stood before it, and even Wisconsin held a low place.

In his annual report to the department of the interior, submitted in November, 1885, Governor Pierce furnished the following comparison of the aggregate of farm products produced in 1880 and 1885. The increase indicates with striking emphasis the remarkable growth of the territory during that five years:

The governor issued a Thanksgiving proclamation November 13th, 1885, in which he asserted that the citizens of the territory had more than ordinary cause for thankfulness. "Though ill fortune had attended some, the masses have been abundantly blessed." "Peace and plenty are upon the land, and prosperity in all its borders." Thursday, the 26th, was designated as Thanksgiving day.

SEMI-DECENNIAL CENSUS

Under the Federal census law passed in 1879, providing for the census of 1880, Congress also enacted that the Government would extend financial aid to states and territories for taking a semi-decennial census. Maj. A. W. Edwards, of Fargo, editor of the Argus, was appointed supervisor of the census for North Dakota by the governor, and Robert B. Fish, of Hughes County, was appointed for the southern district. The Territorial Legislature of 1885 provided a law governing the work, and named the compensation of the supervisors. The law of Congress appropriated a lump sum for this work in all states and territories that would co-operate, which sum amounted to $1,250,000. When this sum was distributed it was found that Dakota had had the largest increase of population in proportion to her population, and received $36,678 of the Federal donation. The various schedules included in this census were first, population; second, productions of agriculture; third, productions of industry; fourth, mortality, but No. 4 was afterwards cancelled. These were the items required by the Federal Government, but there was no denial to the territory of the privilege of enlarging the list.

The enumeration and statistics were taken and gathered in June, 1885, and returns made to the governor, and by him transmitted and delivered to the President of the United States. By the following table, compared with the census of 1880, which gave the entire territory 135,700, it will be seen that a number of counties had nearly doubled, and the population had increased about two hundred per cent.

The total population was found to be 415,610, which included a few entitled to be enumerated on the Sisseton Indian Reservation, about one thousand people residing on a tract adjoining Brown and McPherson counties, and also sixty-five similarly situated in connection with Walsh and Ramsey counties, but the enumerator had given Stanley County a place in the census, when it was no part of the census territory, being wholly within the Big Sioux Reservation.

The population north of the 46th parallel, or North Dakota, was 153,078, and South Dakota 227,532.

North Dakota had a greater population than was found in the entire territory five years earlier.

DEATH OF GENERAL GRANT

General, and afterwards President of the United States for eight years, Ulysses S. Grant, died at Mount McGregor, New York, on the 23d of July, 1885. At the annual meeting of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee, held in Chicago, on the 9th of September, following, Gen. William Tecumseh Sherman, who had been Grant's most intimate military associate during the most important years of the Civil war, delivered the principal address, which was wholly devoted to the life and Civil war career of the great general, under whom the rebellion was finally subdued. In order that our young people, the school boys and school girls of our day, may learn something more of this remarkable man than can be gleaned from the ordinary histories of that momentous event, we have taken the liberty of transcribing the salient points of the address for this work, which is here produced:

Comrades of the Army of the Tennessee.—Again we are assembled in this goodly City of Chicago, pursuant to the resolution made at our last annual reunion of August 13 and 14, 1884, at Lake Minnetonka. This is our eighteenth annual reunion, though twenty even full years have transpired since the close of the war. I need not repeat to you the trite expression that our ranks are growing thinner, our hair whiter, and that eyes that look up to me and once kindled and flashed at the trumpets sound, now seem sad, as though envying the fate of these fine young fellows whose gay and gallant spirits took their flight in the glorious day, the memorials of which we have come together to celebrate. Though in war death makes the battlefield his harvest, yet in peace He insidiously invades the most sacred precincts, taking the innocent babe, then the gentle loving wife, again youth in lusty manhood, and kings on their thrones.

During our last vacation He has stricken from our list of members our very head and front—Gen. U. S. Grant. In the cold winter of 1861-2 he gathered together, at Cairo, Ill., the fragments of an army and led them up the Tennessee River. The creator and father of the Army of the Tennessee took his final leave of earth at 8 o'clock and eight minutes on the morning of July 23, 1885, from Mount McGregor, a spur of the Alleghones. In plain view of the historic battlefield of Saratoga he finished his life work and had bequeathed to the world his example. The lightning's flash carried the sad tidings to all parts of the civilized earth, and I doubt whether since the beginning there ever rose such spontaneous grief to bear testimony before high heaven that mankind had lost a kindred spirit and his countrymen a leader. His first war comrades concede to his family their superior rights, but claim the next place in the grand procession of mourners. We were with him in the days of adversity as well as prosperity, and were as true to him as the needle to the pole. We shared with him the trials and tribulations, as well as the labors and battles of Fort Henry, Donelson, Shiloh, Corinth, Iuka and Vicksburg. When that transcendent and most valuable of all victories turned universal gaze to our beloved countryman—to a new star in the West which plainly foretold the man who had dispelled the cloud which had lowered o'er our house, and who it was that led us to the triumphant victories of 1865, and to the stable, enduring prosperity of 1885.

Hundreds,—yes thousands,—of busy brains and pens are now trying to comprehend and describe this man who did so much in so short a time, to trace the mysterious causes of his most wonderful career, and to account for its known results. They look to us, who were his daily associates in that critical epoch, to aid them in their commendable work, and as your president I must on this occasion contribute my share.

In the year 1833 I was a first class man in the United States Military Academy at West Point, a position of exaltation never reached since, though reasonably successful in life,—and there appeared on the walls of the hall in "old north barrack" a list of new cadets, among which was "U. S. Grant." The crowd of lookers on read "United States Grant," "Sam Grant," "Uncle Sam Grant," and "Sam Grant" he is today in the traditions of the old Fourth United States Infantry. It afterward transpired his name was actually Ulysses Hiram Grant, and a mistake had been made by General Hamer, member of Congress who nominated him cadet from his district. Cadet Grant tried to correct this mistake at the beginning and end of his cadet life without success, and to history his name must ever be "U. S. Grant."

I remember his personal appearance at the time,—but the gulf of separation between a first class man and a plebeian at West Point was and is deeper and wider than a general-in-chief and a private soldier in the army, so that I hardly noticed him. His reputation in the Fourth Infantry, in which he served during the Mexican war, and until he resigned his commission as captain in Oregon July 31, 1854, was of a good, willing officer, always ready for duty, extremely social and friendly with his fellows, but in no sense conspicuous, brilliant or manifesting the wonderful qualities afterwards developed in him.

I recall an instance when I met him at St. Louis in 1857, when he was a farmer in the country, and out of the military service. The only impression left on my memory is that I then concluded that West Point and the regular army were good schools for farmers, bankers, merchants and mechanics. I did not meet him again until the Civil war had broken out, when chaos had broken loose and the gates of hell wide open in every direction. Then came the news of General Grant's attack on the enemy's camp at Belmont on the 7th of November, 1861, soon followed by events at Columbus, Paducah, Henry and Donelson, all so simple, so direct, so comprehensible, that their effect on my mind was magical. They raised the dark curtain which before had almost hidden out almost all hope of the future, and displayed the policy and force of action, necessary to be followed persistently to achieve ultimate success. Great as were his after achievements, I shall ever rate those of Henry and Donelson among the best. Yet by one of those accidents so common in war, he had incurred the displeasure of his superior, General Halleck, whom I then esteemed as the master mind ruling and directing the several armies subject to his orders from his headquarters in St. Louis, so, that when in March, 1862, I was permitted to take the field from Paducah with a new division, I found General Grant at Fort Henry, under orders from General Halleck to remain there and to turn over the command of his army, then flushed with victory under his immediate leadership, to General Smith, his next in rank.

It so happened that General Smith had been adjutant and commandant at West Point when Grant and I were cadets there, and he was universally esteemed as the model soldier of his day. He had also acquired large fame in the Utah expedition, and in the then recent capture of Fort Donelson, so that General Grant actually looked up to him as an older if not a better soldier. Though Grant was at that time senior by commission, not one word of complaint came from him only the general expression of regret that he had been wrongly and unjustly represented to General Halleck, and he advised me to give General Smith my most loyal support. General Smith accompanied the expedition up the Tennessee River to Savannah, Eastport and Pittsburg Landing, and gave all orders and instructions until within a few days of the Battle of Shiloh, when his health, shattered by the merest accident, compelled him to relinquish the command to General Grant, next or equal in rank, who quickly resumed operations where Smith had left off, accepted the situation, made few or no changes, and fought on the ground that had been selected by General Smith, the bloody Battle of Shiloh.

During this fiercely contested battle, General Grant displayed the coolness, personal courage, forethought and deliberation which afterwards made him famous among men.

Yet he was traduced, slandered, wronged, not only by the press universally, but by those who were in positions of authority over him. We, however, who were at the battle's front stood by him truly, and loyal always, and to his dying day he loved the Army of the Tennessee above all others because they were loyal to him in those darkest days of his eventful life—nor was the end yet. After this great battle three armies assembled only at the bloody field—Buell's, Pope's and Grant's—and General Halleck came in person from St. Louis to command the whole, with a declared purpose to assume a bold offense.

These armies were reorganized. Buell's army became the center, Pope's the left, and Grant's was broken up. One part, under Gen. George H. Thomas, was styled the "right," while the other part, under General McClernand, composed the reserve. General Grant was absolutely left out in the cold, with the title of second in command—unknown to American history. All moved forth to Corinth, consuming the whole month of May, and during that month became cemented the personal friendship between us which lasted to the end.

Not one word of complaint came from Grant, no criticism on one act of his superiors or the Government, yet the trembling eye-lid, silent tear and averted head told that his big heart was troubled. He knew that every officer and soldier that had followed him with such noble faith and sublime courage at Belmont, Henry, Donelson and Shiloh, felt for him, respected him, and understood the load of neglect—if not positive insult—he was carrying. He knew and felt that he was in the way of the commanding general, as it were, a fifth wheel to a coach, with no real authority, no command, no possible right to order or even advise his former subordinates. I am sure that he felt that he was never welcome to our bivouacs, and we understood and appreciated the entire situation.

Then occurred the most questionable strategy of the whole war—that magnificent army, nearly one hundred thousand of the best men on this continent, who could, if united, have marched to Vicksburg or Mobile, was deliberately scattered. General Buell with the Army of the Cumberland, which Thomas had recently rejoined, was sent eastward toward Chattanooga, and the others were scattered defensively from Eastport to Memphis. General Grant was sent to command the district of Memphis, and General Halleck himself being summoned to Washington, cast about for a new commander of the Army of the Tennessee. He offered the post to a most worthy quartermaster, who had the good sense to decline, and himself being compelled to leave, the command at once devolved on General Grant, not by selection, but by virtue of his superior commission. Thenceforward his career was ever onward and upward, and when on the 4th day of July, 1863, Vicksburg surrendered to him, and the mighty Mississippi went unvexed to the sea, the whole country arose and recognized in him a general who was destined to guide and lead us all to final victory and triumph.

These incidents and circumstances were all known to you at the time, but were little appreciated and were in the treaty and plan first designed by Providence to test the ability, courage and endurance of him on whom this whole epoch in history was designed to hinge. Others have told the whole story of the war, and still others are repeating and elaborating it—even he, himself, almost in his dying hours was engaged in recording his experience, and we all await its publication with profound interest. I have seen some of the manuscript and have been told of the rest, but I prefer to await the whole publication, certain that whatever he has recorded of his own knowledge will stand the test of time, and I am sure he himself will have recognized the truth, and will have recorded the fact, that this campaign from Belmont to Vicksburg was the most valuable of his whole career.

In this brief period he discovered the power that was in him, that he in fact impersonated the great mass of our best people who abhorred war, and only resorted to it when national honor and safety demanded it. He knew little and cared less about strategy, and I doubt if he ever read "Iommi Gratius," or any books on the articles and laws of war, except West Point text books. So with tactics. He never, so far as I can recall, expressed a preference for Hardie over Scott, Cassy or Morris, still he loved to see order and system, and wanted his corps, divisions, brigades and regiments, handy and well instructed when called for. He aimed to achieve results, caring little for the manner by which they were accomplished. He possessed and always asserted the most perfect faith in the justice of our cause, and always claimed that sooner or later, it must prevail, because the interests of all mankind demanded the existence of just such a republic as we had inherited, and that by a concurrence of political causes the conflict had fallen upon us, we had only to meet it like brave men and conquer as a matter of course. He always claimed that we must follow up and defeat the rebel armies and compel them to submit to the authority of the National Government. He believed in deeds, not in words, in war, aggression, not manœuvre, and from Belmont to Appomattox his strategy and tactics were the same, ever straight to the mark, till armed resistance had ceased and absolute submission to lawful authority was promised.

He was always outspoken in his praises of the Army of the Tennessee, by reason of its earnestness at Henry and Donelson. Its stubborn course at Shiloh, its quiet submission to unfriendly authority at Corinth. Its quick response to his call at Iuka, and splendid qualities displayed throughout the Vicksburg campaign—or his own words as recently recorded—"The campaign of Vicksburg was suggested and developed by circumstances, and it now looks as though Providence had directed its course, while the Army of the Tennessee executed its decree."

Yes, my comrades, there is a Providence which shapes our ends, rough hew them as we may, and fortunate was it for us and all mankind that two such men as Lincoln and Grant were on duty during the critical year of 1863, each a full complement to the other, one to think, the other to do,—forming the solid arch upon which our glorious Union could safely repose in the then earthquake of passion and folly.

BOARD OF AGRICULTURE

Under a law enacted by the recent Legislative Assembly at Bismarck, delegates from the several counties of the territory met at Mitchell on the 17th of June and organized the Territorial Board of Agriculture, an organization that under the law was empowered to contract and be contracted with, may purchase, hold or sell property, may sue or be sued in all courts or places, may hold territorial fairs or fat stock shows, at such times and places as the board may determine, but the territory should never become liable for any debt or contract of said board. The secretary of the society was required to keep his office at Huron, provided the city should furnish a suitable office, free of cost, to the territory. The secretary was to receive $200 per annum and the treasurer $100, and also give such bond as the board might require.

At the Mitchell meeting an organization was effected by the election of the following officers: President, C. A. Bliss, Brown County; secretary, J. T. Blackchore, Hyde County; secretary at Huron, as required by the law, W. F. Bushnell; treasurer, Judge John E. Bennett, Clark County; executive committee, J. V. White, Clay County; L. C. Winslow, Minnehaha; A. W. Page, Beadle; A. Wardell, Grant; H. P. Packard, Spink; Theo. David, Davison.

The board decided to hold a four days' fair beginning the first Monday in October, the fair to be holden at such place as was willing to bid the highest for it, the bids to be opened at Huron on July 8th. Vice presidents were chosen, one from each legislative district, as follows:

No. 1, J. V. White, Clay County; No. 2, S. V. Jones, Turner; No. 3, C. A. Baddock, Bon Homme; No. 4, L. C. Winslow, Minnehaha; No. 5, Thomas David, Davison; No. 6, H. J. Patterson, Lake; No. 7, C. Keith, Brookings; No. 8, A. W. Page, Beadle; No. 9, H. B. Paddock, Spink; No. 10, J. D. Durley, Paulk; No. 11, J. C. Stephens, Sully; No. 12, Alonzo Wardell, Grant; No. 13, J. W. Hoyt, Brown; No. 14, H. G. Gregg, Lawrence; No. 15, A. D. Flemington, Dickey; No. 16, A. J. Fleming, Cass; No. 17, Charles Richardson, Barnes; No. 18, John Flittie, Trail; No. 19, Dr. M. W. Scott, Grand Forks; No. 20, J. D. Stewart, Walsh; No. 21, Henry Story, Pembina; No. 22, Johnstone Nickeus, Stutsman; No. 23, W. F. Steele, Kidder; No. 24, not filled.

KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS, GRAND LODGE

The Grand Lodge of Dakota, Knights of Pythias, was organized at Huron April 30, 1885, by Supreme Grand Chancellor Van Valkenburg, of Iowa. Delegates were present from every lodge in the territory. The officers of the Dakota Grand Lodge were: Grand past chancellor, Cutts, of Grand Forks; grand chancellor, George J. Love, of Huron; vice chancellors, Edmunds, of Deadwood, and P. D. Collins, of Grand Forks; master of the exchequer, Daniels, of Mitchell; keeper of records and seal, Davis, of Brookings; master-at-arms, Black, of Bismarck; outside guard, Ganz, of Rapid City. John Westdahl, of Huron, was elected delegate to the Grand Lodge at Toronto.

THE NEW RAILROAD COMMISSION AT WORK

The territorial board of railway commissioners appointed under a law passed in 1885 could not have been expected to accomplish much more during the first year than to acquaint themselves with the provisions of the law, their duties and powers, and make a personal inspection of the broad field by a journey over the railway lines, halting at the more important points, collecting information, including the grievances complained of by municipalities and also by shippers, thus laying the foundation for the improvement of Dakota's transportation interests. By the close of October, 1885, this preliminary work had been performed as thoroughly as practicable, and the commission held a meeting at Fargo, for the purpose of making an annual report to the governor. The commission also prepared and forwarded to Senator Cullom, of Illinois, who was chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate an official letter of some length, the contents of which were not given to the public, but were supposed to contain certain important suggestions for the improvement of the national law, also soliciting information upon some obscure points where the territorial body might be required to take action with reference to interstate commerce. The commission had also ordered the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Company to construct a "Y" at Aberdeen, connecting with the Northwestern, which had not been done, and which was urgently demanded to facilitate transportation through that important center. The Northern Pacific had expressed its unwillingness to provide depot facilities at Sykeston, which had been ordered by the board. The business interests of Lisbon had complained to the board of a lack of cars to transport their surplus grain with which their elevators were filled, and General Manager Odell of the Northern Pacific promised that cars should be furnished "as the needs demanded and the facilities of the company would allow." This last clause was not satisfactory. The annual report of the board recommended new legislation covering the following points.

1. Compelling railroad companies to put in a "Y" at all junctions.
2. Taxing gross earnings of sleeping car, telegraph, telephone and express companies.
3. Putting in crossings in cities where ordered by the commission.
4. Against elevator pooling, and giving power to the commission to compel railroad companies to put in stations and depots where deemed necessary.

The additional authority asked for is now practically exercised by the commission, though its recommendation regarding taxation has not been satisfactorily worked out. The commission gave the total railway mileage of the territory at the close of 1885 at 2,667 miles.

GIFFORD, RAYMOND AND THE PRESIDENT

Hon. O. S. Gifford, who was Dakota's delegate to Congress during the whole of Mr. Cleveland's first term as President was quite favorably impressed with his personal qualities and intellectual qualifications but he was unable to get much enlightenment or comfort from him relative to those matters regarding Dakota that the delegate felt were of such paramount importance that all mankind ought to be interested in them and have a positive opinion regarding them. Speaking of the President's opinion of the Dakota situation, Mr. Gifford stated:

So far as the questions of admission and division are concerned, I cannot say what the President favors. I have had several interesting and earnest conversations with Mr. Cleveland, and in all these the President has manifested a friendly and encouraging spirit toward the territory. The questions of division and admission were touched upon, but the cautious executive did not commit himself to either. However, he left the impression with me that he intended to act in accordance with the wishes of the people, and for the best interests of the territory at large. The President will strongly recommend the opening of the Big Sioux Reservation, and in this connection the delegate expressed the opinion that Governor Pierce would be allowed to serve his time out.

RAYMOND'S VIEWS OF CLEVELAND

The term of Hon. John B. Raymond as delegate in Congress from Dakota Territory expired in March, 1885, but he remained in Washington for some time and aided his successor to get "acquainted with the ropes." He had taken an active and intelligent interest in the efforts to divide the territory, and also favored statehood, which brought upon him the enmity of Ordway, McKenzie and others, and possibly compassed his defeat for renomination, but he was not at all vindictive. On retiring he gave out a statement of his views regarding the position occupied by the Dakota question in official Washington, having had an opportunity to observe the trend of affairs that was quite accurately confirmed by future events. He said that:

It would have been unreasonable to expect the President to make any recommendation looking to the instruction of his party on the Dakota questions in his message, as it was known that his party was opposed to such admission, and had been fighting it for years. He was of the opinion that the republican party, whose senators and representatives had always favored the admission scheme, would take care of the measure and, by agitating the subject during the session, might secure the passage of an act enabling South Dakota to frame a constitution and come into the Union as a separate state. He said the democratic members would make a pretense of being favorable to the admission of Dakota as a whole, but would annex thereto a similar provision for the admission of Montana. The members of Congress would look at the question from a party standpoint and would not take kindly to the increase of republican senators as would be the case of Dakota, or the southern part thereof, was admitted. They would therefore pass an act enabling Montana and Dakota to be admitted, hoping that the republican Senate would defeat the measure, or that the people of Dakota would refuse such admission as a whole. In either event the democrats would succeed in placing the blame on a republican Senate or the citizens of the Territory, for such non-admission. He doubted that Congress would allow a division of the territory into two separate territories, notwithstanding this would increase the territorial officers. In case of division the lower territory would speedily be admitted, and by pretending to admit the territory as a whole, the admission could be deferred indefinitely.

RAILROAD TO THE BLACK HILLS

The progress being made by the Sioux City and Pacific Railway, which was constructing a line west through the Niobrara Valley in Northern Nebraska encouraged the expectation that the line would reach the crossing of White River during the year. At this point on the headwaters of the White, a branch would put out for the north, distance about one hundred miles. The prospect for the early completion of the enterprise induced some of the heavy freight lines on the Bismarek and Pierre routes to the hills to transfer their equipment to Chadron on the Nebraska route, induced by the shorter route and the favor extended by the railway company which was interested in the freight carrying business to the hills, which were then demanding many thousands of tons of merchandise, mining machinery and building material except lumber.

The Chicago and Northwestern or rather the subsidiary company entitled the Fremont, Elkhorn & Missouri Valley Railway Company was the first outside railroad company to enter the Black Hills by a branch from its Northern Nebraska line starting north from Chadron on the headwaters of White River. This was in 1885. Whether the company designed to make Rapid City or Deadwood its terminus did not clearly appear for some time, for a number of preliminary lines were run into the hills.

Finally on Friday, October 23d, general manager, P. E. Hall, accompanied by Chief Engineer Ainsworth reached Rapid City for the purpose of a conference with its citizens on the railroad subject. Rapid City was prepared for visits of this nature, and had previously organized a citizens committee of fifteen with plenipotentiary powers to look after Rapid's railway interests. On Saturday this committee was assembled to meet Mr. Hall, who informed the committee that an entirely practicable route to Rapid City had been found, and that he would meet with the committee Monday and confer further. A sub-committee consisting of John R. Brennan, A. J. Simmons, James Halley, J. W. Fowler, and C. L. Wood met Mr. Hall Monday, and the conference resulted in an agreement to build the road to Rapid as rapidly as men and money could do it. It was expected that the grading would be largely completed before winter placed an embargo on outside work. Rapid City bound itself by a good and sufficient bond to provide the company with ample depot grounds, and right of way through the town without cost to the company.

The grading contract for the grading of this line to Rapid was let in June, and forty-five miles was to be completed and operated before the year closed.

Passenger stages were put on the overland route, as soon as the Northwestern Railroad reached Chadron, Neb., running through to Deadwood, lessening the traveling time between Deadwood and Chicago two days. The opening of this line was at the cost of the Dakota lines from Pierre and Bismarck.

The Black Hills and Northern Pacific Stage Line running between Deadwood and Medora on the Northern Pacific was discontinued in May, 1885. It had been established by the enterprising Marquis deMores, of Medora. The new route via the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad to Chadron, within 100 miles of Rapid City was drawing nearly all the stage travel to the hills. Near Medora the Marquis claims as a recent discovery a clay known as Kaoline, from which the finest pottery is made.

The Chicago and Northwestern Railroad was completed from Centerville to Yankton on the 16th of December, 1885. The towns of Wakonda, Clay County, was founded at this time. The road cost Yankton $30,000. Wakonda, Clay County, and Volin, Yankton County, were founded during the same year.

United States Senator John J. Ingalls, of Kansas, introduced a bill on the 17th of December, 1885, giving to the Pierre Bridge Company the right to construct a bridge over the Missouri River at that point. The company to which the bill grants the charter was incorporated under the laws of Dakota, and proposed to construct a toll bridge for railways, wagons, carriages and pedestrians similar to the Lawler bridge at Prairie du Chien on the Mississippi. If the company constructed a span bridge there were to be three channel spans fifty feet above high water and 300 feet long each. Should a draw be required by the secretary of war, the span on each side of the pivot was required to be 160 feet long and the adjoining spans 300 feet. The bill gave the company a tract of land amounting to one section at the west end of the bridge for approaches and tracks. The bridge company was a subordinate of the Northwestern Railway Company. There was quite a long delay before the work of construction was entered upon.

Senator Spooner, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill for a like purpose about the middle of January, 1886.

RAILROADS IN NORTH DAKOTA

In the spring of 1884 it was given out that extensions of the Manitoba (hills lines) would be completed during the year, as follows:

From Devil's Lake to the Turtle Mountains, ninety miles; Hope to the Cheyenne River, thirty-six miles; Breckenridge to the head of Red River, thirty-five miles; Portland, through Larimore to the international boundary somewhere in the Pembina mountains, 100 miles. In addition a line of road was projected from St. Paul via Marshall, Pipestone and Sioux Falls to Yankton, which was said to have the Manitoba Company back of it. This new road, if built, would be 500 miles long. It was reported that ties had been ordered for 200 miles of this road to be built this year, 1884.

The Fargo Southern, from Fargo to Flandrau, was to be completed during the year, and work on the Dakota and Great Southern, known as the Tower City Line was under way. Other railway incorporations in which Dakota was interested were thought worthy of mention as follows: The Duluth, North Shore and Southwestern, from Duluth to Yankton via St. Cloud and Litchfield. Lake Superior, Willmar and Dakota from St. Cloud through Kandiyohi County. Duluth, Fargo and Black Hills from Fargo to the Black Hills, a distance of 450 miles. Huron & Southwestern from Huron to Chamberlain. Dakota & Minnesota, from the James River Valley to the eastern boundary of Roberts County. Iowa, Sioux Falls & Northern, from Sioux Falls to Jamestown, 500 miles. Lake Traverse, Sanborn & Carrington, from the southeasterly corner of Richland County to Carrington, 175 miles. Watertown & Northern, from Ordway, Brown County to Watertown, Codington County. Bismarck & Southeastern, from Bismarck to Lake Kampeska. Belfield & Black Hills, from Deadwood to international boundary. Deadwood and Cheyenne River, from Deadwood to a point on the river. Eastern Dakota, from Milbank Junction to center of Ransom County. Fargo, Grand Forks & Pembina, from Fargo to international boundary. Ordway, Frederick & Bismarck, from Ordway to Bismarck. Spiritwood, Grand Rapids & Devil's Lake, from south line of Dickey County to Devil's Lake. Yankton, Okobbojo & Fort Buford, from Yankton to Fort Buford. Beaufort & Southern, from Beaufort to Aberdeen. Fargo, Larimore & Northern, from Fargo to Mayville and thence northward. Columbia & Southern, from Columbia, Brown County, to Sioux Falls. Omaha & Northern, from Yankton 130 miles northward.

In 1885, the Milwaukee Company announced an extension from Ellendale, Dickey County, to St. George, in LaMoire County—twenty-five miles, and within forty miles of Jamestown. Ellendale was the northern terminus of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, in the James River Valley. It was subsequently extended to a connection with the Northern Pacific at Dawson, Kidder County.

The James River Valley Railroad, a northern incorporation, which was nearly completed during the year 1885, from Jamestown to LaMoire, in LaMoire County, gave almost unbroken rail communication from Yankton, near the mouth of the James River to a point fifty miles north of Jamestown, Stutsman County, a distance by rail of about 400 miles. Twenty-five miles between Ellendale and LaMoire was then under construction.

January 30, 1886, the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company gave out a contract for grading a railway line north from Andover on their Milbank and Aberdeen line. The line was to extend to the northern boundary of Dickey County, a distance of fifty-six miles.

The Dakota & Great Southern Railroad Company was incorporated in 1883. Col. Isaac Britton was the president of the company. This projected line had its initial point at Tower City, a point on the Northern Pacific Railroad in the extreme western part of Cass County, thence south in an almost direct line to Brule Creek in Union County, where it had its southern terminus in Dakota, but proposed to enter Iowa from Richland at the mouth of the Brule, and extend to Sioux City or possibly LeMars. It was not a Northern Pacific enterprise, according to Colonel Britton. From Tower City to Richland on Brule Creek, the distance was given at about three hundred and fifty miles. From Tower City the line passed through the southeast of Barnes County, thence through the counties of Ransom, Sargent, Day and Clark, thence through Kingsbury County crossing the Northwestern at or near DeSmet, thence through Lake County crossing the Southern Minnesota west of Madison, thence through Minnehaha County crossing the Northwestern west of Hartford, thence across the northeast corner of Turner County and southwest corner of Lincoln, crossing the Northwestern again west of Beresford, and thence to Richland. The contract for grading the first sixty miles south of Tower City was let in September. The company claimed that its line would pass through the most valuable agricultural section of Dakota. Its intention was to require no donations from the towns and counties on the route, saving the land needed for right of way for the road and depot grounds at all stations. The enterprise hung along for a number of years, with fluctuating fortunes, but was not successful.

CROW CREEK RESERVATION—SETTLERS DISTURBED

The opening of the Crow Creek Reservation to settlement was one of the incidents of the heavy immigration that set toward and into Dakota in the years of President Arthur's administration, reaching into the first years of President Cleveland's first administration. That fragment of Dakota appeared to be shrouded in mystery so far as its claim to being an Indian reservation was concerned, and the probing of this mystery furnished not a little employment to the interior department at Washington. The reservation had been declared open to settlement by President Arthur about one month prior to the expiration of his term as President in February, 1885, which was followed by a great rush of white settlers to the land which was regarded as one of the garden spots of the territory. Some accounts placed the population of the tract at 6,000 shortly after the occupation of it occurred. But prior to the official action of the President, and owing to the long drawn out dispute regarding the Indian title, a large number of adventurous white settlers had exercised the time honored privilege of squatter sovereigns and made settlement upon the coveted domain.

Immediately following Mr. Cleveland's inauguration, the Indian Rights Association and other friends of the Indians had induced him to reopen the question, and he had referred it to the attorney general, Mr. Garland. About the first of April this official rendered his opinion claiming "that the order of President Arthur, of February 27th last, opening the Winnebago or Crow Creek Reservation in Dakota was inoperative, because the Sioux Indians hold a title to the lands under the treaty of 1868." Under this opinion, the President issued an order in April, 1885, revoking the proclamation of his predecessor, and warning immigrants from occupying the lands included in the reservation, which were already partially settled by whites and much improvement had been made.

Governor Edmunds, of Yankton, who became Dakota's executive very soon after the time the Minnesota Indians were removed to Crow Creek, and was also superintendent of Indian affairs, and of his personally acquired knowledge knew as much regarding the legal status of that reservation as any of the laymen of that day, and was familiar with all general facts regarding the reservation from its earliest occupation, was also one of the commissioners appointed by the President to make treaties with the Sioux in 1865-66, and led in making the treaties, and was in fact one of the commissioners who ordered the Government supplies for the Yanktonnais to be left at the Crow Creek buildings, and placed in charge of Mr. E. E. Hudson before the Yanktonnais occupied the agency, made an informal statement regarding the status of the reservation, substantially as follows:

In 1863 buildings were erected at Crow Creek for the Winnebagoes and Santee Sioux, but these two bands refused to occupy the agency grounds thus prepared for them. An effort was then made to induce the Two Kettle and Lower Yanktonnais bands of Sioux to settle there so that the buildings, which cost a hundred thousand dollars, or thereabouts, might be utilized. These Indians refused to go to Crow Creek. Finally the Government commenced unloading the supplies set apart for the Lower Yanktonnais at Crow Creek, and that band of Indians was compelled to move down there or starve. At this time (1886) the then secretary of the interior issued an order designating the Crow Creek and Winnebago reservations as the home of the Lower Yanktonnais. Thus far there had been no treaty reservation made there, and no presidential order had made it a reservation. Being unoccupied and useless territory, the Indians were permitted to live there. In 1868 followed the Sioux Treaty, by which about one-quarter of Dakota was ceded to the Sioux Nation. The terms of this treaty included all the country in Dakota west of the Missouri River and south of the Cannon Ball River. It also included all existing reservations east of the Missouri. In the opinion of the governor this referred only to the Yankton Reservation, which with the Sisseton reserve, was the only reservation having a legal existence east of the river.

General Sherman, who was chairman of the Indian commission which made the famous treaty of 1868 at Laramie with the Sioux, who was then lieutenant general, made a statement for Attorney General Garland's benefit, that he had an impression that a map was used at Laramie in the conference with the Indians in 1868, upon which the reservations east of the Missouri were shown, and the Indians given to think that the old Winnebago lands should be included in the Sioux Reservation.

At the same time a military order, dated August 1, 1868, carrying out the provisions of the treaty, wherein General Sherman himself bounded the Sioux Reservation as all lands "west of the Missouri River, north of the Nebraska line to the 40th parallel."

It is evident from this statement made by General Sherman to Mr. Garland that the general regarded it of importance, as having inadvertently, or without such intention given the Indians to understand by displaying to them the old map, that they had a reservation at Crow Creek. While no lawful claim could be made by the Indians on such ground, and such a foundation for claim between white people would be regarded with indifference, Mr. Cleveland and his law officer would be justified in considering what effect it had on the minds of the Indians—whether it induced them to understand that the Crow Creek Reserve was a part of their possessions. If such was the effect no amount of explanation, such as would disprove their legal right would have satisfied the Indians that no injustice was done them by opening the lands to the whites, and it was of the first importance that the Great Father should retain the implicit confidence of these uncivilized people. The motive for revoking the Arthur order, if based on this ground might be justified, but there is no evidence whatever that would justify it based on the treaties with the Sioux. It should also be borne in mind that President Arthur's order did not take from the Indians any of the lands they were using or occupying, but made a permanent reservation of five townships of 115,200 acres most of it in vicinity of Fort Thompson on the Missouri River, including an extensive river frontage, which the Indians were desirous of securing, and included one township north of Thompson, lying in the Big Bend, where no Indians were then residing. Their reserved lands were well watered, and fairly well timbered. As there were but about six hundred Indians all told who drew rations at the agency, it would indicate that the Government had been extremely liberal in giving them a permanent home of 115,000 acres. The 600 Indians would not include more than 150 families, which would give nearly five hundred acres to each family of four persons, or 200 acres to each adult, male and female, and each boy and girl. The Indians would be greatly benefitted by the settlement of the half million acres thrown open by white people and good farmers, for in addition to the enhanced value lands would receive, they would have the still greater advantage and benefit which would come from communities of white neighbors, with their churches and schools, and improved customs in domestic life and in industries. While there appeared to be a strong sentiment in the country favoring President Cleveland's revocation order, had the sentiment been well informed regarding the entire situation it would probably have sustained the policy indicated by the action of President Arthur.

This action of the President gave rise to a serious condition of affairs in the neighborhood of Crow Creek, and apprehensions of an Indian outbreak became quite general. As a matter of prudence, Governor Pierce, of Dakota, dispatched Attorney General Rice to Crow Creek to investigate as to the liability of a hostile demonstration by the Indians. Rice reported that there were about two thousand white claimants on the land, representing 6,000 people. He found about one thousand Indians, and as five townships of the old reservation, containing over one hundred and fifteen thousand acres had been reserved for them under the Arthur order, they were amply provided for. The whites were not disposed to forcibly resist the Cleveland order, but having been assured by their legal counselors that their claims would be held valid, they had resolved to test the question of title in the courts. Thereupon the governor issued a proclamation, as follows:

The President has deemed it necessary to revoke the executive order of February 27, 1885, opening the above reservation to settlement. This action is plainly inspired by the single purpose of maintaining what is regarded as the plighted faith of the Government and keeping inviolate the sacred terms of a treaty. I realize the hardships to settlers involved in this order, and I am sure the President is not oblivious to or unmindful of them. But it has been issued under what seemed to the Government a necessity, and it should be quietly and peaceably obeyed. Considerations of good citizenship and considerations of self-interest favor such action.

The President and Congress will not neglect to see justice done to those who have gone on these lands under color of right, and who sacrifice their property and yield what they have gained in order to obey the command of the executive.

I earnestly trust, therefore, both for the sake of law and order, and for the sake of the settlers themselves, that the proclamation of the President will be obeyed without compelling a resort to any show of force whatever. Nothing can be gained, much can be lost by a failure voluntarily to comply with the order.

I suggest, also, that measures of some kind be taken by the settlers to preserve proof of their respective claims. If books be opened in each settlement, and a record be made of the facts in each case, describing lands settled upon, buildings erected and expense incurred, it may prove of much convenience and possibly facilitate a settlement of claims, should the Government consider it proper to recognize and make provision for them.

To assist in devising some method by which this can be done, the attorney-general of the territory will visit the reservations and will aid the settlers in any manner possible by his counsel and advice.

GILBERT A. PIERCE, Governor.

No correct account of the origin of the reservation appeared to be in possession of the Government, and for years following the beginning of the active immigration in 1879, the title to the lands was in dispute, as to whether it belonged to the Government or the Sioux Nation of Indians.

The records of the interior department and the proclamations made by President Lincoln during his terms, fail to disclose any reference whatever to the origin of the reservation, and as this event occurred during the active and anxious days of the Civil war, we are inclined to believe that the official record of the transaction was inadvertently laid aside by the department, and forgotten. However, the facts related herein, concerning the location of the reservation, which occurred in 1863, are well known to the writer personally, and he can vouch for their correctness. The Crow Creek Reservation was established in the summer of 1863 by Col. Clark W. Thompson, then superintendent of Indian affairs for the northern district of Minnesota, a Federal office. The lands taken for the reservation belonged to the United States, being public lands and a portion of the domain ceded by the Yankton Indians in 1858-59.

In August, 1862, occurred the Little Crow outbreak in Minnesota, with its attendant slaughter of whites. The Indians engaged in this revolt and atrocities were largely and probably altogether members of the Santee Sioux tribe, which, at the time, had a fine reservation in Minnesota. The great body of these hostiles were early driven west into the Territory of Dakota by General Sibley; but there were several hundred, including the aged and many women and children, who had not participated in the revolt, who remained on the Minnesota reservation. The wholesale massacre of helpless and inoffensive white people, which was the lamentable and harrowing feature of the revolt, had produced a deadly antipathy on the part of Minnesotans toward all Indians, to the race itself, and as a measure of safety for the innocent Indians, the Government deemed it necessary to remove all in that portion of Minnesota from the state. The situation was an emergent one and demanded immediate relief. Colonel Thompson, the superintendent, was charged with the mission of selecting a tract of land on the public domain in Dakota, on which to establish this exiled people. In the meantime the prejudices of the whites had become so embittered that it was resolved to include the Winnebago tribe, who were not Sioux, and had been traditionally friendly to the white race, in the removal order. The safety of the Winnebagoes in the angry and excited condition of popular feeling demanded this precaution.

Colonel Thompson came to Dakota, to the Missouri River, some little time after the opening of navigation, in 1863, in quest of a tract of land for the banished people. He visited the capital and held a conference with the acting governor (Hutchinson). The governor of Dakota was ex-officio superintendent of Indian affairs for the territory, but Dakota had no governor at the time. Governor Jayne had resigned in March to take his seat in Congress, and his successor had not been appointed. Thompson then intended to select a location as near the Yankton Reservation as practicable, fronting on the Missouri River. He began his investigations in the vicinity of the western boundary of Charles Mix County, and continued to examine the country until he reached the vicinity of Crow Creek, where he selected a tract, reported at the time to extend twenty miles along the Missouri River, and five miles inland, where he laid out a reservation and erected, or made arrangements for the erection of agency buildings. The colonel made his trip up the river with teams, having a number of men with him, and returned about two months later. He came down in company with Major DeWitt in a steambot yawl and halted again at the capital, where another conference was held with the acting governor and Major DeWitt was appointed trader at the new agency, an appointment which, it appears, the acting governor had authority to make.

The emergency for the removal of the Indians from Minnesota soil became so urgent that barely waiting for Thompson's report, the Santees packed upon a steambot, and sent forward via the Minnesota, Mississippi and Missouri rivers to the newly selected reservation, and the Winnebagoes were to be sent across overland. It will be understood that the Santees, by their acts of hostility, had forfeited their Minnesota Reservation and all annuities—in fact the Santees sent to Dakota were a wretched people, destitute and penniless, and subsisted, of course, on the bounty of the Government. It was not the same with the Winnebagoes, still the change was one that brought much suffering and hardship to them, and without any fault of their own. At this time it was understood that the lands occupied for this reservation were set apart as a temporary home for the Indians. It could not have been the design of the Government to give the Santees any reservation or any claim of title to the land, for they were all included as outlaws. Little Crow and all his Santee warriors were in the northern part of the territory that year at war, and seducing the other Sioux tribes to join them. There is no record that any treaty was made with the Santees or Winnebagoes. The latter found their situation a perilous one owing to the hostility of the Sioux toward the Indians of other nations, and they began to desert the reservation for the Omahas, in Nebraska, who were kin-men. So formidable was this movement the troops were called upon to stop it, and several parties of runaway Winnebagoes were captured and sent back to Crow Creek or held as prisoners at Fort Randall. The Santees were removed to Niobrara, two or three years later, and thence to their present reserve in Nebraska, opposite Springfield. The Winnebagoes, after much tribulation, were given a reservation with their relatives in Nebraska. The Crow Creek Reservation, however, was not abandoned, but appears to have been taken possession of by the Yanktonnais tribe of the Sioux, with the consent of the Edmunds treaty commission, late in 1865 or 1866, and when Maj. Joseph R. Hanson was appointed agent of the Upper Missouri Sioux, in 1866, he found them there in force, and he made Crow Creek Agency, or Fort Thompson as it was also called, his headquarters. By the Sherman-Laramie treaty of 1868, the Sioux nation relinquished all title or claim to lands east of the Missouri River, except such reservations as had been established with particular tribes by separate treaties (the Yankton and Sisseton reserve falling under this head). In 1866 President Grant issued a proclamation withdrawing a large strip of public land bordering the Missouri River on the east, from market. These lands were not occupied by the whites at the time except a small community in Brule County at and around Brule City. The strip extended from Charles Mix County to Burleigh County, and included the Crow Creek Reservation, and appears to have been the first authorized withdrawal of that reservation from the public domain. This proclamation was induced to prevent the illicit trade in intoxicants which seemed to have become quite a business along the river, and as the Indians were among the purchasers, the traffic became a serious menace to the peace of the frontier. President Hayes subsequently issued his proclamation restoring this strip to the public domain, so that the Crow Creek Reservation must have then been placed again among the open lands subject to settlement.

The Sherman treaty of 1868, by which the Sioux tribes relinquished all claim to lands east of the Missouri, would have been sufficient to transfer the Indian title to the Crow Creek reserve had not the Yankton treaty transferred it ten years earlier. It was therefore difficult for the early Dakota people, who were familiar with the early stages of the Indian occupation, to understand why there should be so much uncertainty regarding the status of the lands in later years. There was no question but the reservation so-called was first laid on land purchased by the Government under the same treaty that ceded Union, Clay, Yankton, Bon Homme, and all the other counties extending as far north as Spink County.

While the conditions regarding the status of the Crow Creek lands were being generally discussed, east and west, the Congregational societies of Dakota held their annual conference of 1885 at Sioux Falls, and felt called upon "to pour oil on the troubled water" by an expression of their sentiments upon the pending difficulties growing out of the unsettled question of ownership of the reservation. Their resolutions were generally commended as timely and wise. Two of these declarations will suffice to show their general tenor, and are here copied:

Resolved, That we respectfully memorialize President Cleveland to suspend the execution of his order until Congress can make some equitable settlement of this vexed question in such way that the rights and interests of the Indians may be protected and the conceivable damage and loss be averted from a multitude of innocent white settlers.

Resolved, That we urge upon the eastern friends of the Indian that they be more careful as to what reports they endorse and circulate, inasmuch as misrepresentations are circulated to needlessly exasperate the people upon whom they reflect, and whose good-will and co-operation are essential to the attainment of the best results.

The resolutions were prepared by Dr. A. L. Riggs, a life-time Indian missionary, who argued that "the great need of the Indians was not more land, but more missionaries."

The question as to what constitutes a reservation must be considered. "A district of country set apart for the exclusive use of a tribe of Indians, the boundaries of which have been defined and mutually agreed upon by representatives of the Government on the one part and by the chiefs and headmen of the Indians on the other part; the subsequent ratification of the agreement by the Senate and proclamation thereof by the President," constitutes a legal reservation. The Crow Creek district lacked every one of the points mentioned. No tribe or part of a tribe or band of Indians ever had anything to do with setting it apart for the use of any tribe, and there was none that laid any claim to it except by right of being there by consent of the Government, prior to these claims made in 1885.

GENERAL CAMPBELL'S STATEMENT

Gen. Charles T. Campbell, the founder of Scotland, Bon Homme County, had been an officer in the Pennsylvania volunteer service during the early years of the war, was so disabled by wounds received in battle as to unfit him for service in the field, and was appointed or assigned to duty as inspector general in the Department of Dakota early in 1863. He was well acquainted with the entire preliminary transaction of taking over the Crow Creek lands by Colonel Thompson in 1863, and for ten years following was employed either in the military service or Indian service in the Missouri Valley from Fort Randall and above, and his statement regarding the status of the Crow Creek Reservation has the merit of personal recollection of the original events, and were not made upon second-hand authority. His statement supports the contention that the Crow Creek Reservation had not been set apart as an Indian reservation. Here follows his statement:

The Crow Creek reservation was surveyed in 1863 for the purpose of making it a place of rendezvous for straggling Indians from the scenes of the Minnesota massacre—the Santees and Winnebagoes - and it was abandoned by those Indians after a brief residence. The land upon which they had squatted originally belonged to the Yankton Sioux, and was ceded by that tribe to the Government of the United States in 1858, the Yanktons reserving the tract in Charles Mix County, where they now live.

In 1865, after the Sioux war, many Sioux of different bands came down the river to make the treaties of peace. Some of the Lower Brules, the Two Kettles and Yanktonais bands, finding the Santees and Winnebagoes gone, and an Indian agent there in charge of the improvements and with some supplies, they halted at the agency, and remained.

These Indians had all been in hostility to the Government, but had been badly defeated and were now making peace treaties through the Edmunds Peace Commission, and not only these, but all the heretofore hostile tribes along the river, and by their hostile acts had, of course, forfeited all claim upon the Government. But the Government, for humane reasons, was bound to supply them with food and to keep them from starving, and also felt that it was a wise policy to do so, and therefore the Interior Department made the Crow Creek Agency the first point on the river for the late hostile bands of Sioux, as they were called, and since it has been continued as such. There was no guarantee to the Sioux that any of the lands were to be given them, nor did they at any time claim these lands. The Indians knew that the lands previously belonged to the Yanktons, and that the Yanktons ceded it to the United States, and secured annuities in consideration of such sale. At the time the reservation was surveyed and the land entered upon by the Winnebagoes, no Sioux were there. The Sioux never claimed it as their land.

I was, from September, 1866, until June, 1886, special agent for these nine bands of Sioux, was with them in all their councils in camp and in Washington City—purchased for them their annuities and delivered to them their first annuities in 1866. I was present when Commissioner of Indian Affairs Parker and General Sully were sent out by the Interior Department to make further treaties in June, 1867, at old Fort Sully. I was with the Peace Commission in 1868, composed of Generals Sherman, Harney, Terry, Sanborn, and Sen. J. B. Henderson, and Commissioner of Indian Affairs Taylor. No grant, no assurance, no promise was ever made to the present Sioux squatters that they should hold this land as their own. In fact, there was but one treaty made with the nine bands of Sioux, and General Sherman is mistaken when he says he thinks some grant was given them when the commission was with them in 1868. No provision was made, no paper signed, relative to that land at this time or any other time.

This statement made by General Campbell is history, and is substantially confirmed in every particular by Maj. J. R. Hanson, of Yankton, who was then agent at Crow Creek Agency, and now a citizen of Yankton.

In 1877, by authority of the treaty made with the Sioux in 1876 when the Black Hills was transferred, a wagon road had been laid out from Pierre to the Hills which had been extensively used for over ten years, and a number of whites had settled along the grand highway, and opened eating and lodging houses, built stables, and kept supplies needed by immigrants, for sale, beside providing accommodations for the traveling community. This may have been contrary to the strict terms of the treaty, but it was absolutely essential for the welfare of the strieters and the multitude of gold seekers going in to the Dakota Eldorado. The time came, however, in 1887, when it was deemed best to exclude these trespassers and in May, 1887, the following official order was promulgated by the United States agent at the Cheyenne Agency, under whose territorial jurisdiction the broad highway to the Hills was located.

To All White Men Holding Cattle on the Cheyenne River Agency Reserve:

Gentlemen: You are hereby notified that in accordance with the orders of the honorable secretary of the interior, dated April 21, 1887, and the honorable commissioner of Indian affairs, dated April 27, 1887, you are required to remove your cattlemen and cattle from this reserve at a date not later than May 31, 1887. All cattlemen and cattle found on this reserve after May 31, 1887, will be removed by me under section 2140 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

CHAS. E. MCCHESENEY, U. S. Indian Agent.

The region of country within the jurisdiction of the Indian agent at Cheyenne Agency included the historic landing place known as Fort Pierre, where had sprung up a considerable village to meet the necessities of the Black Hills business and travel. The agent's jurisdiction also covered the country bordering the old freight and stage route leading from Fort Pierre to the crossing of the south branch of the Cheyenne River. Along this route were several ranches kept by white men who maintain extensive cattle herds. There was a clause in the treaty with the Sioux made in 1876, granting right of way for three wagon roads through the Sioux Reservation. In 1877, under this clause in the treaty, and an act of the Dakota Legislature, Governor Pennington caused to be surveyed two roads from the Missouri River to the Black Hills. One of these roads began at Bismarck and terminated at Deadwood. With this road the order of the Cheyenne agent did not interfere. The other road began at a point on the Missouri River designated as Chantier Creek, which was about twenty miles above Fort Pierre, and the intention was to change the landing place for Black Hills travel from the Pierre landing to Chantier. But the road leading up the Missouri highlands out of Chantier proved unsuitable and impracticable and was virtually abandoned by the freighters and travelers and Fort Pierre and Old Fort George twelve miles below remained the shipping point. This Fort George road was laid out by the Government, under the personal supervision of Col. Fred Grant and was approved by General Sheridan. Both the Pierre road and the Fort George road converged at points further west, on the original Chantier survey, and followed the same track into the Hills.

This road laid out under General Sheridan's order was undoubtedly one of the lawful roads provided for in the treaty of 1876, and the Bismarck road, if it crossed any part of the reservation, was another, but there appears to have been no Government approval of the Pierre or Chantier roads, though the latter was surveyed and opened under an act of the Territorial Legislature of 1877, presumably with some understanding with the war or interior departments, whichever had jurisdiction under the treaty.

This situation placed Fort Pierre in the attitude of trespasser on the Indian domain, for no authority existed for the whites to occupy that point. A determined effort was made to dispossess the inhabitants at Fort Pierre in 1875 before the treaty was made. A column of soldiers was sent down from Fort Sully who succeeded in stampeding about two hundred freighters who were encamped there. The freighters retreated without offering any resistance, and crossed the reservation going to the Hills, and it was afterwards claimed that on this journey the retreating column marked out the trail which became somewhat celebrated afterwards as the Pierre route to the gold fields. A well known frontiersman, John Dillon, who was a leader and employer and shipper, in the overland freighting business, remained at Pierre at this time, being a member of the nation by reason of his marriage to an Indian woman of the Cheyenne tribe. The soldiers returned to Fort Sully, and Dillon set about re-establishing the freighters' settlement at Fort Pierre. In this he had been quite successful for that point had been the chief outfitting and shipping point for Black Hills parties and merchandise, on the Missouri River.

Major McLaughlin's order was not designed to interfere with travel on the lawful thoroughfare but was directed against all whites who had settled either at Pierre or at points along the routes and established live stock ranches.

CLEVELAND'S INDIAN RECOMMENDATIONS

In his first message to Congress, December, 1885, President Cleveland avoided committing himself to the effort then being made to secure from the Sioux a part of the Great Sioux Reservation, which had been so urgently but unsuccessfully pursued by the preceding administration. He was pre-disposed to listen to the desires of the Indian—he unquestionably believed that the Indians had suffered much injustice from the agents of the Government in the cession of their lands and in the non-fulfillment by the Government of its Indian treaties, for he had only to read the report of the commission which made the Black Hills treaty in 1876, to find abundant authority for such belief. While he did not antagonize the peace policy which had been pursued for over fifteen years past with excellent success, he was reluctant to favor further efforts that meant the diminishing of the Indian domain, under an impression that the Indian had already given up as much of his domain, and probably more, than his welfare demanded. In closing his review of the Indian question, he says:

I recommend the passage of a law authorizing the appointment of six commissioners, three of whom shall be detailed from the army, to be charged with the duty of a careful inspection of all Indians upon our reservations, or subject to the care and control of the Government, with a view of discovering their exact condition and needs, and determining what steps shall be taken on behalf of the Government to improve their situation in the direction of their self-support and complete civilization. That they ascertain from such inspection what, if any, of the reservations may be reduced in area, and in such cases what part not needed for Indian occupation may be purchased by the Government from the Indians and disposed of for their benefit. What, if any, Indians may with their consent be removed to other reservations with a view to their concentration. The powers and functions of the commission should be strictly defined.

Congress evidently was not favorably impressed with the President's suggestion for a commission of six, who could ascertain little more by the investigation recommended than was already officially and correctly known from the proceedings of the commissioners who had already gone over the field during the past three years, supplemented by the investigation of the Logan Committee from the Senate, and from the councils held with the Indians in Washington and on their reservations. No serious effort appears to have made to act upon the recommendation of the message, but bills were introduced to pursue the plan already undertaken, though little or no progress was made in any way during the first three years of Cleveland's term, and this may have been due to the knowledge that the legislative and executive departments were not in agreement on the Indian policy. Mr. Cleveland's extreme reluctance to signing the bill finally passed in 1887-88 indicates his want of confidence in that plan of procedure.

The President made no mention of the effort being made to divide the Territory of Dakota, or in reference to statehood. In fact he quietly ignored the Dakota question, certainly not through ignorance of the existence of the territory, for he had been almost daily besieged by Dakotans who were applicants for office, many of whom were successful in securing an appointment. He found his party in Dakota awkwardly divided on many matters, and possibly wisely, he decided not to commit himself regarding the division project. And he was astute enough to preserve his non-committal attitude to the close of his term, unless his approval of the Omnibus bill under which the states were admitted and which was passed during the last days of his term, signified his friendliness for the division and statehood programme.

In June following the President had concluded that there might be an injustice inflicted upon the whites should they be forcibly evicted, and he therefore determined to let them remain on the land and await the action of Congress at the next session. He proposed at that time to let the matter rest until Congress should assemble in December, and then lay the situation at Crow Creek before that body. Again shortly following this determination, hostile counsel appears to have control of the mind of the chief magistrate and his cabinet, and quite contrary to the expectation of the settlers on the disputed lands, the President insisted upon the removal of the whites, by military force if necessary, and in September the agent at Crow Creek, Maj. John Gassman, gave out an order received from the Indian bureau at Washington, ordering all whites to remove from the lands within twenty days. That he had been given authority to call for a military force to compel the removal, in case the settlers refused to obey this order. The settlers appear to have been anticipating an order of this kind, and had agreed to stand together and remain on their claims, until forced off by the bayonets of the troops.

Delegate Gifford, of Dakota, had advised the settlers to vacate when ordered off by the troops, if any were sent, and to return again to their claims when the troops left.

Senator Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana, a member of the Senate committee on Indian affairs, with others of the committee, visited the Crow Creek Reservation in July, 1885, and made a personal official investigation of the situation. The other members of the Senate committee were Ingalls, of Kansas, and Jones, of Arkansas. Ex-Delegate Pettigrew accompanied the commission to Crow Creek. The senators also visited Pierre and Chamberlain, and took considerable testimony regarding the reservation question. They found the conditions radically different from the representations that had been made to the President, this much they admitted, but made no further statement.

About forty patients confined in the insane hospital at Yankton, who had been sent to that institution from counties north of the 46th parallel, were removed to the new North Dakota hospital for the insane at Jamestown, on the 26th of May, 1885. For practical purposes this would indicate that the territory was already divided.

Thirty-five territorial prisoners that had been sent to the penitentiary at Sioux Falls from counties north of the 46th parallel, were transferred to the new penitentiary at Bismarck in 1885. The law required this, though there was abundant accommodation and employment for the imprisoned men at Sioux Falls.

The commission appointed by the department of justice at Washington consisting of Chief Justice Edgerton, U. S. Marshal Allen, Secretary of the Territory Teller, and Lieutenant Kingman, U. S. A., to inspect the newly completed United States wing of the penitentiary at Sioux Falls, examined the structure, formally accepted it as responding to the law's requirements, and turned the property and the keys over to the United States marshal.

The colony of Icelanders in Pembina County was increased by the coming in of about three hundred of their countrymen direct from the Fatherland, in the fall of 1882.

January 28th, 1886, Senator Sherman of Ohio introduced his famous silver purchase bill, which provided for discontinuing the coinage of silver dollars, and for the purchase of silver bullion in bars at the rate of not less than two million ounces a month, and not more than four million ounces a month, at the market price, and for the issue, in payment thereof, of coin certificates of not less denomination than ten dollars each, the bullion to remain in the treasury as security for the payment of the certificates. The bill became a law, and became a tremendous factor in our national politics.

THE SUPREME JUDGES

The Supreme Court of Dakota held its session at Yankton beginning Monday, May 11th, 1885. As there were six judges and all were republicans, all felt that they were probably assembled for the last time, and that before another session their places would be filled by representatives of the democratic party, by appointment from President Cleveland. A brief description of these officials at this time when they were about to transfer their ermine to brothers of the profession who represented a different school of politics, may not be out of place. As they sat in the court room, Chief Justice Alonzo Edgerton occupied the central seat. The chief justice was a robust man, well formed, full face with a beard sprinkled with gray, rather full, falling from a firmly set chin. The judge was about five feet nine inches in height, and ought to have weighed about two hundred pounds. He was a wide awake, genial gentleman, a well read lawyer and a student always. He possessed the confidence and esteem of his brother judges, and of the lawyers and of the people.

To the left of Judge Edgerton sat Judge Hudson, of Fargo, an elderly gentleman, a little taller than the chief justice, and no match for him on the scales, but he was a man of fine appearance, dignified and scholarly, and also was highly esteemed as an official and in private life.

To the right of the chief justice sat Judge Church of the Black Hills district, who from his appearance would be taken as the youngest member of the court. He was also the shortest of the members, a studious and deliberate appearing judge, and was reputed to be well learned in jurisprudence. He had been appointed by President Arthur from New York.

To the left of Judge Church sat Judge Palmer, of Sioux Falls, also a man on the sunny side of life, tall, well formed, active, with a student head surmounted by an abundance of hair tastefully trimmed. He was a bright lawyer and had given fairly good satisfaction as a judge, though his intimacy with Governor Ordway may have been to his disadvantage. He had not been as circumspect off the bench as he might have been, entangling himself somewhat with the organization of counties at Devil's Lake to oblige his gubernatorial friend and fellow emigrant from New England.

At the left of Judge Palmer sat Judge Francis, of Bismarck, a tall, strongly built man, whose strangely shaped beard gave him an unusual appearance that would have attracted attention off the bench. He was one of the newest members of the court, having been appointed about a year earlier, but his reputation as a lawyer was high among the fraternity and he had proved himself a capable and upright jurist.

Judge Seward Smith, of Huron, had his seat at the right of Judge Church. In appearance, Judge Smith was the oldest man on the bench, rather delicate in his physical makeup for a Dakotan, and from the fifth district, which covered nearly a score of counties stretching from the Missouri to the eastern boundary. Nearly all the fiery county seat contests had occurred in his district, and he was on the road all the time when he was not holding court. Possibly this excessive and inexcusable activity had been indulged at the cost of his health. He was regarded with great respect by the lawyers and esteemed for his ability. His district furnished few cases for the Supreme court.

The circle was soon to be broken. Judge Hudson's term had about expired, and his successor had been named, a Mr. McConnell, of the Fargo bar, who became the first of Mr. Cleveland's appointments in Dakota.

The members of the bar present at this term were Edwin VanCise and Judge McLaughlin, of Deadwood; Fossett and Holmes, of Pierre; Ayres, of Huron; Miller and Walling, of Fargo; Westover, of Pierre; Thomas and Greene, of Fargo; Bromley, of Redfield; Briggs, of Moorhead; Bryant, of Sioux Falls; Holmes, of Pierre, and Bartlett Tripp, J. R. Gamble, Hugh J. Campbell, L. B. French, E. G. Smith, and William P. Dewey, of Yankton.

Col. C. A. Lounsberry, editor of the Journal at Bismarck had a very clear perception of the territorial situation in 1885, being one of the pioneers of Northern Dakota and always an intelligent representative of its substantial and best interests. He was frequently in Washington and had excellent opportunities for learning the temper of Congress toward Dakota in 1885, and in stating his conclusions regarding division said it could be gained if the question of statehood should be dropped and only division asked for. The opposition to the statehood movement in South Dakota, he believed, would be misunderstood, and the impression created that the people of Dakota did not desire division. He said:

If Bartlett Tripp, Dan Maratta, Barney Caulfield and Judge McConnell could go to Washington and bring the matter before Congress, the republican politicians staying at home, the division of Dakota could be accomplished. It would have been accomplished three years ago had Judge Moody's delegation been satisfied with division. The memory of Colorado was too fresh in democratic minds to lead them to try the experience again.

The colonel also said he resigned his position as postmaster at Bismarck because he was a republican, and did not care to hang, or seem to hang onto the skirts of the democratic party for the sake of saving a few month's salary. He believed republicans holding presidential appointments ought to resign, and that those who did not resign ought to be removed, for when the administration became democratic in all its parts then the people could judge as to whether democracy or republicanism was most desirable.

United States Senator Manderson, of Nebraska, a member of the Senate Committee of Territories spent several months during the fall of 1885 journeying through Dakota, gathering information at first hands concerning the division sentiment among the people, and also regarding the Indians in connection with the opening of a portion of the Great Sioux Reservation then pending. He visited a number of the cities as well as the Indian agencies. At Huron the people gave him an official reception befitting such an occasion, and adopted resolutions expressive of their appreciation of his visit and the public work he was promoting, a finely engrossed copy of which was presented to the senator. The senator expressed the most earnest friendship for Dakota—she was a sister to be proud of. He said there would be as much reason in consolidating Kansas and Nebraska as to advocate the admission of all of Dakota Territory as one state, and predicted that division was bound to come.

Already there appeared to be a North Dakota and a South Dakota and the prevailing custom was to speak of the sections as already constituting separate governments. Governor Pierce was somewhat partial to the northern section where his residence was fixed, and he was inclined to give object lessons by his official acts, which exhibited to the denizens of the southern section how great the inconveniences that were endured by the north in earlier years when the south half held the sceptre of power and authority.

The Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate introduced a bill on the 19th of December, 1885, providing for a Supreme Court of Dakota, having eight members including the chief justice, an addition of two. The territory was divided by the bill, into eight districts, the Fifth District as it then existed to be carved into three districts that were numbered fifth, seventh, eighth. The fifth included the following counties: Beadle, Kingsbury, Brookings, Spink, Hand, Hyde and Hughes counties. The Seventh District embraced Brown, Edmunds, McPherson, Campbell, Walworth, Potter, Faulk and Sully counties. The Eighth District was composed of Clark, Day, Marshall, Codington, Hamlin, Deuel, Grant, Roberts and the Sisseton Reservation. The bill became a law.

SPRING IMMIGRATION

The spring immigration from the eastern and central states to Dakota in 1886 began to be quite noticeable late in February and during a portion of March, indicating that the country had not been drained of the class who were inclined to go to the Northwest in search of homes and prosperity. There was at this time considerable Government land between the James and Missouri rivers south of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and these early comers had evidently been informed of the advantages of that large section, for nearly all made their way to the counties within that boundary. The Bismarck land district was also in favor with the homeseekers, and embraced millions of acres of the famous wheat lands. The early indications pointed to an unusually heavy immigration to the Deadwood district where a large area of fertile territory remained unclaimed but providing most excellent pasturage for the cattle kings. A new railroad was being built out from Rapid City, northwest, that would be of great advantage to the grain growers and live stock interests of the Black Hills region, and the railroad was also expected to pierce within the confines of the mineral regions into the very heart of the mountains.

The Missouri River broke up on the 22d of March, 1886, and the only incident of importance that accompanied it was an overflow, the result of a gorge, that for the first time in its history covered the Town of Elk Point. It was mentioned that Dr. L. C. Mead was at the heart of the overflowed district the day following the inundation which was the result of a gorge in the Missouri, going by boat from Elk Point on professional business several miles south, then by team one and a half miles, then the remainder of the eight miles southeast by boat. He found a depth of water averaging from one to three feet, farm houses were surrounded, the water entering the lower floor of some of them. Some ten thousand acres appeared to be covered, but the live stock was safe and no serious damage had occurred and none followed. When Elk Point was founded, the fact that it was "out of water" during a serious flood, recommended it as the place to build a town, and it had been able to escape the floods of the Missouri for over twenty years.

DAKOTA BAR ASSOCIATION

The Dakota Bar Association was organized by the judges and attorneys in attendance upon the Supreme Court at Yankton on Thursday, May 14, 1885. Preliminary meetings had been held and a committee appointed to draft articles of incorporation. The meeting was presided over by Hon. Bartlett Tripp, of Yankton, with J. H. Westover, of Pierre, as secretary. John R. Gamble, chairman of the committee to draft articles of incorporation, presented the report of the committee, and stated that after a full examination of the statutes it had been found that the bar association under the organic act had a right to incorporate itself under the nominal form of a scientific association. It was therefore asserted in the articles that the association existed for the purpose of fostering and cultivating the science of the law and for procuring and maintaining a public library.

The name agreed upon was "The Dakota Bar Association." There was no limit to its existence. Seven directors were provided for in the articles, one from each judicial district and one at large. The report of the committee was adopted section by section.

On motion of A. D. Thomas, of Fargo, Yankton was named as the principal place of business of the incorporation. Seven directors were then elected by ballot, as follows: First District, Edwin Van Cise, of Deadwood; Second District, John R. Gamble, of Yankton; Third District, Alfred D. Thomas, of Fargo; Fourth District, J. W. Taylor, of Canton; Fifth District, J. H. Westover, of Pierre; Sixth District, J. A. Height, of Bismarck; at large, Bartlett Tripp, of Yankton.

The attorneys then stepped forward and signed the articles of incorporation.

The charter members of the association: A. J. Edgerton, Alfred Wallin, Hugh J. Campbell, M. W. Greene, A. D. Thomas, S. V. Jones, Edwin Van Cise, E. R. Horner, J. A. Holmes, M. E. Rudolph, W. C. Faucett, E. T. White, R. J. Gamble, J. W. Taylor, W. H. Francis, James A. Haight, J. H. Westover, John R. Gamble, L. B. French, E. G. Smith, W. E. Church, C. S. Palmer, L. E. Sweezy, W. B. McConnell, C. H. Winsor, Geo. R. Wilson, Seth Newman, A. W. Hastie, John R. Wilson, T. J. Walsh, W. E. Dodge, C. B. Kennedy, John E. Carland, C. T. Howard, George Rice, C. A. Pollock, F. L. Soper, I. W. Goodner, T. B. McMartin, Calvin J. B. Harris.

A meeting of the board of directors was appointed for a later date when the officers of the board would be chosen.

The bar association held an adjourned session during the term of the Supreme Court at Yankton, a year later, and completed the organization, which had lacked some essential details at the first meeting. At this meeting in 1866, a board of directors was appointed, consisting of Bartlett Tripp and John R. Gamble, Yankton; J. H. Westover, Pierre; A. D. Thomas, Fargo; F. Van Cise, Deadwood; J. W. Taylor, Canton; James A. Haight, Bismarck. This board of directors elected Judge Bartlett Tripp, president, and J. H. Westover, secretary.

Two delegates were elected to the National Bar Association to be held at Saratoga, N. Y., in August, 1886, and C. H. Winsor, of Sioux Falls, and George P. Wilson, of Fargo, were chosen as such delegates, with Judge A. J. Edgerton, of Mitchell, and W. E. Dodge, of Jamestown, as alternates.

Articles of incorporation and a set of by-laws were presented by a committee composed of R. J. Gamble, A. C. Davis and L. B. French, of Yankton, which were approved and adopted and the articles of incorporation ordered filed in the office of the secretary of the territory.

TREATY OF CESSION WITH MANDANS AND OTHERS

A treaty was concluded with the Mandan, Gos Ventres, and Arickaree Indians by the Northwest Indian commission in December, 1886, whereby the Indians ceded to the United States all that portion of their reservation lying north of the 48th parallel of north latitude, and also the larger portion of the territory lying between the Missouri River and the Fort Buford military reservation. The Indians also agreed to take lands in severalty on their diminished reservation east of the Missouri.

This treaty was a matter for congratulation especially in the northern part of Dakota. The Northwestern Indian commission, composed of Messrs. Wright, Daniels and Larabee, negotiated the agreement. Nearly two million acres of land was transferred to the Government by the terms of the treaty, leaving an ample reservation on both sides of the river for the Arabs of the upper river. Fort Berthold was among the oldest and most famous Indian agencies of the United States, owing to its being the home of the Mandans, the tribe, part of whom were reputed to have descended from Prince Modoc's Welsh colonists who are supposed to have been hopelessly stranded on the western hemisphere during the twelfth century. The number of Indians treated with was about thirteen hundred.

The same board of commissioners were expected to conduct the negotiations for Sioux Indian lauds west of the Missouri as soon as the Dawes bill became a law, which, however, it failed to do during the year.

The Gros Ventres, Arikaree and Mandan Reserve as claimed by those Indians was thus described:

Beginning at the mouth of Heart River, and following up the Missouri to the mouth of the Yellowstone; thence up the Yellowstone to the mouth of Powder River; thence in a direct line to the headwaters of Heart River; thence down that stream to the place of beginning.

This reservation was recognized by the Government's treaty commission in 1865 when Fort Stevenson was located.

BOUNDARIES OF THE TURTLE MOUNT RESERVE

The commissioner of the general land office, Mr. Sparks, after considering the question of claims of the Turtle Mountain Chippewa Indians to a reservation in the northern portion of Northern Dakota decided that the band were entitled to a considerable body of land, much of it already occupied by white settlers. This band of Indians numbered about three hundred and fifty persons. The boundaries of the reservation allotted to them by the land commissioner were thus described:

Beginning at a point on the international boundary line about two miles west of the ninety-eighth meridian west from Greenwich, and running parallel with that meridian south to the fourteenth standard parallel, from thence southwestwardly in a direct line to a point on the Cheyenne River in township 150. Thence following the channel of the Cheyenne to its headwaters, bending south in Sheridan County, thence north and west across the southwest corner of McHenry, the northeast corner of Stevens, and the southwest corner of Ward County, terminating in that direction at a point in Mountrail County twelve miles west of the 102d meridian of longitude; thence due north to the international boundary; thence to the place of beginning.

The reservation included the entire counties of Towner, Rolette, Bottineau, Wynn, Renville, Ward, Ramsey, and DeSmet, and the larger portion of the counties of Cavalier, McHenry and Benson, and a part of Mountrail, Stevens, Sheridan and Walsh.

DEATH OF JOHN B. RAYMOND

EX-Delegate to Congress John B. Raymond died at his home in Fargo on Sunday, January 3, 1886, of typhoid pneumonia. His illness was of short duration.

John Baldwin Raymond was born at Lockport, Niagara County, N. Y., December 5, 1854, removed with his parents to Tazewell County, Ill., in 1853. At the breaking out of the Civil war in 1861, he enlisted as a private from that county in the Thirty-first Illinois Infantry under Col. John A. Logan. Raymond was promoted to be captain of Company E of that regiment after the siege of Vicksburg in 1863. He served through the war, and remained in Mississippi after being mustered out. He published the Mississippi Pilot at Jackson, Miss., during the reconstruction of that state, and until 1877, when he was appointed by President Hayes to the office of United States marshal of Dakota Territory. He declined reappointment in 1881. He was nominated for delegate to Congress by the republican convention of Dakota in 1882, and elected by a majority of over thirty thousand. His term expired in March, 1885, since which he had given his attention to wheat farming in the northern part of the territory. Concerning his brief illness and sudden death it was learned that on Tuesday night previous to his death he went from his boarding house at Mr. Polk's where with his son Warren he was making his home to Mr. Folsom's in order to telephone some instructions to his farm, and while warming himself by the stove at Folsom's he remarked, "I have a severe pain in my left shoulder that I do not understand." He returned to his boarding place, and just as he reached Mr. Polk's door, and before opening it he fell unconscious, and was shortly after found and removed to his chamber. Physicians were called and pronounced him seriously ill, but until Friday he was not regarded in a dangerous condition. He was buried at the Arlington Cemetery near Washington.

STATE LEAGUE PUBLIC MEETINGS

Public meetings were held during the summer in every portion of the proposed new state which were addressed by the ablest speakers the territory could muster, and there were many of them for the purpose of increasing the voting strength of the state league, it being manifest that there had crept into the statehood movement an element of estrangement, which divided them into a conservative and a radical faction—the latter inclined, in the event of the failure of Congress to afford the desired relief to set the machinery of the new state in motion independent of the will of the majority of Congress. The former opposed this. The State League, however, was not committed to the radical program but favored the election of members of the Territorial Legislature, which election would come on in November of representatives who were uncompromisingly for division and statehood, in order that the Legislature might be depended upon to give the weight of its authority, lawfully expressed, in favor of these objects. As the aims of the league were clearly defined with no ambiguity, the popular approval of its purposes appeared most emphatic and nearly unanimous, after a very thorough canvass of the south portion of the territory. In fact there seemed to be so little opposition that there was an abatement of the vigor which had characterized the first months of the campaign.

At the same time the preliminary campaign for the territorial conventions, called for nominating a candidate for delegate to Congress, was claiming its share of public attention. On the republican side Delegate Gifford, who desired a re-election, was opposed by United States Marshal Harrison Allen, of Fargo, while Minnehaha County was supporting a home candidate, Hon. Melvin Grigsby, giving to the contest as between Gifford and Allen, a sectional aspect, which in fact it was—the north against the south. The issues of division and statehood were not in question, but were apparently affirmatively supported by all factions.

The Democratic Territorial Convention was called for September 29th, a week later than the republican convention, and Hon. John R. Wilson, of Deadwood, appeared to have the lead for the delegate nomination. The democratic nomination was a matter of considerable importance at this time, owing to the change in the executive department at Washington, and though the candidate would probably be defeated at the polls, the nomination would entitle him to the position of a leader and give him a potent voice with the President concerning Dakota affairs. It was also a rule in politics that defeated candidates, who were worthy men, were entitled to substantial recognition by the appointing power. The public mind may be said to have been largely occupied with politics during 1886, as much so as in any year of Dakota's territorial history, but there was no undue excitement at any time—none of the intensity of feeling that marked the course of events in 1883.

TERRITORIAL REPUBLICAN CONVENTION

The official call for the Republican Territorial Convention of 1886 was published in June, calling the convention at Yankton in September. The following gives the text of the call and the names and number of delegates each county was entitled to. There were eighty-seven counties, and the aggregate number of delegates was 498, as follows:

The Republican Territorial Convention will be held in Yankton on Wednesday, September 22, 1886, at 10 o'clock A. M. The convention will be called to order by the chairman of this committee, or in his absence by some other person to be selected by the members of this committee present, for the purpose of placing in nomination a candidate for delegate to Congress and transacting such other business as may properly come before said convention.

In said convention the representation shall be one delegate from each organized county, and additional delegates based upon the population of said counties, according to the territorial census of 1885, at the rate of one delegate to said Territorial Convention for each 1,000 inhabitants or major fraction thereof.

Counties organized subject subsequent to this call and prior to the convention shall be entitled to one delegate each upon the presentation of a certificate from the proper territorial officials of each organization.

Done at Aberdeen, D. T., June 22, 1886.

S. H. ELROD, Secretary.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted by the committee:

Resolved, Believing it would be of advantage to the party, this committee recommend to the next Territorial Convention that the Republican Central Committee of the territory be selected hereafter as follows: That the delegates from each legislative district be authorized to name a member of the Central Committee and report it to the convention, and that the convention shall select one from each judicial district of the territory, for approval, and one member at large, who shall be chairman. This resolution is presented with the call, in order that members of the convention may be given notification for discussion.

S. H. ELROD, Secretary.

A. C. MELLETTE, Chairman.

The fourteenth biennial convention of the republican party of the territory was held at Yankton on Wednesday, September 22, 1886. The convention was composed of 504 delegates, every county being represented. Prior to the meeting of the convention the Gifford forces, which were largely in the majority, held a caucus at which a temporary and permanent organization of the convention was agreed upon.

The Allen delegates, who were mostly from the northern counties, likewise held a caucus, but were unable to effect any combination that encouraged further effort in the direction of Allen's nomination, and their caucus adjourned without taking any formal action.

Colonel Grigsby's friends were evidently expecting that the Allen and Gifford forces would become entangled in a deadlock which would demand the calling in of a third party in order to secure an amicable arrangement. At least that faction held no caucus.

During the hours succeeding the preliminary proceedings mentioned, the various elements came together. Aleck McKenzie, though a staunch democrat, was present with Alexander Hughes and the Burleigh County delegation, and it is presumed that he arranged an amicable agreement whereby the southern portion of the territory should have the candidate for delegate, and the northern section, the chairman of the Territorial Central Committee, a position of considerable importance and influence, and at this time considered only second to the delegateship as a representative of the party. The north therefore felt that it had secured adequate recognition.

The convention was called to order on the morning of the 22d by Hon. A. C. Mellette, chairman of the Central Committee, who made a brief speech as follows:

Gentlemen: According to usage you meet as the representatives of the republican party of the Territory of Dakota, to place in nomination a candidate for delegate to Congress. I trust that the usual harmony that characterizes Dakota's political conventions may prevail among you. (Applause.) That that spirit of fairness and justice, for which you are proverbially noted on such occasions may possess you, and that you will do everything that is necessary to be done at this time to strengthen republicanism in this territory. The reign of the infamous organization, called by some and known as the democratic party, has never subsidized nor terrorized the republicanism of Dakota. (Applause.) I may say, too, that you have not been victimized by that tempting bait, so invitingly held out at the White House, and known as fricaseed mugwump, angle worm bait. (Applause.) You have not been deceived by it. It will hang before you undisturbed. While the rest of the administrative powers of the earth seem to be against you, an almighty and just God smiles upon you. He makes fruitful your glorious prairies by sunshine and showers, and while he blesses, men may curse. The outrageous infamy practiced upon you by the democratic administration of this country, in denying the right of self-government to a half million American citizens, you can stand. You can even stand the policy of the department which proposes to take from the honest settlers their honest homesteads, for the benefit of the democratic party. You can, if necessary, stand all this, and great reservations filled with worthless Indians. You can withstand it, and prosper and flourish in the future as you have done in the past, to the astonishment of the world, so long as the God of Heaven continues to bless you in this bountiful land. This is strictly a business meeting, gentlemen, and I shall read the call under which you are assembled.

The chairman then read the call as previously printed herein, after which Delegate Taylor, of Lincoln County, nominated Col. B. M. Evans, of Grant County, for temporary chairman, which was seconded by Delegate Hughes, of Burleigh County, and on motion of Mr. Plummer, of Traill County, Colonel Evans was elected by acclamation. This harmonious choice of a temporary chairman removed all apprehensions of an inharmonious convention, and the subsequent proceedings were so devoid of even the appearance of opposition, that it gave a colorless hue to whatever business was transacted. Chairman Mellette appointed Messrs. Hughes, Johnson, and Wheelock to escort the temporary president to the chair of authority, from which place Mr. Evans addressed the convention as follows:

Gentlemen of the Convention and Fellow Republicans:

The ordinary civilities of such an occasion as this compel me to tender you my thanks for the honor which you have conferred. I am deeply sensible of this honor. I would not be content to simply return to you a formal vote of thanks. It would be absurd for me to attempt to hide the gratification I feel because of the honor which you have conferred. I feel that words are unable to express the sentiments of my heart, and I say this in all sincerity, because I regard this convention as the most important that has ever been called together in the Territory of Dakota. It is important, gentlemen, because, as I understand it, it is the first distinctive republican convention which has ever been called together in the territory. It therefore becomes historical in its very nature, a proud event, and more especially because the nominee of this convention will be the congressman elected from the territory. (Applause.) Now, this occasion tempts an enlargement of the themes that occur to me as I stand before you, but I know that we are met here for business, and that whatever I might say would be apparently of little effect upon your determinations, because your divisions, whatever they may be in this convention, are divisions on matters of expediency and matters of practice. Heretofore your divisions have been for personal ends. They have been wrangles for political preferment of individuals, but I feel that in the First Republican Convention gathered in the territory, that all differences of opinion that there may be will be founded upon the principles which characterize the republican party. I thank you again gentlemen for the honor conferred. The next duty, I suppose, will be the nomination of a temporary secretary.

Whereupon Delegate Gamble, of Yankton, named Mr. McManima, of Hughes County, and he was elected.

A committee of nine on credentials was appointed, composed as follows: Falmestock, of Codington; Hunt, of Spink; Taylor, of Lincoln; Bryson, of Potter; Hubbard, of Cass; Parker, of Walworth; Pierce, of Pennington; Durley, of Beadle; and Spencer, of Ramsey.

A Committee on Permanent Organization was appointed, composed as follows: Jones, of Turner; Scott, of Grand Forks; Wheeler, of Morton; Fowler, of Pennington; Boyle, of Minnehaha; Johnson, of Hyde; Dawson, of Clay; Ronald, of Deuel; Randolph, of Brule; Clark, of Custer; Stewart, of Fall River; Bowman, of Brown; Steele, of Kidder.

Mr. Elrod, of Clark County, was elected an additional secretary, and the chair on motion appointed the following named delegates a Committee on Resolutions:

Messrs. Mellette, of Codington; Nickens, of Stutsman; Owen, of Kingsbury; Adams, of Day; Mayhew, of Sanborn; Gamble, of Yankton; Potter, of LaMoure; Talbot, of Minnehaha; Pickler, of Faulk; Skillman, of Brown; Edwards, of Cass; Wilson, of McCook; and Wheelock, of Dawson.

During a waiting period caused by the inability of the Credential Committee to complete its report, addresses were made by Colonel Plummer, a famous orator from the north; by E. W. Caldwell, territorial auditor; by Hon. Johnson Nickens, of Jamestown; and by Gen. Harrison Allen, of Fargo. The Committee on Credentials then made its report, as follows:

Following the adoption of the report came the report of the Committee on Permanent Organization as follows:

For chairman, Judge C. G. Moody, of Lawrence.

Secretaries—John Cain, of Beadle; S. H. Elrod, of Clark, and P. K. Long, of Morton. The report was unanimously adopted, and Messrs. Steele, Moran and Gamble were appointed a committee to conduct the chairman-elect to the platform. Before proceeding with the business of the convention Judge Moody delivered the following address:

Gentlemen of the Convention: I acknowledge to you the obligations I rest under for the honor that you have conferred upon me in selecting me for this position. This is an important epoch in the history of Dakota Territory. It is an important event also in the history of the republican party of the territory, and it is not meet that I should occupy the attention of this assemblage in entering into a discussion at any great length, because you are anxious to return to your homes. But it is proper that I should call your attention to certain questions which have been suggested to me by the conditions which surround us.

It may be said that the entire Territory of Dakota is represented in this republican convention. North, south, east and west are alike represented, and it seems to me that there is a unanimity possessing you which augurs well for the future of the territory, as well as for the future of the great party to which we have the honor to belong. It is true we are debarred from discussing or at least from taking any part in the determinations of governmental affairs. It is true that whatever discussion we may enter into is merely for the purpose of placing ourselves upon record as republicans, supporting republican principles. There are questions which incidentally are important to the people of the United States, in which we are interested and which questions it is proper for us to discuss.

The Territory of Dakota as it stands today is the peer of many states in the Union in every respect which qualify a people for self-government. We are in the position of an outlying colony of the United States Government. If one reflects for a moment he will find that the colonial system, which was so much deprecated by our forefathers, which was claimed to be the correct system by the British government, has been continued by this Government ever since the first acquisition of territory outlying the then states of the Union, while we find that that same British government which our forefathers so justly complained of, has progressed as nations have progressed in civilization and enlightenment, and we now find that these British colonies are today substantially the first government, while the people of the territories are in no sense self-governed.

Now the question of the habiliament of the people of Dakota Territory with statehood and self-government, is a question that is before us, and it is before this great nation, and from now until November is, and will be, heard and depicted the wrongs under which this people suffer. In the State of Maine, during their campaign this summer, the history of the wrongs of the democratic party toward Dakota was given from every stump. You find the same going on in California, you find today the same in Connecticut, and you find again the republican party of Iowa rallying to our assistance. So that it has become a great national question.

Now, the question of the division of this territory, and the question whether it shall come into the Union as one or two states, is a question which is not only for the people of the territory but for the people of the United States. And upon that question the people of the territory may in some sense aid. Year upon year, from the earliest history of the territory, it has been desired, and the people, as it seemed from the expressions made through their representatives, that this great area should be divided, and the political power to which these people were justly entitled should by this division be increased. Then again, taking advantage of the permission which the representatives of this great people accord to the people of South Dakota, South Dakota proceeded in the first instance to prepare herself for admission into the union of states.

That preparation was made and made orderly. It was made wisely, and an application was made to the Congress of the United States. That application, by the republican party, was seconded without dissent. The republican party as represented in the Congress of the United States, has not for one moment refused to concede to the apparently expressed will of the people of Dakota Territory. But, added to the wrongs which the democratic party has committed upon the people of the country, it has added this additional insult and wrong to the people of Dakota Territory. It is true that there are democrats capable of seeing justice, and that they are ready to join with the republicans in giving to this people the justice which it demands, but they were not sufficient in number to control the organization. The consequence was their voices were not heard, but the voices only of those representing the majority could be heard or understood. This has made the democratic party of the United States responsible for the injustice to Dakota. This has put the democrats upon record in such responsibility, and that record is being spread in this campaign all over the United States. The issue is the same precisely that was made by our forefathers when the revolutionary proceedings were originally inaugurated. It is precisely the issue that led up to the Declaration of Independence. It is precisely the issue that was fought out by the revolutionary fathers, and it is the same precise issue that was made long years afterwards, when the plains of Kansas were made to bleed with the blood of our martyrs. It is the question of self-government for the American people.

Upon that issue I have no anxiety so far as the final result shall come. I am satisfied that the great heart of the American people is right. That it will always be found upon the side of right and justice. Time may be required in order to put the sense of this great heart into motion. But the time will come, and we hope it will come speedily, when justice will be done to the people of this great territory.

Now, upon the question of selecting boundaries and area, I recognize the fact that it will be well to take the sense of the people thereon. And therefore I say that there is no citizen of Dakota that will join with greater earnestness, with more earnestness than I will to so arrange that before either of the divisions, as they have been commonly accepted, of this great territory shall be separated one from the other, into separate political organizations, whether separated or whether as one community, let us all understand from now and forever that we are brethren, and brethren of this great Northwest with common interests. (Applause.)

I believe I have nothing to disguise and never had, and believe it is for the interest of the people, that the territory should be divided somewhere near the parallel of latitude that has been named. (Applause.) I believe that it is better for a community when organizing into a state, that it shall be done in a way that will give it a strong and substantial basis, that will give it a compact government, so that every man may know the men that govern him, and every man be able, if he does not know him personally, to ascertain his qualifications. It is a maxim which cannot be disputed, and which has grown with the American nation, that the closer the people are to the Government, the better the people are governed.

Again, I have had the privilege, and it has been a privilege in some respects, to understand the sentiment of the republican party of the nation, as represented by its leading men, and while once there existed a doubt on the side, I am confident that doubt has been thoroughly dissolved, and so long as the republican party is in power in the Senate, I am confident they will not consent to fritter away the political power which belongs to the people by the admission, as one state, of great areas of this great Northwest Territory.

We find that the democratic party has seized with a grip of iron the entire south. It is as solid as the mountain range that passes through its borders. It is no more possible, in my judgment, to loosen that grip, than it would be, by a great lever, to overturn this great range of mountains.

These, in my judgment, are some of the reasons why we may expect that if we ask admission we must ask it in a way in which we have asked it, as a divided territory, in order to succeed. Let me say to you I know the fact to be that our friends in Congress are perfectly willing that the question of division shall be submitted to a vote of the people of the whole territory. I want to say that it is violating no public confidence that after the bill for admitting South Dakota had passed the Senate, and was pending in the House, our friends on the committee had a consultation with Mr. Gifford and other representatives in Washington. Our friends on the committee offered an amendment to the bill, submitting the question of the division of the territory, and making the admission of South Dakota dependent upon a vote of the people. That is just and right. Let me say to you again, so far as I am individually concerned, while I do not believe it is possible to accomplish the admission of Dakota as one state, while I do not believe it is for the best interests of the people to accept admission as one state, I want to get out of this condition, and you all want to get out of it. Our material interests are suffering. We are deprived of the proper use of the courts. Everybody knows the courts are entirely insufficient for the business. We are deprived of representation, and we have taxation without representation. They do not allow us even to spend the money that we raise for taxes. It is expended under the auspices of the Government. We pay them revenue, but they accord us no right to say how any portion of that revenue shall be expended. Honorable gentlemen, pleasant gentlemen, gentlemen of dignity and ability and character, that we like, are sent among us as they were in olden times by the British government. We have no voice in their selection. Though we may learn to love them, there is that in the heart of an American citizen which makes him dislike to be governed by any tribunal in which he has not a voice.

Now, gentlemen, I trust we shall proceed in an orderly manner with the work which we have been entrusted to perform. I have learned with the greatest pleasure of the entire unanimity which has thus far prevailed, and is likely to prevail in this convention. You are to be commended for it. I will say, in my judgment, the example you have set by your forbearance one with another, has placed you before the American people as capable of self-government, and the peer of any nation on the face of the earth. (Applause.) Let us continue with the good humor and harmony which have prevailed. If differences arise among us let us reconcile them as best we may, with justness and fairness. And let us proceed so that we will be commended by our fellow citizens that sent us here, and by our own consciences.

On motion the convention then proceeded to the nomination of a candidate for delegate to Congress; whereupon Hon. Melvin Grigsby, of Minnehaha, who had a considerable following in the convention who had intended to support him for the nomination for delegate, then took the platform and nominated Hon. O. S. Gifford, of Canton, for the office of delegate to Congress. Mr. Grigsby stated that he favored the renomination of Judge Gifford, and division and statehood, and only in the event of Gifford's defeat for the nomination would he become a candidate. The speaker further said, if he was an orator, nothing would afford him more pleasure than to sound the praises of Mr. Gifford which had been fairly earned, but there were occasions when facts and figures spoke with more convincing power. A brief review of Gifford's career in Congress was given, when the speaker concluded by moving that Mr. Gifford be declared, by acclamation, the nominee of the convention for delegate to Congress. (Prolonged applause followed.)

Whereupon Gen. Harrison Allen, of Fargo, who had likewise been a candidate for nomination, took the platform, and in a few appropriately chosen phrases, and with a most charming eloquence, seconded the nomination, and the motion; while Mr. Fowler, of Pennington County, for the Black Hills people, joined in seconding the nomination.

The chair then announced, "As many of you as are in favor of the motion of Mr. Grigsby, will rise in your seats and say 'aye.'" Every delegate rose and with one voice pronounced an unanimous "aye." And the chair then declared O. S. Gifford to be the unanimous nominee of the convention for delegate to Congress.

This proceeding marked the third occasion, when a republican candidate had been named with such unanimity, since the organization of the territory. The first nomination so made was Burleigh in 1864; the second, Kidder in 1874.

Mr. Gifford, by invitation, appeared before the convention and in appropriate terms accepted the nomination and gave a review of Dakota matters before Congress.

Judge C. S. Palmer, of Sioux Falls, appointed one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the territory while the capital commission bill was pending, had become a candidate for delegate, presumably upon the suggestion of ex-Governor Ordway, who favored him because "he was less openly pronounced for division than Gifford," and Mr. Grigsby entered the field to prevent Palmer from carrying the county, and succeeded. Division was made the principal issue, by the republicans, in the pre-convention campaign of 1880.

The committee on resolutions then made their report, which was adopted after much discussion. The text is here given:

Resolved, That the republicans of Dakota, in convention assembled, hereby declare their unwavering support of the principles of the republican party as enunciated in the national platform of 1884, as they are proud of the record of this great party and of its brilliant achievements during the period of a generation of men.

Resolved, That the material and moral interests alike of the Indians and citizens of Dakota, demand the immediate reduction of all the Indian reservations within the limits of the territory to the end that the vast areas of unoccupied lands may be opened to settlement by those seeking homes among us, and as providing means for the civilization and comfort of the Indians, and that we denounce the failure of the democratic House of Representatives to enact the Dawes Bill for opening to settlement a portion of the Great Sioux Reservation, as inexcusable and unexplainable.

Resolved, That the administration of the general land office, under Commissioner Sparks, has been characterized throughout by gross ignorance on his part of the character of the people who have planted the homes, builded the cities and developed the resources of Dakota, or else he has purposely wronged and vilified an honest, loyal and intelligent people. That his policy toward the Northwest, and particularly toward the honest settlers of Dakota, is based neither on law, precedent or justice. That he has reversed the well established principle that a man must be considered innocent until he is proven guilty, and that his oft-repeated statement that ninety per cent of the public land entries in the Northwest are fraudulent, is inspired by ignorance, uttered with malice, and sought to be sustained by the most unwarrantable, unjust, and hitherto unheard of rulings and regulations.

Resolved, That we denounce the vetoes by the President of the bills passed by both Houses of Congress, for the relief of Union soldiers and their widows and orphans, without excuse other than the miserable pretense of economy.

Resolved, That our sympathies go out to Ireland for her grand struggle for home rule. Such aspirations are patriotic and right and without them no people are worthy the name of free men, and may God speed the day when Dakota and Ireland alike, shall enjoy that best boon of free men, a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people" in all local affairs.

Resolved, That recognizing the liquor traffic as an evil, this convention declares in favor of the home as against the saloon, and pledges the party to such legislation as is necessary to protect the people of the territory from the evil influences of the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage.

Resolved, That the will of the people of all Dakota in favor of division of territory on an east and west line, has been so clearly and so frequently expressed during the past fifteen years, that there is no reasonable doubt of the determined purpose of a large majority to hold on steadfastly till this purpose is accomplished, and we earnestly ask Congress to pass such a measure without delay, said division to be on the boundary line of counties nearest the 46th parallel of north latitude.

Resolved, That we heartily believe in the legality of the movement of the people of South Dakota, to organize a state government, and that the defeat of the Harrison Senate Bill in the House of Representatives was a blow at civil liberty.

The forming of the Territorial Republican Central Committee was the concluding work of the convention, and occupied much time. The following were named as members of that important committee for the succeeding two years:

Harrison Allen, Cass County, chairman; R. W. Wheelock, of Davison County, secretary; J. C. McManima, Hughes; J. V. Stearns, Brule; A. W. Lavender, Bon Homme; E. G. Smith, Yankton; D. R. Bailey, Minnehaha; J. C. Adams, Day; D. C. Nash, Beadle; F. G. Fahnestock, Codington; George Rice, Moody; John A. Owens, Kingsbury; F. J. Washabaugh, Lawrence; Sol Star, Lawrence; A. J. Simmons, Pennington; A. I. Stewart, Fall River; A. D. Clark, Custer; H. J. Grant, Butte; C. T. Clement, Cass; R. E. Noyes, Grand Forks; D. W. Yorkey, Walsh; Herbert Root, Barnes; W. F. Steele, Kidder; W. C. Plummer, Traill; Johnson Niekeus, Stutsman; Robert Wallace, Stutsman; M. H. Jewell, Burleigh; G. W. Harmon, Morton; Harry Oliver, Ransom; J. O'B. Scobey, Brookings; L. H. Bowman, Brown; C. T. Howard, Spink; James Bryson, Potter; A. E. Boyay, Morton; Mr. Dunn, Eddy.

The convention finally adjourned about 7 o'clock in the evening of the 22d.

DEMOCRATIC TERRITORIAL CONVENTION

In obedience to the call the Territorial Democratic Convention assembled at Aberdeen at 11 A. M., Wednesday, September 29, 1860, and organized by electing Hon. John R. Wilson, of Lawrence County, president temporarily, and Robert McBride, of Davison County, temporary secretary.

Mr. Wilson, on taking the chair, expressed his appreciation of the partiality of the convention in selecting him for the honorable station of presiding officer, and trusted that the convention would be able to justify the expectation of the thousands of democrats in Dakota and elsewhere who would be greatly interested in their proceedings and the outcome of the convention. He said:

Questions of the utmost importance are engaging the attention of the people of the territory and the democratic party is looked to to maintain the time-honored traditions of the historical party of our country, whose proudest boast has ever been that its principles are the bulwark of the people's liberties. Let the convention speak with no uncertain voice in behalf of the welfare and best interests of the half million people residing within our ample borders, north as well as south, east as well as west, and we shall have done our duty, and shall in all our future lives be able to recall our participation in this honorable assemblage as among the most gratifying experiences of our lives. Gentlemen, the convention is ready for the business for which it has been convened.

The temporary president then, on motion, appointed the following committees:

On credentials—M. H. Marrima, of Walsh County; P. F. McClure, of Hughes County; F. H. Crowin, of Kidder County; J. L. Gantz, of Pennington County; Charles Keith, of Brookings County; H. A. Reeves, of Bon Homme County, and C. Bellows, of Morton County.

On resolutions—W. R. Briery, of Grand Forks; C. J. B. Harris, of Yankton; S. A. Ramsey, of Sanborn; L. O. Jeffries, of Hyde.

On permanent organization—J. W. Goodrich, of Stutsman; J. B. Money, of Grand Forks; F. F. Randolph, of Beadle; W. H. Adams, of Edmunds; J. E. Jenkins, of Brule; F. E. Strander, of Clark, and Dell Coy, of Hughes.

A recess was then taken until 7 o'clock P. M.

At the time appointed, the convention re-assembled. On recommendation of the committee the temporary organization was made the permanent organization. The report of the credentials committee was presented and adopted, showing that 351 delegates were represented in person or by proxy, and were entitled to seats in the convention.
